"This nonbinding resolution, as a practical matter, doesn't do anything, but was designed to try to disapprove of the new mission," Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Kentucky, said after the vote. "Our view is you cannot discuss the new mission in Iraq without discussing funding for the troops."

McConnell said the Senate should have considered another resolution, put forward by Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and independent Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, which includes benchmarks to measure Iraqi progress toward security goals.

In a written statement after the vote, White House press secretary Tony Snow urged Congress to approve Bush's funding request for the military.

"It would enable the world's most capable military force to remain the most advanced in terms of training, equipment, doctrine and -- most importantly -- the quality of the men and women who serve," Snow said.

Graham said politics made Democrats afraid to allow a vote on funding the war.

"If you did have this vote, the left -- the radical left -- would eat every Democratic hopeful for president alive," Graham said. "That's why we're not having this vote. The hard left wants out of this war yesterday."

Senate Republicans succeeded earlier this month in blocking a vote on a similar resolution. Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada urged Senate Republicans to drop their procedural moves.

In the House, 17 Republicans joined Democrats on Friday in passing the two-sentence resolution. It expresses support for U.S. troops in Iraq but states that Congress "disapproves" of Bush's troop increase.

On February 5, all but two GOP senators voted to block debate on the similar resolution. Saturday's vote saw five more GOP senators join the Democrats.

They were Sens. John Warner of Virginia, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon, Olympia Snowe of Maine and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

"We support the president on the diplomatic aspects of his plan. We support the president on the economic aspects of his plan," Warner said.

"We only disagree with one portion of it: Mr. President, do you need 21,500 additional men and women of the armed forces in this conflict?" Warner said.

Sen. Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, backed the chance to vote on the resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0133270

"If we believe plunging into Baghdad neighborhoods with more American troops will not increase chances of success, we are duty-bound to say so," Levin said.GOP insisted on 'measure of fairness'

Republican leaders insisted that members get a chance to vote on two GOP alternatives, and that the process be conducted under rules that called for 60 votes to pass.

Republican critics have claimed that passing the resolution could lead to a cutoff in funding for the troops.

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Kentucky, said before the vote that Republicans would insist on "a measure of fairness," allowing them to offer alternative resolutions -- including one stating the Senate won't cut off money for troops in the field.

"If we have only one alternative, it will involve a vote on funding the troops," McConnell said.

Published polls indicate a solid majority of the U.S. public opposes the Bush plan, and Democrats said the November election victories that put them in control of Congress show Americans want to wind down the nearly four-year-old war.Bush challenges Congress not to cut funding

Bush noted Thursday that the Senate recently confirmed the promotion of Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. troops in Iraq, even as members criticized the strategy he was installed to pursue.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made an unannounced visit to Iraq on Saturday on her way to meet with Middle East leaders. She told troops there that despite the political debate, their efforts are appreciated back home.

Though the president said lawmakers "have every right to express their opinion," he demanded they support an upcoming spending bill that would commit nearly $100 billion more to the war effort.

"Our men and women in uniform are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need to accomplish their mission," Bush said.

US Senate Blocks Vote On Iraq War (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

The US Senate has decided not to debate a resolution criticising President George W Bush's troop surge in Iraq.

The rare Saturday session followed a non-binding vote backing the resolution in the House of Representatives.

In the House, 17 Republicans had joined the majority Democrats to oppose the increase of 21,500 troops.

Democrats needed the support of 60 of the 100 senators to advance the same motion in the Senate, but they only managed to gain 56 votes in favour.

Mr Bush still faces battles with Congress over funding for US troops in Iraq.

Although both the Congressional resolutions are non-binding, the president needs the legislators to support his $93bn (£48bn) emergency troop-funding measure.

The White House has dismissed the vote, and warned Congress against trying to cut off funding.

Under Mr Bush's new Iraq strategy, 21,500 extra troops are being sent, mostly to the capital Baghdad, to help enforce new security measures.

Senate Democrats were hoping to repeat their Friday success in the House, when the motion criticising the president's Iraq policy was passed by 246 votes to 182.

"Today's vote is an opportunity to send a powerful message," said Democrat majority leader, Senator Harry Reid, during an emotional discussion.

"The Senate's responsibility must be to vote on escalation, whether the so-called surge is supported or opposed. This is the choice. More war, or less war," the Democrat leader told the Senate.

Republicans sought debate on a different motion, which would have ruled out any budget cuts affecting troops already in Iraq.

"A vote in support of the troops that is silent on the question of funds is an attempt to have it both ways," said Senator Mitch McConnell, the Republican leader.

Only seven Republicans broke ranks with the party, and so the Democrats failed to reach the 60 votes needed to pass the motion.

'Tragic goal'

The House vote on Friday in support of the non-binding motion brought to a close the first full debate there since the Democrats took control of Congress in November.

Speaking after the vote, House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi said it would send an unmistakable signal to the White House.

"The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president - we here in Congress are committed to protecting and supporting our troops."

House Minority Leader John Boehner had urged lawmakers to vote against the motion, saying it was "the first step towards a tragic, unthinkable goal".

Rice, In Surprise Baghdad Visit, Presses Leaders For Progress (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday to meet with Iraqi officials about the new security plan and to press the Shiite-led government to accelerate reconciliation, reconstruction and economic progress.

Iraqi officials in recent days have said the start of the new push for security in Baghdad has been a success, significantly reducing violence.

Ms. Rice, in a meeting with reporters after her talk with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders, said it was still too early to judge the effectiveness of the new plan. But she said she had pushed the Iraqis to think beyond short-term security, to how neighborhoods and Iraqi civil society could be rebuilt if sectarian violence between the ruling Shiites and the minority Sunnis subsided.

She said she had told Iraq's leaders to quickly finish work on an oil law that would distribute revenues evenly among Iraq's population. She also stressed the importance of creating a more balanced government by rehiring thousands of Sunni civil servants whom the Americans fired soon after the invasion in 2003, fearing they would remain loyal to Saddam Hussein.

She described both proposed moves as proxies for larger, still unanswered questions about whether Iraq could become a truly united country.

"I'm told that the oil law is almost complete." she said. "I did say to my colleagues that I've heard it's almost complete before, and this time I hope it really is complete — as in, complete — because people are looking to see some elements of national reconciliation put into place. It's really critical."

The Baghdad stop, tagged on to Ms. Rice's scheduled trip to Israel, comes at a politically delicate time for the Bush administration. On Friday, a sharply divided House of Representatives passed a resolution formally repudiating President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 new combat troops to Iraq.

The rare wartime rebuke to the commander in chief — an act that is not binding but carries symbolic significance — was approved 246 to 182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to join all but 2 Democrats in supporting the resolution.

Ms. Rice said she used the restiveness in Washington to underline for Iraqi officials the spread of American frustration with Iraq's lagging political and economic progress.

She said she had "made clear that some of the debate in Washington is, in fact, indicative of the concerns that the American people have about the prospects for success" if Iraq's leaders did not quickly take actions to ensure longer-term stability.

Ms. Rice also addressed the administration's recent claim that the Quds Force, an elite branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard, had supplied Shiite militants in Iraq with deadly roadside bombs that had killed American troops. Echoing comments made by President Bush, Ms. Rice said she did not know whether the top levels of Iran's government had approved delivering the weapons to Iraq. But she said she did not think that excused Iran.

"It is an activity that is done by an element of the Iranian government," she said, "so I think the Iranian government has to be held accountable for it."

Earlier Saturday, Ms. Rice addressed about 25o American soldiers and civilian State Department employees at a palace that doubles as the United States Embassy. Standing in a cavernous lounge, beside an American espresso bar and below gilded ceilings embossed with Mr. Hussein's initials, she acknowledged criticism over the war in Congress.

"Some do not think this war was the right war to fight," she said. "Some believe we in the administration haven't fought it quite right." But she also insisted that, despite those disagreements, both Democrats and Republicans appreciated the troops' efforts.

"We can have our discussions and debates at home, but Americans want to win this war," she said. "You're in a noble cause."

Mr. Rice also said that Iraq's struggles for stability were not dissimilar from what the United States once experienced: "Perfect union was imperfect at its start."

She said Iraq's situation was similar, and she cautioned against viewing Iraqis as less competent at building a democracy. "Usually people think of war and peace," she said. "We all know that, in between, there's a lot."

Ms. Rice's visit came on a day of relative calm in Baghdad, but in the northern city of Kirkuk, two car bombs near the offices of a Kurdish political party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, killed nine people.

After her day in Baghdad, Ms. Rice traveled to Israel for a meeting on Monday between the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

In Baghdad, Rice Acknowledges Frustrations In U.S. (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed support for a nascent Baghdad security plan during an unannounced visit to the capital Saturday, but she reminded Iraq's leaders that Americans were growing increasingly frustrated with the unyielding lethality and cost of the war.

Rice spoke approvingly of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's leadership, urged Iraqi officials to enact laws to fairly administer the country's vast oil reserves and acknowledged widespread disapproval of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq among many Americans and U.S. lawmakers.

She arrived in the capital a day after the U.S. House passed a nonbinding resolution rejecting the administration's troop increase in Iraq, where violence has become the norm in the streets and squabbling dominates the political process.

"The American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever," Rice said during a 30-minute conversation with reporters in U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad's living room. "But we're also not saying to the Iraqis: Get it done by X-date, or else. That's not the way one treats a partnership in these difficult circumstances."

Rice met with Maliki and President Jalal Talabani and later had lunch at the U.S. ambassador's residence with a group that included the Kurdish deputy prime minister and the country's foreign minister. She said the Baghdad security plan, which was formally launched this week, was bringing "new hope and a new optimism" to the besieged Iraqi capital. A spokesman for the security plan said attacks have fallen 80 percent since it was launched Wednesday, and there were relatively few reports of violence Saturday.

Ten people were killed and 90 injured in two car bombs in the northern city of Kirkuk, police said, and an improvised explosive device killed one person in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced that a Marine was killed Friday in combat in the western province of Anbar. His name was not released.

Rice praised Maliki for vowing to target lawlessness across sectarian lines.

"Thus far, they seem to be carrying through with the rules of engagement that would suggest that justice and law enforcement is going to be evenhanded," Rice said. "These are the first days of the security plan. It's not going to be one day and then everyone can declare victory . . . There are going to be bad days in the Baghdad security plan when violence is up."

Rice asked insistently about the progress of legislative bills that would regulate the exploration and revenue sharing of the country's oil reserves, according to Iraqi officials who spoke to her.

Iraqi officials tasked with creating a draft law have failed to present a bill to parliament. At stake is the extent to which the central government will control exploration and management of oil fields and whether revenue will be distributed equally across the country.

Iraq's oil reserves are concentrated in the northern Kurdish area and provinces in the predominantly Shiite south.

"I did hear it's almost complete," Rice said about a status report she received on the draft of the bill. "I've heard that it's complete before. And this time, I hope it really is almost complete -- as in complete."

Rice left with a realistic sense of the challenges that lie ahead, said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister.

"She emphasized a great deal the issue of urgency," Zebari said in a telephone interview Saturday night. Rice stressed to Iraqi leaders that "patience is not unlimited in the United States and that there's a great deal of frustration," he added.

Rice said U.S. officials believe Iranian officials are involved in supplying Iraqi militias with parts to assemble deadly armor-penetrating weapons. But Rice said she did not know to what extent and at what level Iranian officials are complicit in their procurement.

When asked whether she was surprised by the skepticism that followed assertions last week by U.S. military briefers in Baghdad that Iranian weapons were being provided to Shiite militias in Iraq, Rice responded, "It's America, it's a democracy. And everything is greeted with questioning and skepticism . . . We understand there's still the shadow of what happened about weapons of mass destruction here."

Rice arrived at the Baghdad airport at 11:30 a.m. and arrived minutes later at the fortified Green Zone, where embassy and military personnel were gathered at a large meeting hall inside the former national guard palace, which was converted into the interim U.S. Embassy after Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was overthrown in 2003.

Standing behind a lectern flanked by an Iraqi and a U.S. flag, Rice told those present that their work is "noble" and "necessary" to keep the United States safe. She acknowledged the fierce opposition in Washington to President Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq in what many see as a last-ditch effort to secure the country and lay the groundwork for a sustainable democracy.

"Some do not think this war was the right war to fight," she said. "Some believe we in the administration haven't fought it quite right."

But she assured the group there is unequivocal support for the troops.

Rice was accompanied by Karen Hughes, the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs. Hughes, a close friend of Bush, had not previously visited Iraq.

Rice and Hughes were shuttled around the Green Zone in heavily armored vehicles, trailed by dozens of security guards. While Rice met with Maliki and Talabani, Hughes attended a musical performance at the al-Rashid Hotel, inside the Green Zone. Neither spent time outside the secured compound.

After her stop in Baghdad, Rice flew to Israel for a three-day visit to try to nurture a new effort to promote peace between the Israelis and Palestinians. Her mission has been complicated by a new Palestinian unity government that brings the moderate Fatah party into a government led by the radical Hamas group.

Rice will bring the Israeli and Palestinian leaders together for a meeting Monday, but both sides appeared to be jockeying for position ahead of the summit. Before having dinner with Rice, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni hardened Israel's stance on the emerging government, saying "the understandings" between Hamas and Fatah "do not meet the requirements of the international community."

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas also took a tough line, telling a U.S. envoy Saturday that the power-sharing agreement he reached was the best he could get and that an international aid boycott must be lifted, Palestinians said.

Rice, In A Surprise Visit, Urges Iraqis To Reconcile (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

T

BAGHDAD — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday and urged Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians to use a lull in violence resulting from a new security plan to reach long-delayed agreement on key political issues.

Her visit came as the much-vaunted plan, called Operation Law and Order, was getting underway in Iraq's capital. An Iraqi military spokesman said that attacks had already dropped significantly and that many fewer bodies were being brought to the morgue.

"How the Iraqis use the breathing space that [the plan] might provide is what's really important," Rice said during her half-day visit to Baghdad's heavily protected Green Zone. Iraqi security forces were "off to a good start," but it was still early, she said.

"There are going to be bad days for the Baghdad security plan, when violence is up — not down," she said. "The real test will be steering a steady course."

Though Baghdad has appeared calmer, attackers have hit elsewhere. In Kirkuk on Saturday, bombers killed six people and wounded 75. High-ranking Iraqi military officials have recently noted a significant increase in attacks in and around Kirkuk.

Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens all want control of the city and the surrounding region. At stake are land, water and some of Iraq's richest oil reserves.

Baghdad effort

In Baghdad, a crackdown that eventually will involve as many as 27,000 additional American and Iraqi troops began Wednesday. Despite opposition among the American public and in Congress to President Bush's plans to send more troops to Iraq, at least 5,000 more U.S. and Iraqi troops have joined the thousands already patrolling the streets of the capital.

The U.S. House on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Republicans blocked an effort to pass an identical resolution Saturday in the Senate.

Brig. Gen. Qassim Musawi, an Iraqi military spokesman, said that violence and crime in Baghdad had decreased by more than 80% and that at least 144 people had been detained in sweeps over the last three days.

A statement from Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's office said the plan also had resulted in the return of 107 displaced families to their homes. As many as 50,000 Iraqis are forced from their homes every month, joining 3.8 million others who have sought refuge elsewhere in the country or in neighboring states, according to the United Nations.

On Saturday, Rice met with Maliki, a Shiite; President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd; Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni; and others.

Iraq's religious and ethnic groups have been unable to agree on one of the most fundamental issues: how to share the country's oil resources. Lawmakers also have bickered over how to deal with onetime members of former President Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

"I'm told that the oil law is almost complete." Rice said. "I did say to my colleagues that I've heard it's almost complete before, and this time I hope it really is complete … because people are looking to see some elements of national reconciliation put into place. It's really critical."

Rice said U.S. commanders have told her that troop strength among Iraqi units in the Baghdad operation is as high as 90%. Initial reports had put them at about 50%.

But she reiterated that political progress would have to accompany any military advances.

"We've got to be sure not just to concentrate on the security plan…. The political side does need to keep pace."

Because of military action on the ground, Rice's plane circled above the city for half an hour before landing, according to the Associated Press.

In a 10-minute address in the Green Zone, Rice urged hundreds of American troops and U.S. Embassy staff members to be patient, saying they were engaged in a "noble cause."

"When you see Iraqis toiling and squabbling and struggling," she said, "remember it's not easy to build a democracy."

But she also said the Bush administration didn't have unlimited patience.

"The United States is investing a great deal, most especially the lives of our men and women in uniform, and the American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever," she said.

After meeting with Iraqi politicians and Western journalists, Rice flew by helicopter from the Green Zone to another U.S. military base, where she met Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq.

Iraqi authorities said Saturday that they had recovered five bodies in a Baghdad neighborhood just west of the Tigris River, significantly fewer than usual.

Marketplace targeted

But bombers and gunmen attacked elsewhere in the country. The double car bombing in Kirkuk that killed six hit a marketplace in a predominantly Kurdish part of town.

The explosions ripped through residences and storefronts, setting fire to at least a dozen cars. A woman picked through the debris after the explosion, crying and screaming as she looked for her 12-year-old son.

Azad Mustafa, 28, said the explosion knocked him over as he stood in his shop.

"The scene was like doomsday," he said, "torn bodies everywhere, injured people screaming, burning cars."

The U.S. military said a Marine was killed Friday during combat in Al Anbar province, bringing the number of U.S. deaths in Iraq to at least 3,133, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks military casualties.

In Kut, gunmen shot an Iraqi police officer in front of his house.

In Hillah, police recovered two bodies.

Rice: U.S. Has Doubts On Iraq Democracy (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 18, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Iraqi government leaders Saturday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad as the U.S. Senate deadlocked on whether to repeat a symbolic rebuke that the U.S. House handed Bush on Friday when it opposed the administration's deployment of additional combat troops to Iraq.

Although Rice used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private.

Rice told Iraqi leaders that the Baghdad security operation needs to "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into the capital's major Shiite militia stronghold, the Iraqi official said.

The official said Rice told Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that the initial stage of the crackdown, which began Wednesday, appeared to focus on Sunni areas and had left Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia, nearly untouched.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to release the information to the media.

He said Rice stopped short of accusing the Iraqis of displaying pro-Shiite bias in the operation and said it appeared that the crackdown was going well.

Documents captured during a raid about a month ago show that al-Qaida in Iraq has a carefully planned strategy aimed at downing coalition aircraft using a variety of weapons, said a U.S. defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

The official said the documents provide fresh evidence that the al-Qaida insurgency is adapting and posing new threats to U.S. forces. The contents of the seized materials were summarized in an intelligence report analyzing recent helicopter crashes.

The New York Times, which first reported on the intelligence analysis, said militants want to concentrate on air forces. "Attacks on coalition aircraft probably will increase if helicopter missions expand during the latest phase of the Baghdad Security Plan or if insurgents seek to emulate their recent successes," the paper quoted the intelligence report as saying.

In the last month, at least six U.S. helicopters have gone down; five of the crashes were blamed on hostile ground fire. The deadliest was a Black Hawk hit by small arms fire on Jan. 20, killing all 12 soldiers aboard.

On Feb. 2, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowleged that ground fire has been more effective against U.S. helicopters recently. He said he didn't know "if this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

Stakes are high for the plan to bring down violence in Baghdad, both to encourage Iraqis to trust their government and police and to demonstrate progress to an American public increasingly fed up with the war.

Bush's approval rating stands at 32 percent, tied for his lowest standing in Associated Press-Ipsos polling, and most people in the United States find fault with his handling of the nearly four-year-old Iraq war.

"The United States is investing a great deal, most especially the lives of our men and women in uniform, and the American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever to see those results," Rice told reporters.

Although reports from the first day or two of the operation placed Iraqi force participation at 45 percent to 55 percent of full strength, Rice said commanders have told her that Iraqi participation is now as high as 85 percent to 90 percent.

She said the Iraqi government is meeting a test she had set for its commitment to the plan by ensuring that the rules of engagement for the joint forces are equitable and nonsectarian. She said Iraqi leaders are also ably describing and defending the plan to Iraqis.

Rice is the highest-ranking U.S. official to visit Iraq since last month's announcement of the security campaign. Her stop, coinciding with the congressional debate, appeared to reflect a calculation by the administration that focusing on potentially promising developments in Iraq was the best response to the congressional voting.

Meeting with a small group of troops and U.S. Embassy staff inside the old Saddam Hussein-era palace that serves as U.S. headquarters in the fortified Green Zone, Rice referenced the week of bitter debate on Capitol Hill.

"Some do not think that this was the right war to fight, and others think that we in the administration haven't fought this war quite right," but still support U.S. forces and others in harm's way.

"I keep hearing and reading the American people don't want to fight this war anymore. I don't think that's right. The American people want to know that we can succeed," Rice said.

The Bush administration so far has spent more than $350 billion on the war and reconstruction. More than 3,100 U.S. troops have died in the conflict. Bush's approval

Violence in Baghdad has dropped off sharply since the military push began earlier this week. U.S. military planners, however, caution that any attempt to stabilize Baghdad could take months and militants are not likely to leave without a fight.

Ten bodies were reported by the morgue in the capital on Friday, compared to an average of 40 to 50 per day common in recent months, as parts of Baghdad have descended into a lawless jumble of gang killings and sectarian payback.

New checkpoints have gone up around the city, creating long traffic jams as vehicles are searched. Iraqi tanks have pushed into areas where roaming gunmen and militant groups have ruled.

Rice's Iraq visit was a sidelight to a trip otherwise devoted to energizing stagnant peace efforts between Israel and the Palestinians.

That mission was complicated by last week's announced power-sharing pact between the U.S-backed Palestinian President and Hamas militants whom the Bush administration considers terrorists.

Rice will spend several days in Israel, the West Bank and Jordan before reporting on peace prospects at meetings in Europe.

Rice Pushes Iraqis, Seeks To "See Results" (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Iraqi government leaders yesterday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Miss Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

Miss Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad as the U.S. Senate debated whether it would repeat a symbolic rebuke that the U.S. House handed Mr. Bush on Friday when it opposed the administration's deployment of additional combat troops to Iraq. Senate Republicans thwarted the move with a filibuster.

Although Miss Rice used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private.

Miss Rice told Iraqi leaders that the Baghdad security operation needs to "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into the capital's major Shi'ite militia stronghold, the Iraqi official said.

Violence in Baghdad has dropped off sharply since the military push began earlier last week. U.S. military planners, however, caution that any attempt to stabilize Baghdad could take months and militants are not likely to leave without a fight.

A twin bombing left 11 dead in northern Iraq and U.S. aircraft went in action yesterday against Sunni insurgents west of Baghdad.

The bombers struck in a Kurdish neighborhood of the oil city of Kirkuk, about 180 miles north of Baghdad, as streets were filled with cars and pedestrians.

Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area. Terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris. A restaurant owner lay screaming on the sidewalk, his body soaked with hot cooking oil after one of the blasts hurled him onto the curb.

Eleven persons were killed in the two blasts and 65 were wounded, police Brig. Gen. Sarhat Qader said. Sunni Arabs and Kurds have laid rival claims on Kirkuk and its oil wealth.

In Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of the capital, U.S. jets strafed gunmen after they ambushed a U.S. patrol, said 2nd Lt. Roger Hollenbeck, a Marine spokesman.

Hours later, U.S. aircraft destroyed a car with gunmen who were trying to escape after they attacked an Army patrol, Lt. Hollenbeck said.

Some U.S. officers think Sunni and Shi'ite extremists have fled Baghdad to avoid the crackdown, citing an increase in attacks in provinces that border the city.

BAGHDAD (AP) — A twin bombing left 11 dead in northern Iraq and U.S. aircraft went in action against Sunni insurgents west of Baghdad, as Iraqi officials claimed early success in the campaign to restore order in the capital.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice paid an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Saturday to discuss the security crackdown. She urged the Iraqis in a private meeting to "rise above sectarianism" and pursue Shiite as well as Sunni extremists, an Iraqi official said.

Rice also told Iraqi government leaders that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

The bombers struck in a Kurdish neighborhood of the oil city of Kirkuk, about 180 miles north of Baghdad, as streets were filled with cars and pedestrians on the main shopping day of the week.

Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area.

The back-to-back lasts shattered about 20 shops as terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris.

A total of 11 people were killed in the two blasts and 65 were wounded, police Brig. Gen. Sarhat Qader said. Sunni Arabs and Kurds have laid rival claims on Kirkuk and its vast oil wealth.

In Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of the capital, U.S. jets strafed gunmen with 40mm machine gun fire after they ambushed a U.S. patrol with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades, a Marine spokesman 2nd Lt. Roger Hollenbeck said.

Hours later, U.S. aircraft used precision weapons to destroy a car with gunmen who were trying to escape after they attacked a U.S. Army patrol with small arms fire, Hollenbeck said.

There were no U.S. casualties, but Hollenbeck said eight insurgents were killed — four in each attack.

The attacks north and west of the capital contrasted with a lull in major violence in Baghdad as U.S. and Iraqi forces try to regain control from sectarian militias and criminal gangs.

Some U.S. officers believe Sunni and Shiite extremists have fled Baghdad to avoid the crackdown, citing an increase in attacks in provinces that border the city.

The U.S. military said Saturday that a Marine was killed the day before during combat operations in Anbar province, which includes Ramadi. It was the first U.S. death reported since Wednesday when five soldiers were killed — all but one of them in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad.

Iraqi authorities said they foiled a would-be suicide attack near Karbala, about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south of Baghdad. A minivan came under fire after the driver failed to slowdown at a checkpoint, and then detonated the explosives and was killed in the blast, said Karbala police spokesman Rahman Mishawi. There were no other casualties.

In Baghdad, however, much of the gunfire appeared to come from Iraqi police firing weapons in the air to clear the way for their convoys speeding through the city. Police and soldiers searched cars at the numerous checkpoints.

On Palestine Street, a main thoroughfare in east Baghdad, police commandos with armored personnel carriers manned dozens of checkpoints — some only about 100 meters (yards) apart. In Waziriyah, a Sunni area of northeast Baghdad, cranes set concrete blast barriers into place to block would-be suicide bombers.

American paratroopers from the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division joined Iraqi soldiers in a sweep through a mostly Sunni neighborhood in the center of the capital. U.S. Apache helicopters flew overhead, and a U.S. jet streaked low across the sky in a show of force.

Although the Baghdad operation has been in full-swing only four days, Iraqi authorities have already begun heralding it as a major success.

Iraqi spokesman Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi told reporters that "crimes and terrorist attacks" had dropped by 80% since the long-awaited security operation began in force last Wednesday.

Police said the bodies of only five apparent victims of sectarian death squads were found in Saturday across the capital — in contrast to the scores that were recovered daily in the weeks before the crackdown.

U.S. officials, however, have been more cautious, saying it's too early to declare success.

But Sunni politicians have complained that the initial raids have focused on Sunni neighborhoods, sparing Shiite hotspots such as Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army of anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sunnis blame the Mahdi Army for much of the sectarian violence which has rocked Baghdad for nearly a year and for forcing thousands of Sunni families from their homes. Shiites insist the greater threat comes from Sunni extremists including al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Al-Sadr is a close ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The Shiite prime minister convinced al-Sadr to remove many of his armed militiamen from the streets to avoid a showdown with the Americans.

But many Sunni politicians believe al-Maliki is still reluctant to sanction a major military operation against al-Sadr's followers in the capital.

During a private meeting with Iraqi leaders, Rice said the Shiite-led government must "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into Sadr City, according to an Iraqi official familiar with the discussions.

The Iraqis, however, told her that the Mahdi Army and al-Sadr had been losing influence and were cooperating with authorities on security issues, the official said. The Iraqis said they did not want to "waste our resources in a place that's stable," the official added.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to release the information to the media.

He said Rice stopped short of accusing the Iraqis of displaying pro-Shiite bias in the operation and said it appeared that the crackdown was going well.

Documents captured during a raid about a month ago show that al-Qaeda in Iraq has a carefully planned strategy aimed at downing coalition aircraft using a variety of weapons, said a U.S. defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

The official said the documents provide fresh evidence that the al-Qaeda insurgency is adapting and posing new threats to U.S. forces. The contents of the seized materials were summarized in an intelligence report analyzing recent helicopter crashes.

The New York Times, which first reported on the intelligence analysis, said militants want to concentrate on air forces.

In the last month, at least six U.S. helicopters have gone down; five of the crashes were blamed on hostile ground fire. The deadliest was a Black Hawk hit by small arms fire on Jan. 20, killing all 12 soldiers aboard.

On Feb. 2, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowleged that ground fire has been more effective against U.S. helicopters recently.

Associated Press reporters Yahya Barzanji in Kirkuk and Hamza Hendawi and Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Planning Seen In Iraqi Attacks On U.S. Copters (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — Documents captured from Iraqi insurgents indicate that some of the recent fatal attacks against American helicopters are a result of a carefully planned strategy to focus on downing coalition aircraft, one that American officials say has been carried out by mounting coordinated assaults with machine guns, rockets and surface-to-air missiles.

The documents, said to have been drafted by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, show that the militants were preparing to “concentrate on the air force.” The contents of the documents are described in an American intelligence report that was reviewed by The New York Times.

Seized near Baghdad, the documents reflect the insurgents’ military preparations from late last year, including plans for attacking aircraft using a variety of weapons.

Officials say they are a fresh indication that the United States is facing an array of “adaptive” adversaries in Iraq, enemies who are likely to step up their attacks as American forces expand their efforts to secure Baghdad, the Iraqi capital.

“Attacks on coalition aircraft probably will increase if helicopter missions expand during the latest phase of the Baghdad Security Plan or if insurgents seek to emulate their recent successes,” notes the intelligence report, which analyzes the recent helicopter crashes.

The American military has said that seven helicopters have been downed since Jan. 20, a figure that exceeds the total number of coalition aircraft shot down in 2006.

After downing the helicopters, the insurgents often laid ambushes for the American ground troops they expected to come to the rescue, sometimes using roadside bombs that they placed in advance. American troops were attacked in five instances in which they rushed to the scene of aircraft that had been shot down, military officials said.

The intelligence report supports the concerns expressed by an American general this month that militants were adapting their tactics in an effort to step up attacks against helicopters. Such strikes have increased since the United States expanded its military operations in Baghdad in August. From December to January, the number of antiaircraft attacks rose by 17 percent, according to an American military report.

Insurgents in Iraq have boasted about the helicopter downings and posted video of some of the wreckage on militant Web sites. While Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has claimed it has "new ways" to shoot down the aircraft, some American analysts believe they are probably not employing new types of weapons but rather are making more effective use of arms already in their inventory.

The insurgents try to plan their attacks by studying flight patterns near American bases and along supply routes, according to the intelligence report.

In several recent helicopter downings, the attackers used a variety of weapons, including shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles, heavy machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and unguided rockets that cannot be diverted by the flares helicopters disperse to fool heat-seeking systems.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which the intelligence report says leads the insurgent group known as the Islamic State of Iraq, has claimed responsibility for shooting down three of the helicopters. Those helicopters were downed near Taji, Karma and in Diyala Province.

While the captured documents point to careful planning, it is not entirely clear whether this is an effort by some of the militant commanders in those areas or a nationwide strategy by the group.

Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, a deputy commander of the American-led multinational force in Iraq and an Army aviator, told reporters this week that multiple weapons systems had been used against American troops before, in attacks south of Baghdad last year.

"This is not a new tactic," he said. "But it is the first time that we have seen it employed in several months."

"We are engaged with a thinking enemy," he added. "This enemy understands based on the reporting and everything else that we are in the process of executing the prime minister's new plan for the security of Baghdad. And they understand the strategic implications of shooting down an aircraft."

He said that American commanders in Iraq have met to consider how to counter the shift in insurgent tactics, but he refused to discuss specifics.

General Simmons said the American military had not concluded whether a single militant cell was behind the attacks. Some of the attacks have been described by American intelligence as "opportunistic," meaning insurgents are simply firing at helicopters when they seen them.

American helicopters are being used extensively as American troops try to avoid the bombs hidden along streets and roads. Low-flying aircraft are also vulnerable when they pass over urban areas. In 2005, American Army helicopters flew 240,000 hours. In 2007, Army helicopters are expected to fly more than 400,000 hours, military officials said.

General Simmons had a firsthand look at opportunistic tactics on Jan. 25, when he was in one of a group of helicopters that was fired on near Hit in Anbar Province. In that attack, a Black Hawk helicopter in the group was stuck by automatic weapons fire after the helicopters flew near some militants who appeared to be removing or bringing arms to a weapons cache.

The damaged Black Hawk helicopter was forced to land. The helicopter General Simmons was in landed and picked up the crew, and the Marines sent a quick-reaction force to protect the aircraft, which was later brought to the American base at Asad.

"I've got firsthand knowledge on that one," General Simmons said. "We stumbled upon them, and they engaged us with what they had, and they got lucky."

Military officials say another opportunistic downing was the attack on an Apache helicopter near Najaf on Jan. 28 that killed both of the crew members. It occurred when the aircraft was sent to reinforce American and Iraqi troops. The officials also noted that the attack was the only recent instance in which a Shiite group — in this case, the Soldiers of Heaven — was responsible for shooting down a helicopter.

The Feb. 7 attack on a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight transport helicopter near Karma, an insurgent stronghold near Falluja, was initially attributed by military officials to mechanical problems. But this week they acknowledged it had been downed by hostile fire, most likely a shoulder-fired missile and heavy-caliber machine-gun fire.

In the video posted on the Internet by the Islamic State of Iraq, the Sea Knight is seen flying toward the camera. Then it banks to the right and turns a half-circle. An object darts into the screen from the right, trailed by a curl of black smoke. Moments after the object enters the frame, an explosion rips through the helicopter, which falls to the ground in flames.

Gen. James Conway, the Marine Corps commandant, confirmed Friday that the video seemed genuine. General Conway also told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the CH-46's defensive systems intended to shield the aircraft from missiles "did not properly deploy" when it came under attack from the ground.

The CH-46 did not release flares, which fire automatically and are intended to fool a heat-seeking missile into flying away from the aircraft. Nor did the helicopter take defensive maneuvers, which military officials said suggested that the pilots did not see the missile before they were hit.

Col. Dave Lapan, a Marine spokesman, said investigators were looking into whether the flare system malfunctioned or whether there had been other reasons the system failed, including "environmental factors," and whether the missile had characteristics that prevented it from being detected.

The recent spate of helicopter attacks began Jan. 20 with the shooting of a Black Hawk in Diyala Province that killed 12 soldiers on board. Three days later, a helicopter operated by the Blackwater security company crashed, leading to the deaths of five civilian contractors, including one thought to have been killed by militants surviving the crash. On Jan. 25, the Black Hawk helicopter in General Simmons's group was forced to land near Hit, but there were no casualties.

Two American crew members were killed in the Apache helicopter downing near Najaf on Jan. 28. On Jan. 31, a helicopter carrying civilian contractors was hit by small-arms fire near Baghdad and forced to land, but there were no casualties. On Feb. 2, two Americans were killed when their Apache was shot down in a coordinated attack. Seven marines died in the Sea Knight downing near Karma on Feb. 7.

Iran's Chance: U.S. Troubles In Iraq Create Opening For Regional Shift (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

CAIRO, Feb. 17 — In recent weeks, President Bush and American military officials have increasingly accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's affairs. But from Iran's perspective, given its longstanding interests in Iraq, it is the United States that is meddling in its backyard, analysts inside and outside of Iran say.

From the very start of the American occupation of Iraq, at least some in the Bush administration saw an opportunity to curtail the influence of Iran's radical Shiite leaders by producing an alternative, moderate center of Shiite Islam that would effectively neuter Tehran in ideological, political and strategic terms.

This was abundantly clear to Iran's clerical rulers, whose paramount priority since they seized power in 1979 has been to preserve their revolution and their grip on their own country.

Faced with more than 100,000 American troops next door and a White House that pursued a policy of pre-emptive war, Iran's leaders moved quickly to try to prevent the United States from gaining a permanent foothold.

"Iran's policy in Iraq works to prevent the U.S. from feeling safe and secure," said Talal Atrissi, a researcher and writer on Middle Eastern affairs based in Lebanon. "It works to prevent the formation of a pro-American Iraqi government, in favor of at least an Iraqi government that does not feel enmity toward Iran."

While the United States sees in Iraq a venture that will affect its foreign interests for years to come, Iran sees an occupied neighbor with close religious, cultural, political and economic ties. Though Iran is Persian while Iraq is Arab, both have majority Shiite populations that have mingled, religiously and culturally, for centuries.

"We have been there for thousands of years," said Reza Alavi, a historian and a former managing editor of the Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review, who said his own grandfather — like many Iranian Shiites — was buried in the Iraqi holy city of Najaf.

Mr. Atrissi said: "The Iranian historic, religious, economic ties with Iraq make Iran keen on preventing the U.S. being the sole authority in Iraq. They feel a duty to preserve these ties, and to protect their national security, which is threatened by the U.S. presence in Iraq."

In strategic terms, America's failure to secure its position in Iraq has presented Tehran with a rare opportunity to recalibrate the balance of power in a neighborhood that had long been hostile to its aspirations.

Before Sept. 11, 2001, Iran was virtually surrounded by the Sunni-dominated states of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan, with Turkey, a NATO member, on its northern flank.

Now, with the initial rout of the Taliban in Afghanistan and the ouster of Saddam Hussein, its most powerful and fearsome competitors, Iran is trying to assert itself as the dominant regional power.

In defiance of the United Nations Security Council, the Iranian government has proceeded with a nuclear program that it says is for peaceful purposes, but that the West says is aimed at developing weapons. Iran has strengthened ties with Syria, built the militia Hezbollah into a state within a state in Lebanon and offered support to the radical Palestinian group Hamas.

But the cornerstone to its regional plans lies in Baghdad.

In economic terms, Iran has an interest in a stable, Tehran-friendly Iraq. For decades, while Mr. Hussein was in power, Iraq was an economic obstacle for Iran, a wall blocking trading routes and diplomatic ties with its Arab neighbors.

The chaos in Iraq still means that Iran's trade with Syria has to be routed through Turkey. But Iranian officials say they hope someday to link the railroads of Iran and Syria with Iraq's, redrawing the economics of the region.

But Tehran's interests in Iraq cut much deeper than the economic. They range from its ideological desire to spread its influence throughout the Arab world — part of the so-called Shiite revival — to its connection to the people and holy sites of Iraq.

"Iran and Iraq's national interests are intertwined," said Farzaneh Roostaee, foreign editor of Shargh, a popular reformist daily in Iran that the government shut down late last year. "Both geographically and religiously, the two countries have many common interests. No matter how much Americans try, they can not separate these two countries from one another. It won't work."

The connections extend to the political sphere, as well. Iraq's two dominant Shiite parties, Dawa and the Supreme Council for the Iraqi Islamic Revolution, or Sciri, have deep roots in Iran, where many Shiite leaders fled to escape Mr. Hussein's violent repression of Shiites, which intensified after the Iranian revolution.

Several top Dawa leaders, including Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and a former prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, along with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of Sciri, lived for years in Iran before returning to Iraq after the American invasion. Sciri was founded in Iran in 1984, and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, fought with Iran in the long, bitter war with Iraq in the 1980s.

The militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr travels frequently to Iran; American officials said he went there this week to escape the security crackdown in Baghdad, though Shiite officials disputed that. And Mr. Sadr's potent militia, the Mahdi Army, is said to have received training from the Iranians.

There are deep spiritual connections, too, centered in Najaf and Karbala, the Iraqi cities which have for centuries been central to the Shiite faith. Long before the Iranian city of Qum grew into a hub of Islamic learning, Najaf was the center of thinking for the Shiite faithful. In the early 1900s, the religious scholars in Najaf effectively exported what came to be known as Iran's constitutional revolution.

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini lived in Najaf for 12 years during his exile before returning to lead the overthrow of the shah of Iran and the installation of the clerical system. It is believed that Imam Ali, the son-in-law and cousin of the Prophet Muhammad, is buried there, and his tomb is a leading site for Shiite pilgrims.

Karbala resonates throughout Shiite ideology and faith as the site of the martyrdom of Hussein, the grandson of the prophet, and his followers at the hands of a far larger Sunni army. His tomb is in Karbala, and his death in battle is central to Shiite notions of justice, self-sacrifice and opposition to oppression.

The religious centers are so important to Iranians that legions of them still visit the shrines even amid the chaos and bloodshed in Iraq today.

"There are still a lot of lower-middle-class Iranians who want to go to Iraq," said Mr. Alavi in Iran. "It is a really big deal to them. They want to go, as they say, to 'kiss the feet of Imam Hussein.' "

Those links to Iran's religious and revolutionary identity, combined with the presence of American troops in Iraq and thousands of NATO forces in Afghanistan, are more than enough justification for Iran to try to counter American influence next door, political analysts in the region said.

"It is not logical to have an American presence in Iraq, and Iran sitting passively, waiting for the formation of an anti-Iranian Iraqi government," Mr. Atrissi said. "From the Iranian perspective, Iran is a country defending its national security."

"Rogue" Shi'ite Militias Using Iranian Bombs (WT)

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

Lethal Iranian bomb technology spotlighted by U.S. officials in Iraq last week is being used by rogue elements of Shi'ite militias that are not under any kind of central command, the U.S. military says.

The evidence presented at a briefing in Baghdad last week further confuses an enemy landscape in which death is as likely to come at the hands of government-allied Shi'ite militias as from disgruntled former Ba'athist extremists and their al Qaeda allies.

U.S. military officials think members of Shi'ite militias -- most of which have links with both Iran and Iraq's Shi'ite-led government -- are receiving and using the "explosively formed penetrators" (EFPs), or shaped bomb charges. Officials say the EFPs have killed about 170 coalition troops in the past two years -- many of those in recent months.

"Our intelligence has assessed that they are Shia rogue elements of illegal armed groups," Lt. Col. Christopher Garver told The Washington Times in an e-mail interview from Baghdad.

"The primary user is a radical splinter element within Jaysh al-Mahdi that has more than likely been perpetrating a majority of the attacks," he said.

Jaysh al-Mahdi is the formal name for the Mahdi's Army militia, the armed following of the radical Shi'ite cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr. The sheik's political party has 30 seats in parliament, and he is a major political backer of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The other principal Shi'ite militia is the Badr Brigade, linked to the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which is a major partner in the ruling coalition.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said Thursday that Sheik al-Sadr had ordered the heads of his Mahdi's Army militia to leave Iraq.

"I think many of his top Mahdi Army officials have been ordered to leave Iraq to make the mission of the security forces easier," said a statement issued in the president's name by his office.

According to a document purportedly smuggled out of the prime minister's office, Mr. al-Maliki last month advised Shi'ite militia leaders to retreat to Iran and southern Iraq until the current U.S.-led security push is over.

The U.S. Embassy told The Times that the Iraqi government had declared the document a fake.

Tom Donnelly, a defense and security-policy analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, said Sheik al-Sadr is "both inside and outside the tent, and sometimes he is a useful ally and sometimes a hated enemy of the prime minister."

Sunni insurgents and disgruntled former Ba'athists, sometimes working with al Qaeda in Iraq, have long been blamed for most of the attacks on U.S. forces as well as waves of spectacular suicide attacks that have killed thousands of Shi'ites.

Bruce Reidel, senior fellow at the Saban Center of the Brookings Institution, said that roughly 90 percent of the anti-U.S. action to date had been from Sunni insurgents, but evidence pointed to a recent increase in Shi'ite attacks.

"The al Qaeda types hate us, but they also hate the Shi'ites. Sometimes other Sunni traditional clans and sheiks are enemies, but sometimes we are their only protectors from Shi'ite reprisals," Mr. Donnelly said.

Col. Garver said the United States had seen "crude attempts" by other illegal armed groups and al Qaeda to copy the Iranian EFP technology, but that the resulting weapons were "not nearly as precise or lethal."

In addition to killing more than 170 coalition troops, the Iranian technology has wounded more than 620 since 2004, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad on Wednesday.

Syrian President In Iran To Discuss Iraq (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

Syrian President Bashar Assad arrived in Iran Saturday to discuss Iraq and other Middle East issues with President Mahmoud Ahmadinajed, state-run television reported.

Assad was given a red-carpet welcome at the Presidential Palace in Tehran, the report said.

The United States has accused both Iran and Syria of not doing enough to stop militants from crossing from these countries into Iraq to join the insurgency. Both have rejected the charges.

This is Assad's fifth visit to Iran since he took office in 2000.

Iran and Syria have long been close allies. During the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war, Syria was the only Arab country that supported Iran.

The Iran Options (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S actions toward Iran are consistent with two very different underlying strategies. Both start with a correct reading of Iran's behavior at home and in the region as dangerous to U.S. interests and to the prospects for peace and democracy in the Middle East. Both mix pressure -- economic, rhetorical, military -- with diplomatic overtures. In one scenario, these are employed with the hope of success. In the other they are employed with the hope of success but an expectation of failure, in which case military force would be brought to bear with a justification that every other reasonable approach had been tried.

We have seen no evidence that the administration has Option B in mind, but it's plausible enough to merit stating that such a course for this president would be folly. There is much speculation in Washington about how Mr. Bush views his "legacy": about how he ostensibly wouldn't want to kick the Iran problem to his successor as he believes President Bill Clinton left North Korea to him, or to be known as the president who invaded the country without nukes while allowing the two other "axis of evil" nations to go nuclear. Concern about historical judgment is natural, but it should play no part in such decisions.

What Tehran Is Really Up To (WP)

By Daniel L. Byman

DOJ_NMG_0133283

Reports that Iran is arming various factions in Iraq are about as surprising as claims that Mafia members have been seen in Las Vegas casinos. Iran has been meddling in its neighbors' affairs for a long time, and not just in Iraq. Teheran has trained terrorist and guerrilla groups in Bosnia, Lebanon and Palestine, all of which are far from Iran.

So when U.S. military officials displayed explosively formed penetrators (EFPs), rocket-propelled grenades and other weapons that they say Iran provided to Shiite militias in Iraq, we have to recognize that this was no big departure for the Iranians.

As President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged last week, finding Iranian arms in Iraq does not prove the more important, and harder to make, argument that Iran is ordering its Iraqi proxies to attack U.S. troops. It may seem absurd to give Iran the benefit of the doubt, in light of its sorry track record on nuclear proliferation and support for radicalism in general, but we can't understand what Iran is up to without an appreciation for its broader Iraq strategy, which goes well beyond Tehran's desire to undermine U.S. policy. Iranian leaders calculate that they will need formidable proxies should the United States leave, and indeed Iran will face many challenges in Iraq if U.S. forces depart.

So why would Iran arm Iraqis and perhaps direct attacks on U.S. forces? For most Iranians, Iraq is an emotional issue. They see the daily suffering of Iraqis, both from the chaos in Iraq in general and at the hands of Sunni suicide bombers. They empathize with their fellow Shiites in Iraq, with whom they have historic ties and shared religious traditions. Though they rejoice over the downfall of Saddam Hussein (Iran suffered hundreds of thousands of casualties in the bitter war of 1980-88, which Hussein launched against it) they blame the United States for the violence that has swept Iraq since Hussein fell.

Iran worries about the United States. When Ayatollah Khomeini took power in the 1979 Islamic revolution, he made anti-Americanism a core of the new regime's foreign policy. The United States has been hostile ever since, even tilting toward Iraq during its war with Iran. The United States and Iran have not had diplomatic relations since 1979, and have periodically confronted each other.

In the decade before 9/11, Iran structured its military forces to fight America, even when the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf region was confined to the conservative oil states of the Arabian peninsula. Since 9/11, the United States has occupied Iraq with more than 100,000 troops, put significant forces in Afghanistan and Central Asia, and strengthened its security relationship with Pakistan. Iran perceives itself as surrounded. The United States has repeatedly made threats against the Iranian regime, has refused to surrender anti-regime Iranian terrorists found in Iraq, organized international economic pressure on the country, led a diplomatic effort to deny Iran the right to develop nuclear energy and nuclear weapons, and pointedly included military force against Iran as an option after dispatching two aircraft carriers to the Persian Gulf region-- hostile steps, in Iranian eyes, that reinforce paranoia.

Tehran does not want the secular and pro-Western Iraq that America dreams of, and it wants to ensure that the U.S. doctrine of preventive regime change is dead. So far, developments in Iraq have worked out in Iran's favor -- indeed, Iran appears to be the one state that is winning this war. Iraq is too weak to pose a military threat to Iran for years and perhaps decades to come. The democratic procedures that the United States imposed on Iraq put in power Shiite leaders who are far friendlier to Tehran than to Washington.

Iran is less nervous than it was in 2003, but it remains understandably anxious. The long-term role of U.S. forces and the future of the Shiite regime in Iraq are open questions. Instability in Iraq could lead to waves of refugees returning to Iran, as happened during the Iran-Iraq war, and could excite unrest among Iran's Kurdish and Arab populations. Expecting an American withdrawal sooner or later, Iran wants to prepare for a postwar era by maximizing its influence now.

The United States focuses on how Iran's arming of its Iraqi proxies hurts U.S. interests, but this is hardly Iran's only concern. The Iraqi Shiite groups that have received arms may be more loyal to Iran after American forces depart. Even more important, they will be stronger than their Iraqi rivals. In Lebanon, Iran helped build Hezbollah from disparate small Shiite movements, welding it together against rivals in the Shiite community and, over time, making it stronger than non-Shiite groups. The goal is the same in Iraq.

Many Iranian leaders, particularly the president and the emerging conservative political elite, are profoundly anti-American. They want the United States to fail in Iraq and elsewhere, and they share an ideological bond with many radical Iraqi groups. So it is not surprising that Iran works with its closest Shiite proxies in Iraq, providing them with EFPs and other weapons that make them far more capable of fighting U.S. forces. Other Iranian elites have more complex feelings about the United States, though none is favorable, and Iranians want to bury the doctrine of regime change. Even if Iranians do not control the attacks, Iran knows that some of the people it trains and equips may at some point be involved in anti-American operations, thus keeping the heat on U.S. forces.

But Iran could easily be even more aggressive in Iraq. Tehran could provide sophisticated weapons to a wider range of Iraqi groups than it reportedly has so far. Iran's Shiite proxies do at times attack American forces, but their principal targets are

Sunni militias. They could kill a lot more Americans than they have. Iran could be encouraging them to convert relatively peaceful parts of Iraq into battlefields similar to the wildest parts of Anbar province.

Iraq's Shiites are not Iran's only interest. Tehran also has a long history of working with (and also against) various Kurdish groups. Iran recognizes theIraqi Kurds as the strongest and most organized military force in the country, and has cultivated good relations with Kurdish leaders. Iran has its own restive Kurdish population, and wants to ensure that its Kurds don't use bases in Iraq or otherwise exploit the conflict to advance their own sectarian interests.

Iran also has a history of cultivating Sunnis when doing so seemed advantageous. It has reached out to a range of revolutionary Sunni groups and has good ties to Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Hamas and other organizations whose ideology is closer to Osama Bin Laden's than to Khomeini's. The 9/11 commission found that Iran had engaged in low-level tactical cooperation with Sunni militants linked to al-Qaeda. And Tehran can be intensely practical. During the Iran-Iraq war, Iran worked with Israel and the United States to gain much-needed weapons. Dealing with the Sunnis may follow a similar logic, though mutual suspicion will limit the extent of relations.

Ironically, Iran's long-term position could weaken when the United States draws down its forces. At first, the U.S. withdrawal will expand the power vacuum and Iran will try to fill it, but the limited chaos Iran foments can easily become uncontrolled. Iran's economic and military power is limited, and Iran's theocratic model of governance has little appeal for most Iraqis. Even many Shiite militants have at times been hostile to Iran, and respected moderates such as Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani are careful to maintain their distance from Tehran. Sunnis already rage against perceived Iranian dominance.

In a postwar environment, Tehran will have lost a lever against U.S. pressure and may find itself both overextended and vulnerable in Iraq -- a weakness that the United States might exploit in years to come.

Oh What A Malleable War (NYT)

MAYBE the Bush White House can't conduct a war, but no one has ever impugned its ability to lie about its conduct of a war. Now even that well-earned reputation for flawless fictionalizing is coming undone. Watching the administration try to get its story straight about Iran's role in Iraq last week was like watching third graders try to sidestep blame for misbehaving while the substitute teacher was on a bathroom break. The team that once sold the country smoking guns in the shape of mushroom clouds has completely lost its mojo.

Surely these guys can do better than this. No sooner did unnamed military officials unveil their melodramatically secretive briefing in Baghdad last Sunday than Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, blew the whole charade. General Pace said he didn't know about the briefing and couldn't endorse its contention that the Iranian government's highest echelons were complicit in anti-American hostilities in Iraq. Public-relations pandemonium ensued as Tony Snow, the State Department and finally the president tried to revise the story line on the fly. Back when Karl Rove ruled, everyone read verbatim from the same script. Last week's frantic improvisations were vintage Scooter Libby, at best the ur-text for a future perjury trial.

Yet for all the sloppy internal contradictions, the most incriminating indictment of the new White House disinformation campaign is to be found in official assertions made more than a year ago. The press and everyone else seems to have forgotten that the administration has twice sounded the same alarms about Iranian weaponry in Iraq that it did last week.

In August 2005, NBC News, CBS News and The Times cited unnamed military and intelligence officials when reporting, as CBS put it, that "U.S. forces intercepted a shipment from Iran containing professionally made explosive devices specifically designed to penetrate the armor which protects American vehicles." Then, as now, those devices were the devastating roadside bombs currently called E.F.P.'s (explosively formed penetrators). Then, as now, they were thought to have been brought into Iraq by members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard. Then, as now, there was no evidence that the Iranian government was directly involved. In February 2006, administration officials delivered the same warning yet again, before the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Timing is everything in propaganda, as in all showmanship. So why would the White House pick this particular moment to mount such an extravagant rerun of old news, complete with photos and props reminiscent of Colin Powell's infamous presentation of prewar intelligence? Yes, the death toll from these bombs is rising, but it has been rising for some time. (Also rising, and more dramatically, is the death toll from attacks on American helicopters.)

After General Pace rendered inoperative the first official rationale for last Sunday's E.F.P. briefing, President Bush had to find a new explanation for his sudden focus on the Iranian explosives. That's why he said at Wednesday's news conference that it no longer mattered whether the Iranian government (as opposed to black marketeers or freelance thugs) had supplied these weapons to Iraqi killers. "What matters is, is that they're there," he said. The real point of hyping this inexact intelligence was to justify why he had to take urgent action now, no matter what the E.F.P.'s provenance: "My job is to protect our troops. And when we find devices that are in that country that are hurting our troops, we're going to do something about it, pure and simple."

Darn right! But if the administration has warned about these weapons twice in the past 18 months (and had known "that they're there," we now know, since 2003), why is Mr. Bush just stepping up to that job at this late date? Embarrassingly enough, The Washington Post reported on its front page last Monday — the same front page with news of the Baghdad E.F.P. briefing — that there is now a shortfall of "thousands of advanced Humvee armor kits designed to reduce U.S. troop deaths from roadside bombs." Worse, the full armor upgrade "is not scheduled to be completed until this summer." So Mr. Bush's idea of doing something about it, "pure and simple" is itself a lie, since he is doing something about it only after he has knowingly sent a new round of underarmored American troops into battle.

To those who are most suspicious of this White House, the "something" that Mr. Bush really wants to do has little to do with armor in any case. His real aim is to provoke war with Iran, no matter how overstretched and ill-equipped our armed forces may be for that added burden. By this line of thinking, the run-up to the war in Iraq is now repeating itself exactly and Mr. Bush will seize any handy casus belli he can to ignite a conflagration in Iran.

Iran is an unquestionable menace with an Israel-hating fanatic as its president. It is also four times the size of Iraq and a far more dangerous adversary than was Saddam's regime. Perhaps Mr. Bush is as reckless as his harshest critics claim and will double down on catastrophe. But for those who don't hold quite so pitch-black a view of his intentions, there's a less apocalyptic motive to be considered as well.

Let's not forget that the White House's stunt of repackaging old, fear-inducing news for public consumption has a long track record. Its reason for doing so is always the same: to distract the public from reality that runs counter to the White House's political interests. When the Democrats were gaining campaign traction in 2004, John Ashcroft held an urgent news conference to display photos of seven suspected terrorists on the loose. He didn't bother to explain that six of them had been announced previously, one at a news conference he had held 28 months earlier. Mr. Bush played the same trick last February as newly declassified statistics at a Senate hearing revealed a steady three-year growth in insurgent attacks: he breathlessly announced a thwarted Qaeda plot against the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles that had already been revealed by the administration four months before.

We know what Mr. Bush wants to distract us from this time: Congressional votes against his war policy, the Libby trial, the Pentagon inspector general's report deploring Douglas Feith's fictional prewar intelligence, and the new and dire National Intelligence Estimate saying that America is sending troops into the cross-fire of a multifaceted sectarian cataclysm.

That same intelligence estimate also says that Iran is "not likely to be a major driver of violence" in Iraq, but no matter. If the president can now whip up a Feith-style smoke screen of innuendo to imply that Iran is the root of all our woes in the war — and give "the enemy" a single recognizable face (Ahmadinejad as the new Saddam) — then, ipso facto, he is not guilty of sending troops into the middle of a shadowy Sunni-Shiite bloodbath after all.

Oh what a malleable war Iraq has been. First it was waged to vanquish Saddam's (nonexistent) nuclear arsenal and his (nonexistent) collaboration with Al Qaeda. Then it was going to spread (nonexistent) democracy throughout the Middle East. Now it is being rebranded as a fight against Tehran. Mr. Bush keeps saying that his saber rattling about Iran is not "a pretext for war." Maybe so, but at the very least it's a pretext for prolonging the disastrous war we already have.

What makes his spin brazen even by his standards is that Iran is in fact steadily extending its influence in Iraq — thanks to its alliance with the very Iraqi politicians that Mr. Bush himself has endorsed. In December the president welcomed a Shiite leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, to the White House with great fanfare; just three weeks later American forces had to raid Mr. Hakim's Iraq compound to arrest Iranian operatives suspected of planning attacks against American military forces, possibly with E.F.P.'s. As if that weren't bad enough, Nuri al-Maliki's government promptly overruled the American arrests and ordered the operatives' release so they could escape to Iran. For all his bluster about doing something about it, Mr. Bush did nothing.

It gets worse. This month we learned that yet another Maliki supporter in the Iraqi Parliament, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the murderous 1983 attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait. He's now in Iran, but before leaving, this terrorist served as a security adviser, no less, to the first Iraqi prime minister after the American invasion, Ibrahim al-Jafaari. Mr. Jafaari, hailed by Mr. Bush as "a strong partner for peace and freedom" during his own White House visit in 2005, could be found last week in Tehran, celebrating the anniversary of the 1979 Iranian revolution and criticizing America's arrest of Iranian officials in Iraq.

Even if the White House still had its touch for spinning fiction, it's hard to imagine how it could create new lies brilliant enough to top the sorry truth. When you have a president making a big show of berating Iran while simultaneously empowering it, you've got another remake of "The Manchurian Candidate," this time played for keeps.

Why Iran "Meddles" In Iraq (LAT)

By Adam Shatz

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

THIS TIME AROUND, when the Bush administration presented "intelligence" from unidentified sources about a dangerous foe in the Middle East, the American media was noticeably more skeptical. Eager to redeem themselves for the generally obsequious reporting about Saddam Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction and ties to Al Qaeda, journalists don't want to get fooled again as the administration lays the groundwork for a possible war against Iran.

But even though journalists have quite rightly raised questions about the credibility of the intelligence and the motives behind its release, they have failed to take the next step and examine the fundamental underlying premise behind the administration's accusations: that Iran's role in Iraq is inappropriate.

Take, for instance, the New York Times' Feb. 13 editorial, "Iran and the Nameless Briefers." While demanding that President Bush "make his intentions toward Iran clear," warning against "another disastrous war" and questioning the administration's assertion (since retracted) that "the highest levels of the Iranian government" authorized the sale of armor-piercing explosives to militants in Iraq, the paper added, as if it were self-evident: "We have no doubt of Iran's malign intentions. Iran is defying the Security Council's order to halt its nuclear activities, and it is certainly meddling inside Iraq."

Let's be clear: Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, with his disgraceful Holocaust denial conference and incendiary strutting, cuts an unsavory profile, to say the least. And since the collapse of the Iranian reform movement, hard-liners have shrewdly exploited Bush's threats, jailing intellectuals with contacts in the West.

Still, is it fair to characterize Iran's involvement in Iraq as "malign," or, for that matter, as "meddling" (in contrast, say, to the presence of 130,000 American troops in Iraq)? Might Iran have legitimate interests in what is, after all, its own geographic neighborhood?

Could it be that Iran's stake in Iraq is solidly grounded in the same realist principles that drive the behavior of most nations, rather than in "malign intentions" or a desire to export the Islamic revolution?

If Iran wants to see a friendly government established in Iraq, it hardly lacks for reasons. Unlike the United States, Iran was attacked by Iraq, back when Hussein's regime enjoyed American support as a bulwark against Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's revolution. Hundreds of thousands of Iranians died during the Iran-Iraq war (1980-88). When Iraq used poison gas against Iranian troops, the United States uttered not a single protest.

Not surprisingly, Iran wants to ensure that no government in Iraq will threaten it again. That's why Iran made no secret of its joy over Hussein's downfall, but it also refuses to accept a potentially hostile American base in the Persian Gulf or to cede absolute control over Iraq's future to the United States.

Iran also sees itself as a protector of Shiite interests in the region — and is, with a mixture of gratitude and wariness, viewed as such by Shiites from the gulf to Lebanon to Pakistan. Iraq's Shiite majority, though Arab and nationalist, is linked to Iran's Shiites through both family and religious ties. It was in Tehran that many of the Iraqi Shiite parties in power today found sanctuary from Hussein's agents; many Iraqi clerics studied in Iran, and some — most notably Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani — were born in Iran. Every Iraqi Shiite politician must pay his respects to Tehran, including secularists such as Washington's former darling, Ahmad Chalabi.

The future Iraqi government, frankly, is likely to bear a stronger resemblance to the Islamic republic than to the liberal democracy the Bush administration publicly championed — or to the "Saddamism without Saddam" scenario that many advocates of the invasion privately preferred. That Iran has acted to bolster the power of its Shiite allies in Iraq — and to arm Shiite militias avenging Sunni attacks on their people and their shrines — may not be to Washington's liking, but "meddling" doesn't seem the right word for it.

In thinking about Iran's behavior, it's important to remember that the United States has made plain its determination to curb Iranian influence in the region — by force of arms, if necessary. From Iran's perspective, the U.S. is an implacable enemy that has rebuffed its diplomatic overtures. No state likes to see a hostile army stationed in its backyard.

If Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has indulged Ahmadinejad's rhetorical extremism, it may be because he expected to be rewarded, rather than punished, for Iran's assistance to the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq.

As Gareth Porter recently reported in the American Prospect, Iran floated a proposal in May 2003, shortly after the fall of Baghdad, for a "grand bargain" with the United States. It offered to back the 2002 Arab Summit's proposal for a two-state solution in Israel-Palestine and to end its military support for armed Palestinian groups as well as Hezbollah in return for the restoration of diplomatic relations with the United States.

Prematurely intoxicated by its "mission accomplished," the Bush administration reportedly ignored Iran's proposal and has since given every indication that it prefers regime change in Tehran to the kind of dialogue recommended by the Iraq Study Group. To this end, the administration has flirted with the Iranian Mujahedin Khalq, also known as MEK, a bizarre Maoist guerrilla group/cult that opposes the Islamic government and frequently launched attacks on Iran from Iraq with Hussein's backing.

Given the Bush administration's belligerent position, the Iranian government might have concluded that, with Hussein dead and the Shiite parties in power, Tehran's interests are best served by the withdrawal of American troops on its border. Even if the Iraqis fail to drive out U.S. forces, a deepening quagmire usefully distracts attention from Tehran's nuclear program and reminds the United States that it needs Iran in order to exit with its honor intact.

Like any state, the Islamic republic seeks above all to preserve itself. But, again, is this "malign intent" or a sober calculation?

Iran has, in other words, a strong realist case for being involved in Iraq. If Iranian "designs" on Iraq are seen as malign, it is only by those who believe that U.S. "intentions" in Iraq (unlike other imperial powers, we have no designs) are benign.

In this fairy-tale version of history, American rationales for occupying Iraq may change as often as necessary (from the destruction of Hussein's nonexistent "stockpile of weapons of mass destruction" to the promotion of democracy to the prevention of a civil war detonated by our invasion), but they remain virtuous in intent, while those who resist our plans are always portrayed as sinister.

The liberal mainstream has come to view the Iraq war as the greatest foreign policy disaster since Vietnam, but its faith in American virtue — its belief in American exceptionalism — remains as unshaken as the Bush administration's.

In the narrow parameters of American politics, you can ask whether Bush is telling the truth about Iraniandesigned bombs, but you may not ask whether the United States would accept the presence of 130,000 Iranian troops on our border. Nor may you ask who exactly is "meddling" in Mesopotamia.

Jailed 2 Years, Iraqi Tells Of Abuse By Americans (NYT)

By Michael Moss, Souad Mekhennet

DAMASCUS, Syria — In the early hours of Jan. 6, Laith al-Ani stood in a jail near the Baghdad airport waiting to be released by the American military after two years and three months in captivity.

He struggled to quell his hope. Other prisoners had gotten as far as the gate only to be brought back inside, he said, and he feared that would happen to him as punishment for letting his family discuss his case with a reporter.

But as the morning light grew, the American guards moved Mr. Ani, a 31-year-old father of two young children, methodically toward freedom. They swapped his yellow prison suit for street clothes, he said. They snipped off his white plastic identification bracelet. They scanned his irises into their database.

Then, shortly before 9 a.m., Mr. Ani said, he was brought to a table for one last step. He was handed a form and asked to place a check mark next to the sentence that best described how he had been treated:

“I didn’t go through any abuse during detention,” read the first option, in Arabic.

“I have gone through abuse during detention,” read the second.

In the room, he said, stood three American guards carrying the type of electric stun devices that Mr. Ani and other detainees said had been used on them for infractions as minor as speaking out of turn.

“Even the translator told me to sign the first answer,” said Mr. Ani, who gave a copy of his form to The New York Times. “I asked him what happens if I sign the second one, and he raised his hands,” as if to say, Who knows?

“I thought if I don’t sign the first one I am not going to get out of this place.”

Shoving the memories of his detention aside, he checked the first box and minutes later was running through a cold rain to his waiting parents. “My heart was beating so hard,” he said. “You can’t believe how I cried.”

His mother, Intisar al-Ani, raised her arms in the air, palms up, praising God. “It was like my soul going out, from my happiness,” she recalled. “I hugged him hard, afraid the Americans would take him away again.”

Just three weeks earlier, his last letter home — with its poetic yearnings and a sketch of a caged pink heart — appeared in The Times in one of a series of articles on Iraq’s troubled detention and justice system.

After his release from the American-run jail, Camp Bucca, Mr. Ani and other former detainees described the sprawling complex of barracks in the southern desert near Kuwait as a bleak place where guards casually used their stun guns and exposed prisoners to long periods of extreme heat and cold; where prisoners fought among themselves and extremist elements tried to radicalize others; and where detainees often responded to the harsh conditions with hunger strikes and, at times, violent protests.

Through it all, Mr. Ani was never actually charged with a crime; he said he was questioned only once during his more than two years at the camp.

American detention officials acknowledged that guards used electric devices called Tasers to control detainees, but they said they did so rarely and only when the guards were physically threatened. The officials said that detainees had several ways to report abuse without repercussions, and that all claims were investigated.

Officials declined to give specific details about why they had detained Mr. Ani or why they had freed him.

"He was released because the board that reviewed his case didn't believe he any longer posed a threat," said First Lt. Lea Ann Fracasso, a spokeswoman for detention operations, in a written answer to questions. "He was originally detained as a security threat. I don't have anything more."

The Detention System

The American detention camps in Iraq now hold 15,500 prisoners, more than at any time since the war began. The camps are filled with people like Mr. Ani who are being held without charge and without access to tribunals where their cases are reviewed, the Times examination published last December found.

Mr. Ani, a women's clothing merchant, said he was detained in 2004 after American soldiers who were searching for weapons in his six-family apartment building found an Iraqi military uniform in the basement. His joy upon being released in January was short-lived. Days later, he said, a Shiite militia ransacked his home in Baghdad, looking to kill him. He hid, going from house to house, until he could move his family out of Iraq.

Now he is among the estimated 1.5 million Iraqis who have taken refuge in neighboring Syria and Jordan, where sectarian rifts are springing up.

In one area of Damascus, Shiite refugees from Iraq have established a mini version of Sadr City, the Baghdad neighborhood. Sunni refugees, in turn, are forming their own enclaves. In interviews, former detainees seethed with rage at the United States.

One, a 43-year-old man from Samarra, Iraq, said he was released last year despite having fought American troops.

"I wish to go back to Iraq and fight against the Americans, God willing," vowed the man, who spoke on the condition that he be identified only by his nom de guerre, Abu Abdulla, for fear of reprisal.

Mr. Ani has other priorities, still exhausted from his detention and preoccupied with finding a permanent home. But he regularly turns his television to a new station called Al Zawra, transfixed by its running montage of videotaped attacks on American troops.

The station is owned by a Sunni, Meshaan al-Juburi, a former Iraqi politician who was indicted last year on charges of embezzling millions of American dollars; he denied the charges and returned to Syria, where he lived before the war. The station has become an information center for the Sunni insurgency and in the process has exasperated American and Iraqi forces. In an interview at his office here, Mr. Juburi said that he opposed Al Qaeda's use of suicide bombers to kill Iraqi civilians but was soliciting support for Iraqis intent on killing American troops. When the image of a roadside bomb blowing up an American Humvee appears on the large flat screen on his office wall, his eyebrows rise and he urges his visitors to watch, "This is a good one."

A Nightmare Begins

Mr. Ani's ordeal began on Oct. 14, 2004, when soldiers brought him in for what he described as desultory questioning.

" 'Are you married? How many children? Sunni or Shiite? Which mosque do you pray in?' " Mr. Ani said he was asked. "I said I didn't pray, and they said, 'Are you not Muslim,' and I said, 'Yes, but I'm not praying and going to mosques.' "

"They never asked me about terrorism," he said. "I'm a normal person, just a usual man, and don't have anything to do with anyone who was fighting against the Americans."

Mr. Ani spent a total of 44 days at two other American facilities before being sent to Camp Bucca. In all, he said, he was questioned just once at each site.

Mr. Ani said the electric prods were first used on him on the way to Camp Bucca. "I was talking to someone next to me and they used it," he said, describing the device as black plastic with a yellow tip and two iron prongs. He said the prods were commonly used on him and other detainees as punishment.

"The whole body starts to shake and hurt," he said. "And you lose consciousness for a couple of seconds. One time they used it on my tongue. One guard held me from the left and another on my back and another used it against my tongue and for four or five days I couldn't eat."

In a separate interview, the insurgent from Samarra said such a device had been used on him for speaking out of turn. Ahmed Majid al-Ghanem, 50, a former Baath Party official who was also freed from Camp Bucca and is now living in Syria, said in a separate interview that he witnessed the electric prods being used as punishment on other detainees.

The Times interviewed Mr. Ani at his apartment in Damascus, the Syrian capital, where he sat on a couch with his parents, wife and children. When he demonstrated how he had been held for the electric prod, his 4-year-old daughter, Al Budur, mimicked his actions.

Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a detention system spokesman, said: "Every use of less than lethal force, to include use of Tasers, is formally reported by facility leadership, ensuring soldiers are in accordance with proper use. Touching a Taser to someone's tongue is not one of the approved uses."

Mr. Ani said guards treated him kindly when he arrived at the jail on Nov. 20, 2004. He recalls being given soap, and, when his hands cracked from the cold, a soldier bringing him lotion and socks.

But soon new guards came "who had had special thoughts," he said. "They were not allowing us to talk. They cut off the salt, gave us food that was not fit for dogs. One guard named David sometimes brought us outside to stay in the sun, or when it was cold. He also didn't respect our faith, telling us not to pray here, and when we moved not to pray there."

The detainees also began fighting among themselves. Those who spoke to the American guards were ostracized. Long toilet lines further raised tensions.

One day the guards searched a makeshift prayer area, Mr. Ani said, "and they started to step on the Korans, which fell down."

"A fight started," he continued. "There was a huge demonstration. The prisoners started to throw their shoes at the guards, and we started to beat them with empty plastic bottles. The guards shot at us with rubber bullets, but then prisoners were killed and others were injured."

A Pentagon statement at the time described such an incident in January 2005, saying that four detainees were killed when guards were compelled to use deadly force to quell the riot and that it was set off by a search for contraband. Colonel Curry said an investigation concluded that a detainee leader had fabricated the Koran allegations to instigate violence.

Mr. Ani and other former detainees said there were frequent demonstrations to protest various grievances. Mr. Ghanem said he was released in late 2003 after hunger strikes forced camp officials to review his case and those of others.

Detention officials said they were also fighting radicalization at the camps and were trying to identify and isolate extremists. Former detainees said in interviews that the influence of Islamic extremists was still growing. At Camp Bucca, they said, hundreds of men formed a group called the Brothers. Members shaved their beards and otherwise masked their ideology so they would be placed with other detainees.

Mr. Ani generally slept in a wooden barrackslike structure, with a mattress on the ground and a nail on the wall for hanging clothes. Once, when the guards found an improvised needle that he said was used to repair clothes, he was taken to an isolated cell, where he was kept for 24 days.

"You cannot see the difference between day and night," he said. "There was no opening, not even in the door."

Colonel Curry said it was standard to discipline detainees when they did not follow procedure.

Mr. Ani despaired of ever being released. His letter that was printed in The Times ended with, "I hope I can be dust in the storms of Bucca so that I can reach you."

Dangers Beyond Jail

"I didn't see any kind of solution for me," Mr. Ani said after his release. "The only solution was to die," he said, his eyes welling with tears. "I was hoping to die."

In releasing Mr. Ani, the American military transferred him to Camp Cropper in Baghdad and gave him $25, which he and his parents used to hire a taxi. Along the way home, they had to dodge Shiite-controlled checkpoints, and just days later, he said, he narrowly escaped capture by a Shiite militia. Mr. Ani and other Iraqis say they believe these militias have found a way to learn when Sunni men are released from jail and then hunt and kill them.

Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, commander of American detainee operations, said that he had heard such concerns and that he was trying to alter the process of releasing detainees to improve their safety.

Mr. Ani said that for him there was only one way to stay alive: flee Iraq.

He said he was scared and puzzled about his next step. He said he felt that he could not stay in Syria, if only because work was scarce. But he must compete with other refugees for the attention of another host country.

"Until now, I can't sleep, really," he said. "Whenever I hear something noisy I stand up. I'm in a very bad psychological situation. I can't stop thinking of what we should do. I don't have a future here. How should we live?"

When his uncle put on Al Zawra, the satellite television station, Mr. Ani turned to look at the scenes of Sunni children who had been killed and the attacks on American soldiers.

"I am an Iraqi," he said. "I love my country. Of course, everyone who is an Iraqi at the moment, we are thinking how can we support our country."

"The United States through its actions made people hate the Americans much more than before."

Marine To Serve 8 Years In Killing Of Iraqi (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON, California (CNN) -- A U.S. Marine will serve no more than eight years in prison in connection with the killing of an Iraqi civilian, a Marine Corps spokesman said Saturday.

Marine Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington was sentenced to 14 years' confinement but will serve no more than eight under a plea agreement, Marine spokesman Sean Gibson told CNN.

Pennington pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges regarding the death of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, in Hamdaniya, west of Baghdad.

Pennington was among a group of seven Marines and a Navy medic charged in Awad's death. He and two other Marines were ordered to stand trial in October.

Pennington agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy to commit premeditated murder and kidnapping, and to a kidnapping charge. Other charges he faced were dismissed at sentencing.

He was given credit for the 340 days he served in pretrial confinement, Gibson said.

On February 8, Marine Cpl. Trent Thomas withdrew his guilty plea in the case, saying he now believes he acted under a lawful order. (Full story)

The Navy medic, Hospital Corpsman Melson Bacos, pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and kidnapping and agreed to testify against the Marines. Bacos was sentenced to a year in the brig.

He has testified that Marines were conducting a house-to-house search for suspected insurgents when they came across Awad, a retired policeman and a veteran of Iraq's war with Iran in the 1980s.

Bacos said Awad's hands and feet were bound and he was dragged from his home and shot numerous times. Then, he said, one Marine put the dead man's fingerprints on a rifle and shovel to make it look like he had been caught trying to plant a roadside bomb.

Marine Jailed Over Iraqi Murder (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

A US marine has been sentenced to eight years in military prison for his role in the killing of an Iraqi civilian.

Lance Cpl Robert Pennington, 22, is the fifth of eight US soldiers to plead guilty and be sentenced over the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52.

Investigators said the soldiers dragged disabled Mr Awad from his home and killed him in Hamdaniya in April 2006.

It is one in a series of inquiries into the alleged abuse or killing of Iraqis by coalition forces.

Murder and other charges were dropped in return for Cpl Pennington testifying against three other marines in the case.

Cpl Pennington pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy. His rank was also reduced and he has been dishonourably discharged.

'Truly sorry'

Mr Awad, a police officer, was taken from his home, put in a hole and shot in the head 10 times.

A gun and a shovel were then placed by his body to make it look as if he were an insurgent planting a roadside bomb.

The unit was reportedly searching for an insurgent and took Mr Awad when they failed to find their target.

Other US investigations Cpl Pennington, the squad's radio operator, told the court martial that he did not shoot Mr Awad but that he helped to force him into the hole and held his hand over his mouth.

At his sentencing hearing on Friday, Cpl Pennington expressed remorse for his actions.

"I can honestly and truly say that I am sorry that I did what I did. Saying I feel bad just does not begin to describe it," he said.

He was sentenced to 14 years but the military judge dropped six years in return for the plea bargain.

After the sentencing, Cpl Pennington's mother, Deanna, said: "I've come to understand that Bobby died in [the battle for] Falluja and I want to help him come back to life and be the good person I know he is".

Another marine, Cpl Trent Thomas - the only one in the group to plead guilty to murder - withdrew his guilty plea at the last minute as the court prepared to sentence him on 8 February.

Three other marines and the navy medic have pleaded guilty to various lesser charges related to the incident.

Letters From Baghdad (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Americans have always been fascinated by correspondence from the front. I have nothing from our soldiers to share, but I do have letters from an Iraqi friend and his wife. Hasan (sadly, I dare not give his real name) was a translator for the Coalition Provisional Authority when I worked in Baghdad in 2003 and 2004. These brief letters catalogue the deterioration, the chaos and the human tragedy that have become Iraq's lot. Perhaps they show the futility of our remaining there; perhaps they point out why we must stay. But they surely speak to the need to help those who once so hopefully helped us.

Here's a small window into the sadness called Iraq:

-- John Agresto

June 24, 2004: I hope you made the trip safely. If I may loosen the rein to my humble imagination, you may be relaxing in an easy chair . . . savoring the tranquility of the scene in front of you, listening to "American Pie." [Along with anything by Buddy Holly, Don McLean's 1971 classic was one of Hasan's favorites. He knew all the lyrics by heart and sang them repeatedly.] If that's what is happening, then I'm really happy for you, after all the effort that you made, you deserve a lot more.God, I'm so talkative, even for a first e-mail across continents!

Aug. 12, 2004: Things are going well for us, in spite of the deteriorating security state . . . [My wife] is going to work [at] an independent women assembly . . . I'm doing well, too, been praised & paid monthly. Lots of work, but I'm for it.

Sept. 9, 2004: Hello Sir, I'm still alive! It's been nearly a month since I e-mailed you last. The situation is getting tighter by the day, one can even smell chaos in the air! Being a confirmed optimistic, I still lead a sociable life, with great assistance from [my wife], who believes like me that one can only die once, so it better be done in style!

May 16, 2005: [A] burglar or "s" broke into our house twice & a car exploded in our neighborhood, not far away, which caused window-glass breaking. [B]ut we're safe & sound, comparatively speaking for what others are suffering. [B]ombed cars are by wholesale nowadays! Miraculously, [my wife] was not affected by the exploding car [because] she decided to leave the living room just seconds prior to the explosion. The broken glass covered all the sofa she was sitting on! Our ration of optimism is decreasing drastically!

Nov. 30, 2005: The situation here is deteriorating by the days, nowadays, even I, the optimist see it as unbelievingly unbearable beyond any standard. The constitution is a disaster, & [the] religious fanatics are power-thirsty, driven only by their complexities. I'm not only revealing my own opinion, this is standard street talk . . . Iraqis are yearning for a government that brings security & order among other obvious needs. They brought us ethnic & sect segregation, while most Iraqi families have [had] a husband or a wife from the other sect & even another ethnic group, for generations . . .If these degenerates continue in power after Dec. elections, God forbid, then it becomes inevitable for any sane Iraqi to get the heck out! We had humble hopes. [W]e came to the levee but the levee was dry! [We need America to] simply support sane, secular &; multi-party government, even bring it to power. By doing so, be assured every Iraqi will praise US of A all night & day . . .It could be immensely enhanced if Uncle Sam comes to rescue, don't we wish, oh boy, that'll be the day!

March 7, 2006: A nearly total eclipse of the heart & soul is the reason behind not writing! As you're concluding from what you gather, nothing is going the right direction. Deterioration is the master of the scene. I don't want to depress you more; you're too dear to us to do so. We're still in Baghdad, where else to go to? No place on the sphere is willing to accept Iraqis. I suppose we're considered potential threat, especially after the Amman explosions, not to say what we're doing in our own country, flying a 1,000-year-old, gold-cladded dome high in the sky & turning it to debris -- a shameful example of what I'm stating. Any way, I don't blame the world for looking down to us.

June 17, 2006: We're fine & safe by current Iraqi standards! Although we're living in unbelievably unbearable circumstances . . . [E]verything is worse than the day before: infrastructure, services, security, even hope! I don't need to elaborate. What you gather from media is only a fraction of reality. Baghdad is taking the worst out of that. Nowadays women are afraid of going outdoors unless for an absolute need, or going to work, but most wear veils as a precaution from a sudden harassment by a stupid degenerate, claiming to implement religion . . . To top it all, we have a curfew extension, so now we should be home at sunset till 6 am, just like domesticated farm animals! [W]asn't I right [back in 2004] about sitting down & watching [TV] with a drink in hand, hoping to live another day with our limbs & head where they were the day before?! Our feelings & reactions have become numb . . .

Oct. 12, 2006: [All] things [are] worse in everything & by all standards. Public electrical power is only 2 hours a day for ordinary citizens; VIPs (Hakim & his likes) get 24! I suppose you're well aware that what is circulated by media regarding the daily casualties is only the tip of the iceberg. Last night, the announced figure was 60 for the day, but a neighbor informed that till noon [it] was 198 in the city morgue, when he was collecting his tortured & killed brother's corpse. Killing on identity [i.e., because of one's religious or ethnic identity] is the hottest trend in our beloved & multi-ethnic, sect & religion city! We, citizens, used to judge each other by personalities, good or bad, never by sect, ethnicity or religion, for so many generations. Hell, you can rarely find an Iraqi family that's single sect, without marrying from the other. The same with ethnicity. . . . [D]isplaced families by force are now 51,000, not persons but families according to the minister of immigration & displaced announcement yesterday! We both take moral support from your e-mails . . . & your passport photo, that's still put in our living room! That's what we really needed & what we always will: your friendship & communication, although we would really love a reunion, any time! Of course USA is out of the question for a simple Iraqi couple . . . . it's a wide world, though not so "wide" for Iraqis.

Christmas Eve, 2006: This time of the year enables us to seize the opportunity to wish you & your family a MERRY CHRISTMAS & a HAPPY NEW YEAR. We're still alive; suffering of what now must have been obvious & clear to the entire world. Restricting our daily movement to essential needs, but thinking positively & not trying to ruin the occasion -- hoping for you times of joy & comfort.

Influence Of Joint Chiefs Starting To Rebound (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes,

Military critics say the generals' voices had been muffled under Rumsfeld, allowing mistakes in Iraq.

WASHINGTON — When President Bush went to the Pentagon in December to discuss his new war strategy with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld scheduled the meeting for his own conference room.

The chiefs rejected Rumsfeld's plan for the conference. Instead, according to a military source briefed on the meeting, they sent word that they would be in "the Tank," the Joint Chiefs' own secret briefing room. If the president and Rumsfeld wanted to hear their views, they could find them there.

It was a declaration that went unnoticed outside the Pentagon at the time, and Bush met with the generals on their terms. But it signaled a determination by the nation's top uniformed military officers to take on a greater role in shaping U.S. war policy after years in which some military critics said their voices had been muffled.

By law, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the president's principal military advisor. But for much of the Rumsfeld tenure, the Joint Chiefs — which include the top officers from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force — were kept out of war planning, according to some senior officers critical of that arrangement. Some top military voices have argued that had the Joint Chiefs been consulted more regularly, some key mistakes — such as the troop shortage early on — could have been avoided.

"When you are about to send young men and women to fight a war, you need the collective wisdom of many people. The service chiefs are part of the solution," said retired Gen. James L. Jones, a former Marine commandant who served as a member of the Joint Chiefs until 2003. "Some of the difficulty we are in now I think an honest man could say was due to that particular system … where the Joint Chiefs were left out."

Under the new secretary of Defense, Robert M. Gates, military officers say the influence of the Joint Chiefs is starting to rebound. Unlike his predecessor, Gates is publicly and privately paying close attention to his uniformed advisors.

Rumsfeld preferred to meet with service chiefs in larger groups that also included civilian officials, a practice that effectively diluted the influence of the military voices. Gates, on the other hand, has begun meeting with the chiefs once a week — in the Tank, a room Rumsfeld often avoided.

"That is a damn good thing," said a military officer, who, like several others, spoke about internal Pentagon differences on condition of anonymity. "There were huge periods — months — between meetings of the old SecDef and the chiefs. That's almost incomprehensible."

Rumsfeld and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, who was the top Mideast commander during the Afghanistan and Iraq invasions and who disdained the top generals, formed a "perfect storm" that cut the Joint Chiefs of Staff out of the loop, said Jones, the retired Marine general who also served as top military commander in Europe.

"You can circumvent the legitimate opinions that should be developed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff," Jones said. "And I think there is evidence that has happened on a number of occasions."

In his autobiography, Franks wrote dismissively about the Joint Chiefs and said that briefing them was a "bureaucratic exercise."

Unlike Rumsfeld, who was very sure of his own military opinion, Gates has said he wants to hear a variety of voices. And as Gates' own views on military policy become clearer through his appearances before Congress and at news conferences, his positions seem to be close to those of the Joint Chiefs and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the group's chairman.

The plan for the troop increase in Iraq was developed by the White House and other military leaders, like Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top U.S. commander in Iraq. Although the Joint Chiefs helped shape the plan, they have been less enthusiastic about the open-ended commitment advocated by the White House, a skepticism Gates seems to share.

Pentagon insiders say that if the new Bush strategy falters, "Plan C" — whatever that may turn out to be — likely will emerge from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They and the Joint Staff, the top military planners who report to Pace, are at work on alternatives if Bush's "surge" plan should fail, according to defense officials.

The role of the Joint Chiefs began growing in the months before Bush replaced Rumsfeld, when Pace decided to take a closer look at Iraq policy.

Last summer, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., then the top U.S. commander in Iraq, announced that rather than drawing down U.S. forces, he would need reinforcements to stabilize Baghdad. At that point, according to a senior Pentagon official, Pace decided the Joint Chiefs of Staff should take a closer look at why the U.S. policy was not succeeding.

Until then, according to the senior official, Pace thought the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been doing a good job "grading the homework" of Casey and other commanders but needed to do more. Pace formed a "Council of Colonels" consisting of top officers from every service who had served in Iraq. Among them was Army Col. H.R. McMaster, lauded for his efforts to secure the Iraqi city of Tall Afar and author of a book critical of the military leadership during the Vietnam War.

Pace's effort seemed unusual — but welcome — to White House officials, some of whom had grown frustrated that even in the face of a worsening military situation, the Pentagon seemed to keep peddling the same military advice.

In an interview, Pace said he began taking a harder look at Iraq last summer, which also is when Casey requested more troops.

"When I was self-analyzing my time as chairman, when I looked back in August of 2006 at what we had been doing, I thought we could be doing more … taking a look at the same facts and doing a deeper analysis," Pace said.

Pace did not agree that he and the other chiefs previously had been on the sidelines. But he acknowledged that he and the Joint Chiefs embarked last year on a new kind of analysis.

"We found a way to be more helpful," he said.

The controversy has rekindled a debate over the federal law governing the organization of the military, the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986. Designed to diminish rivalry between military services, the act designated the chairman of the Joint Chiefs as the president's top military advisor, but placed the office outside the formal military chain of command.

Pace and Jones have debated whether a change in the law is needed. Pace said that each time, he comes down on the side of the current system.

"As a citizen of the United States I like the fact there is no one military person who commands all things in our military," Pace said.

Nonetheless, there seems little doubt that under Gates the Joint Chiefs will have a greater role. Pace says he intends to continue gathering groups of officers to examine American strategy, as he did last year for Iraq.

"We will continue to use that concept for lots of issues in the global war — Afghanistan, other places, yes," Pace said. "It was really helpful."

Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration At Army's Top Medical Facility (WP)

By Dana Priest, Anne Hull, Washington Post Staff Writers

Behind the door of Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan's room, part of the wall is torn and hangs in the air, weighted down with black mold. When the wounded combat engineer stands in his shower and looks up, he can see the bathtub on the floor above through a rotted hole. The entire building, constructed between the world wars, often smells like greasy carry-out. Signs of neglect are everywhere: mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses.

This is the world of Building 18, not the kind of place where Duncan expected to recover when he was evacuated to Walter Reed Army Medical Center from Iraq last February with a broken neck and a shredded left ear, nearly dead from blood loss. But the old lodge, just outside the gates of the hospital and five miles up the road from the White House, has housed hundreds of maimed soldiers recuperating from injuries suffered in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The common perception of Walter Reed is of a surgical hospital that shines as the crown jewel of military medicine. But 5 1/2 years of sustained combat have transformed the venerable 113-acre institution into something else entirely -- a holding ground for physically and psychologically damaged outpatients. Almost 700 of them -- the majority soldiers, with some Marines -- have been released from hospital beds but still need treatment or are awaiting bureaucratic decisions before being discharged or returned to active duty.

They suffer from brain injuries, severed arms and legs, organ and back damage, and various degrees of post-traumatic stress. Their legions have grown so exponentially -- they outnumber hospital patients at Walter Reed 17 to 1 -- that they take up every available bed on post and spill into dozens of nearby hotels and apartments leased by the Army. The average stay is 10 months, but some have been stuck there for as long as two years.

Not all of the quarters are as bleak as Duncan's, but the despair of Building 18 symbolizes a larger problem in Walter Reed's treatment of the wounded, according to dozens of soldiers, family members, veterans aid groups, and current and former Walter Reed staff members interviewed by two Washington Post reporters, who spent more than four months visiting the outpatient world without the knowledge or permission of Walter Reed officials. Many agreed to be quoted by name; others said they feared Army retribution if they complained publicly.

While the hospital is a place of scrubbed-down order and daily miracles, with medical advances saving more soldiers than ever, the outpatients in the Other Walter Reed encounter a messy bureaucratic battlefield nearly as chaotic as the real battlefields they faced overseas.

On the worst days, soldiers say they feel like they are living a chapter of "Catch-22." The wounded manage other wounded. Soldiers dealing with psychological disorders of their own have been put in charge of others at risk of suicide.

Disengaged clerks, unqualified platoon sergeants and overworked case managers fumble with simple needs: feeding soldiers' families who are close to poverty, replacing a uniform ripped off by medics in the desert sand or helping a brain-damaged soldier remember his next appointment.

"We've done our duty. We fought the war. We came home wounded. Fine. But whoever the people are back here who are supposed to give us the easy transition should be doing it," said Marine Sgt. Ryan Groves, 26, an amputee who lived at Walter Reed for 16 months. "We don't know what to do. The people who are supposed to know don't have the answers. It's a nonstop process of stalling."

Soldiers, family members, volunteers and caregivers who have tried to fix the system say each mishap seems trivial by itself, but the cumulative effect wears down the spirits of the wounded and can stall their recovery.

"It creates resentment and disenfranchisement," said Joe Wilson, a clinical social worker at Walter Reed. "These soldiers will withdraw and stay in their rooms. They will actively avoid the very treatment and services that are meant to be helpful."

Danny Soto, a national service officer for Disabled American Veterans who helps dozens of wounded service members each week at Walter Reed, said soldiers "get awesome medical care and their lives are being saved," but, "Then they get into the administrative part of it and they are like, 'You saved me for what?' The soldiers feel like they are not getting proper respect. This leads to anger."

This world is invisible to outsiders. Walter Reed occasionally showcases the heroism of these wounded soldiers and emphasizes that all is well under the circumstances. President Bush, former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and members of Congress have promised the best care during their regular visits to the hospital's spit-polished amputee unit, Ward 57.

"We owe them all we can give them," Bush said during his last visit, a few days before Christmas. "Not only for when they're in harm's way, but when they come home to help them adjust if they have wounds, or help them adjust after their time in service."

Along with the government promises, the American public, determined not to repeat the divisive Vietnam experience, has embraced the soldiers even as the war grows more controversial at home. Walter Reed is awash in the generosity of volunteers, businesses and celebrities who donate money, plane tickets, telephone cards and steak dinners.

Yet at a deeper level, the soldiers say they feel alone and frustrated. Seventy-five percent of the troops polled by Walter Reed last March said their experience was "stressful." Suicide attempts and unintentional overdoses from prescription drugs and alcohol, which is sold on post, are part of the narrative here.

Vera Heron spent 15 frustrating months living on post to help care for her son. "It just absolutely took forever to get anything done," Heron said. "They do the paperwork, they lose the paperwork. Then they have to redo the paperwork. You are talking about guys and girls whose lives are disrupted for the rest of their lives, and they don't put any priority on it."

Family members who speak only Spanish have had to rely on Salvadoran housekeepers, a Cuban bus driver, the Panamanian bartender and a Mexican floor cleaner for help. Walter Reed maintains a list of bilingual staffers, but they are rarely called on, according to soldiers and families and Walter Reed staff members.

Evis Morales's severely wounded son was transferred to the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda for surgery shortly after she arrived at Walter Reed. She had checked into her government-paid room on post, but she slept in the lobby of the Bethesda hospital for two weeks because no one told her there is a free shuttle between the two facilities. "They just let me off the bus and said 'Bye-bye,' " recalled Morales, a Puerto Rico resident.

Morales found help after she ran out of money, when she called a hotline number and a Spanish-speaking operator happened to answer.

"If they can have Spanish-speaking recruits to convince my son to go into the Army, why can't they have Spanish-speaking translators when he's injured?" Morales asked. "It's so confusing, so disorienting."

Soldiers, wives, mothers, social workers and the heads of volunteer organizations have complained repeatedly to the military command about what one called "The Handbook No One Gets" that would explain life as an outpatient. Most soldiers polled in the March survey said they got their information from friends. Only 12 percent said any Army literature had been helpful.

"They've been behind from Day One," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who headed the House Government Reform Committee, which investigated problems at Walter Reed and other Army facilities. "Even the stuff they've fixed has only been patched."

Among the public, Davis said, "there's vast appreciation for soldiers, but there's a lack of focus on what happens to them" when they return. "It's awful."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, commander at Walter Reed, said in an interview last week that a major reason outpatients stay so long, a change from the days when injured soldiers were discharged as quickly as possible, is that the Army wants to be able to hang on to as many soldiers as it can, "because this is the first time this country has fought a war for so long with an all-volunteer force since the Revolution."

Acknowledging the problems with outpatient care, Weightman said Walter Reed has taken steps over the past year to improve conditions for the outpatient army, which at its peak in summer 2005 numbered nearly 900, not to mention the hundreds of family members who come to care for them. One platoon sergeant used to be in charge of 125 patients; now each one manages 30. Platoon sergeants with psychological problems are more carefully screened. And officials have increased the numbers of case managers and patient advocates to help with the complex disability benefit process, which Weightman called "one of the biggest sources of delay."

And to help steer the wounded and their families through the complicated bureaucracy, Weightman said, Walter Reed has recently begun holding twice-weekly informational meetings. "We felt we were pushing information out before, but the reality is, it was overwhelming," he said. "Is it fail-proof? No. But we've put more resources on it."

He said a 21,500-troop increase in Iraq has Walter Reed bracing for "potentially a lot more" casualties.Bureaucratic Battles

The best known of the Army's medical centers, Walter Reed opened in 1909 with 10 patients. It has treated the wounded from every war since, and nearly one of every four service members injured in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The outpatients are assigned to one of five buildings attached to the post, including Building 18, just across from the front gates on Georgia Avenue. To accommodate the overflow, some are sent to nearby hotels and apartments. Living conditions range from the disrepair of Building 18 to the relative elegance of Mologne House, a hotel that opened on the post in 1998, when the typical guest was a visiting family member or a retiree on vacation.

The Pentagon has announced plans to close Walter Reed by 2011, but that hasn't stopped the flow of casualties. Three times a week, school buses painted white and fitted with stretchers and blackened windows stream down Georgia Avenue. Sirens blaring, they deliver soldiers groggy from a pain-relief cocktail at the end of their long trip from Iraq via Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany and Andrews Air Force Base.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, 43, came in on one of those buses in November 2004 and spent several weeks on the fifth floor of Walter Reed's hospital. His eye and skull were shattered by an AK-47 round. His odyssey in the Other Walter Reed has lasted more than two years, but it began when someone handed him a map of the grounds and told him to find his room across post.

A reconnaissance and land-navigation expert, Shannon was so disoriented that he couldn't even find north. Holding the map, he stumbled around outside the hospital, sliding against walls and trying to keep himself upright, he said. He asked anyone he found for directions.

Shannon had led the 2nd Infantry Division's Ghost Recon Platoon until he was felled in a gun battle in Ramadi. He liked the solitary work of a sniper; "Lone Wolf" was his call name. But he did not expect to be left alone by the Army after such serious surgery and a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder. He had appointments during his first two weeks as an outpatient, then nothing.

"I thought, 'Shouldn't they contact me?' " he said. "I didn't understand the paperwork. I'd start calling phone numbers, asking if I had appointments. I finally ran across someone who said: 'I'm your case manager. Where have you been?'

"Well, I've been here! Jeez Louise, people, I'm your hospital patient!"

Like Shannon, many soldiers with impaired memory from brain injuries sat for weeks with no appointments and no help from the staff to arrange them. Many disappeared even longer. Some simply left for home.

One outpatient, a 57-year-old staff sergeant who had a heart attack in Afghanistan, was given 200 rooms to supervise at the end of 2005. He quickly discovered that some outpatients had left the post months earlier and would check in by phone. "We called them 'call-in patients,' " said Staff Sgt. Mike McCauley, whose dormant PTSD from Vietnam was triggered by what he saw on the job: so many young and wounded, and three bodies being carried from the hospital.

Life beyond the hospital bed is a frustrating mountain of paperwork. The typical soldier is required to file 22 documents with eight different commands -- most of them off-post -- to enter and exit the medical processing world, according to government investigators. Sixteen different information systems are used to process the forms, but few of them can communicate with one another. The Army's three personnel databases cannot read each other's files and can't interact with the separate pay system or the medical recordkeeping databases.

The disappearance of necessary forms and records is the most common reason soldiers languish at Walter Reed longer than they should, according to soldiers, family members and staffers. Sometimes the Army has no record that a soldier even served in Iraq. A combat medic who did three tours had to bring in letters and photos of herself in Iraq to show she that had been there, after a clerk couldn't find a record of her service.

Shannon, who wears an eye patch and a visible skull implant, said he had to prove he had served in Iraq when he tried to get a free uniform to replace the bloody one left behind on a medic's stretcher. When he finally tracked down the supply clerk, he discovered the problem: His name was mistakenly left off the "GWOT list" -- the list of "Global War on Terrorism" patients with priority funding from the Defense Department.

He brought his Purple Heart to the clerk to prove he was in Iraq.

Lost paperwork for new uniforms has forced some soldiers to attend their own Purple Heart ceremonies and the official birthday party for the Army in gym clothes, only to be chewed out by superiors.

The Army has tried to re-create the organization of a typical military unit at Walter Reed. Soldiers are assigned to one of two companies while they are outpatients -- the Medical Holding Company (Medhold) for active-duty soldiers and the Medical Holdover Company for Reserve and National Guard soldiers. The companies are broken into platoons that are led by platoon sergeants, the Army equivalent of a parent.

Under normal circumstances, good sergeants know everything about the soldiers under their charge: vices and talents, moods and bad habits, even family stresses.

At Walter Reed, however, outpatients have been drafted to serve as platoon sergeants and have struggled with their responsibilities. Sgt. David Thomas, a 42-year-old amputee with the Tennessee National Guard, said his platoon sergeant couldn't remember his name. "We wondered if he had mental problems," Thomas said. "Sometimes I'd wear my leg, other times I'd take my wheelchair. He would think I was a different person. We thought, 'My God, has this man lost it?' "

Civilian care coordinators and case managers are supposed to track injured soldiers and help them with appointments, but government investigators and soldiers complain that they are poorly trained and often do not understand the system.

One amputee, a senior enlisted man who asked not to be identified because he is back on active duty, said he received orders to report to a base in Germany as he sat drooling in his wheelchair in a haze of medication. "I went to Medhold many times in my wheelchair to fix it, but no one there could help me," he said.

Finally, his wife met an aide to then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz, who got the erroneous paperwork corrected with one phone call. When the aide called with the news, he told the soldier, "They don't even know you exist."

"They didn't know who I was or where I was," the soldier said. "And I was in contact with my platoon sergeant every day."

The lack of accountability weighed on Shannon. He hated the isolation of the younger troops. The Army's failure to account for them each day wore on him. When a 19-year-old soldier down the hall died, Shannon knew he had to take action.

The soldier, Cpl. Jeremy Harper, returned from Iraq with PTSD after seeing three buddies die. He kept his room dark, refused his combat medals and always seemed heavily medicated, said people who knew him. According to his mother, Harper was drunkenly wandering the lobby of the Mologne House on New Year's Eve 2004, looking for a ride home to West Virginia. The next morning he was found dead in his room. An autopsy showed alcohol poisoning, she said.

"I can't understand how they could have let kids under the age of 21 have liquor," said Victoria Harper, crying. "He was supposed to be right there at Walter Reed hospital. . . . I feel that they didn't take care of him or watch him as close as they should have."

The Army posthumously awarded Harper a Bronze Star for his actions in Iraq.

Shannon viewed Harper's death as symptomatic of a larger tragedy -- the Army had broken its covenant with its troops. "Somebody didn't take care of him," he would later say. "It makes me want to cry. "

Shannon and another soldier decided to keep tabs on the brain injury ward. "I'm a staff sergeant in the U.S. Army, and I take care of people," he said. The two soldiers walked the ward every day with a list of names. If a name dropped off the large white board at the nurses' station, Shannon would hound the nurses to check their files and figure out where the soldier had gone.

Sometimes the patients had been transferred to another hospital. If they had been released to one of the residences on post, Shannon and his buddy would pester the front desk managers to make sure the new charges were indeed there. "But two out of 10, when I asked where they were, they'd just say, 'They're gone,' " Shannon said.

Even after Weightman and his commanders instituted new measures to keep better track of soldiers, two young men left post one night in November and died in a high-speed car crash in Virginia. The driver was supposed to be restricted to Walter Reed because he had tested positive for illegal drugs, Weightman said.

Part of the tension at Walter Reed comes from a setting that is both military and medical. Marine Sgt. Ryan Groves, the squad leader who lost one leg and the use of his other in a grenade attack, said his recovery was made more difficult by a Marine liaison officer who had never seen combat but dogged him about having his mother in his room on post. The rules allowed her to be there, but the officer said she was taking up valuable bed space.

"When you join the Marine Corps, they tell you, you can forget about your mama. 'You have no mama. We are your mama,' " Groves said. "That training works in combat. It doesn't work when you are wounded."Frustration at Every Turn

The frustrations of an outpatient's day begin before dawn. On a dark, rain-soaked morning this winter, Sgt. Archie Benware, 53, hobbled over to his National Guard platoon office at Walter Reed. Benware had done two tours in Iraq. His head had been crushed between two 2,100-pound concrete barriers in Ramadi, and now it was dented like a tin can. His legs were stiff from knee surgery. But here he was, trying to take care of business.

At the platoon office, he scanned the white board on the wall. Six soldiers were listed as AWOL. The platoon sergeant was nowhere to be found, leaving several soldiers stranded with their requests.

Benware walked around the corner to arrange a dental appointment -- his teeth were knocked out in the accident. He was told by a case manager that another case worker, not his doctor, would have to approve the procedure.

"Goddamn it, that's unbelievable!" snapped his wife, Barb, who accompanied him because he can no longer remember all of his appointments.

Not as unbelievable as the time he received a manila envelope containing the gynecological report of a young female soldier.

Next came 7 a.m. formation, one way Walter Reed tries to keep track of hundreds of wounded. Formation is also held to maintain some discipline. Soldiers limp to the old Red Cross building in rain, ice and snow. Army regulations say they can't use umbrellas, even here. A triple amputee has mastered the art of putting on his uniform by himself and rolling in just in time. Others are so gorked out on pills that they seem on the verge of nodding off.

"Fall in!" a platoon sergeant shouted at Friday formation. The noisy room of soldiers turned silent.

An Army chaplain opened with a verse from the Bible. "Why are we here?" she asked. She talked about heroes and service to country. "We were injured in many ways."

Someone announced free tickets to hockey games, a Ravens game, a movie screening, a dinner at McCormick and Schmick's, all compliments of local businesses.

Every formation includes a safety briefing. Usually it is a warning about mixing alcohol with meds, or driving too fast, or domestic abuse. "Do not beat your spouse or children. Do not let your spouse or children beat you," a sergeant said, to laughter. This morning's briefing included a warning about black ice, a particular menace to the amputees.

Dress warm, the sergeant said. "I see some guys rolling around in their wheelchairs in 30 degrees in T-shirts."

Soldiers hate formation for its petty condescension. They gutted out a year in the desert, and now they are being treated like children.

"I'm trying to think outside the box here, maybe moving formation to Wagner Gym," the commander said, addressing concerns that formation was too far from soldiers' quarters in the cold weather. "But guess what? Those are nice wood floors. They have to be covered by a tarp. There's a tarp that's got to be rolled out over the wooden floors. Then it has to be cleaned, with 400 soldiers stepping all over it. Then it's got to be rolled up."

"Now, who thinks Wagner Gym is a good idea?"

Explaining this strange world to family members is not easy. At an orientation for new arrivals, a staff sergeant walked them through the idiosyncrasies of Army financing. He said one relative could receive a 15-day advance on the $64 per diem either in cash or as an electronic transfer: "I highly recommend that you take the cash," he said. "There's no guarantee the transfer will get to your bank." The audience yawned.

Actually, he went on, relatives can collect only 80 percent of this advance, which comes to $51.20 a day. "The cashier has no change, so we drop to $50. We give you the rest" -- the $1.20 a day -- "when you leave."

The crowd was anxious, exhausted. A child crawled on the floor. The sergeant plowed on. "You need to figure out how long your loved one is going to be an inpatient," he said, something even the doctors can't accurately predict from day to day. "Because if you sign up for the lodging advance," which is $150 a day, "and they get out the next day, you owe the government the advance back of $150 a day."

A case manager took the floor to remind everyone that soldiers are required to be in uniform most of the time, though some of the wounded are amputees or their legs are pinned together by bulky braces. "We have break-away clothing with Velcro!" she announced with a smile. "Welcome to Walter Reed!"A Bleak Life in Building 18

"Building 18! There is a rodent infestation issue!" bellowed the commander to his troops one morning at formation. "It doesn't help when you live like a rodent! I can't believe people live like that! I was appalled by some of your rooms!"

Life in Building 18 is the bleakest homecoming for men and women whose government promised them good care in return for their sacrifices.

One case manager was so disgusted, she bought roach bombs for the rooms. Mouse traps are handed out. It doesn't help that soldiers there subsist on carry-out food because the hospital cafeteria is such a hike on cold nights. They make do with microwaves and hot plates.

Army officials say they "started an aggressive campaign to deal with the mice infestation" last October and that the problem is now at a "manageable level." They also say they will "review all outstanding work orders" in the next 30 days.

Soldiers discharged from the psychiatric ward are often assigned to Building 18. Buses and ambulances blare all night. While injured soldiers pull guard duty in the foyer, a broken garage door allows unmonitored entry from the rear. Struggling with schizophrenia, PTSD, paranoid delusional disorder and traumatic brain injury, soldiers feel especially vulnerable in that setting, just outside the post gates, on a street where drug dealers work the corner at night.

"I've been close to mortars. I've held my own pretty good," said Spec. George Romero, 25, who came back from Iraq with a psychological disorder. "But here . . . I think it has affected my ability to get over it . . . dealing with potential threats every day."

After Spec. Jeremy Duncan, 30, got out of the hospital and was assigned to Building 18, he had to navigate across the traffic of Georgia Avenue for appointments. Even after knee surgery, he had to limp back and forth on crutches and in pain. Over time, black mold invaded his room.

But Duncan would rather suffer with the mold than move to another room and share his convalescence in tight quarters with a wounded stranger. "I have mold on the walls, a hole in the shower ceiling, but . . . I don't want someone waking me up coming in."

Wilson, the clinical social worker at Walter Reed, was part of a staff team that recognized Building 18's toll on the wounded. He mapped out a plan and, in September, was given a $30,000 grant from the Commander's Initiative Account for improvements. He ordered some equipment, including a pool table and air hockey table, which have not yet arrived. A Psychiatry Department functionary held up the rest of the money because she feared that buying a lot of recreational equipment close to Christmas would trigger an audit, Wilson said.

In January, Wilson was told that the funds were no longer available and that he would have to submit a new request. "It's absurd," he said. "Seven months of work down the drain. I have nothing to show for this project. It's a great example of what we're up against."

A pool table and two flat-screen TVs were eventually donated from elsewhere.

But Wilson had had enough. Three weeks ago he turned in his resignation. "It's too difficult to get anything done with this broken-down bureaucracy," he said.

At town hall meetings, the soldiers of Building 18 keep pushing commanders to improve conditions. But some things have gotten worse. In December, a contracting dispute held up building repairs.

"I hate it," said Romero, who stays in his room all day. "There are cockroaches. The elevator doesn't work. The garage door doesn't work. Sometimes there's no heat, no water. . . . I told my platoon sergeant I want to leave. I told the town hall meeting. I talked to the doctors and medical staff. They just said you kind of got to get used to the outside world. . . . My platoon sergeant said, 'Suck it up!' "

Walter Reed Couldn't Handle Wounded From Iraq, Leader Says (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The head of the Army hospital responsible for most of the seriously injured war veterans has acknowledged that the staff responsible for tracking patients after they receive treatment was overwhelmed by the number of wounded when violence spiked in Iraq two years ago.

The undermanned staff may have led to wounded veterans falling through the bureaucratic and medical cracks, he said.

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, commander of the prestigious Walter Reed Army Medical Center, said the number of outpatient soldiers reached a high of 872 in summer 2005, up from about 100 before the war, leaving the military and medical staff responsible for monitoring their well-being unable to keep on top of critical cases.

"We found that the platoon sergeants that we had for accountability and the case managers that we had, they were literally managing 125 patients each," Weightman said. "That's too many to do [oversight] effectively."

Walter Reed, located in northwest Washington, D.C., is renowned for its inpatient medical care, which has helped keep alive hundreds of soldiers who probably would have died during previous conflicts.

Less well-known is the care soldiers receive as outpatients, which has stretched to an average of 10 months — two months longer than Army guidelines call for — a period Weightman said can be even more frustrating for wounded soldiers and their families.

"When you're an inpatient, you're literally a captive in our organization," Weightman said. "When you're an outpatient, there's a lot more options that you have as a patient as far as where you can go and who accounts for you. That was, in some cases, a problem."

Weightman's acknowledgment, made during a briefing Friday for a small group of reporters, came ahead of a Washington Post investigation to be published today that details multiple cases of soldiers who accused Walter Reed of neglecting them and forcing them to live in substandard wards on the medical center's campus once they became outpatients.

The Post story includes allegations that one outpatient soldier at Walter Reed drank himself to death, and two others died in a high-speed car accident even though the driver was supposed to be restricted to medical center grounds because of past use of illegal drugs.

Weightman, who took command of Walter Reed in July, said he has quadrupled the number of staff responsible for serving as liaisons between outpatients and the review boards charged with deciding whether to discharge outpatients or return them to active duty.

He also said he is increasing the number of military officers and case workers handling individual outpatients so that every caregiver will only have to handle 30 to 35 veterans.

Weightman insisted he has also ordered his staff to focus on "high-risk" cases, such as veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder or traumatic brain injuries, to insure they are more closely monitored once they become outpatients.

"Maintaining quick accountability at all times on those, it generates a lot less problems for us downrange," Weightman said. "They're the folks that are at risk of not being where they're supposed to be, or getting on a motorcycle and going 120 miles per hour, or inappropriate use of alcohol or medication or illegal substances."

Despite these improvements, however, some of the cases documented by the Post — including the two soldiers who died in the car accident — occurred after Weightman's changes. And, according to the Post, many of the substandard living conditions and bureaucratic problems still exist.

Paul Rieckhoff, an Iraq war veteran who heads Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, said he had heard of similar cases at Walter Reed, including a friend who had suffered "catastrophic injuries" in Iraq and was forced to "carry his paperwork through the snow" when he became an outpatient.

"They didn't plan properly for the war," Rieckhoff said. "If it even happens to one veteran, then it's shameful. None of these guys should ever fall through the cracks."

Two "Private Fuzzies," Diverted On Their Way To War (WP)

By Bill Murphy, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

FORWARD OPERATING BASE WARHORSE, Iraq

An explosion in the distance broke the silence in tent MC-01 just after 9 a.m.

"IED?" Pvt. Ryan Tozour asked his friend sitting astride the next cot, referring to an improvised explosive device, or bomb.

"I never heard an IED before," Pvt. Stephen Daniel replied. He leaned forward and spat tobacco juice into a Gatorade bottle, just inches from his rifle. "I only saw a video," part of a briefing a few days before when he and Tozour got to Iraq.

The two privates, artillerymen, had been together since basic training in July, and they had reached this small, dusty base outside Baqubah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, the night before purely by accident. The helicopter ferrying them to their unit made a quick stop here, and when they got off to let some other passengers out, other soldiers grabbed their bags and jogged away.

"We were yelling, 'No!' " Daniel explained. "By the time we got clear to where they could hear us," he paused, then lifted his arm slowly, mimicking a helicopter taking off.

They slept here last night, in this dark, cavernous tent, where plywood covers the ground and the furniture consists of about 60 green canvas cots. Dust, sand and gravel are everywhere.

Their unit, a battalion in the 1st Cavalry Division, has been in Iraq since October. Nobody has told them what job they'll be doing here, but they don't think there is much artillery in this war, and they expect to be used as infantry.

"They call us Private Fuzzies," said Daniel, 22, because they have no rank tabs on their uniforms -- just a soft Velcro patch where an insignia would go if they had one. "Our drill sergeant used to say, 'You'll be in Iraq in 90 days.' We'd say, 'You're crazy.' Guess it wasn't too crazy."

They had eaten breakfast at the dining hall nearby and now had nothing to do but wait. They rehashed rumors, worried that the helicopter mix-up meant they would now have to fly in daylight. They argued about where and what kind of helicopters had crashed in Iraq recently.

"When you're not here yet, you're like obsessed with here," Daniel said. "You're like looking at blogs and looking online. And then you get here, and it gets old within a day. You halfway don't want to go. But it's why you joined, so it's cool. Maybe time will go faster if you're getting shot at."

Of the 150 people who attend his small church in Belton, Tex. -- "the buckle of the Bible belt," Daniel described it -- nine are serving in Iraq. "It's a conservative, Independent Baptist church. Very patriotic, rah-rah."

He has a 6-year-old son. The other families in Daniel's congregation were disappointed in him and his girlfriend for getting pregnant. "They kept asking, 'When are you two going to get married? You're going to get married, aren't you?' " They did get married, a year and a half ago.

"Everything happens for a reason," Tozour assured him. He is 19 and grew up in Wilmington, N.C.

"Don't say it like you're proud of it," Daniel interrupted.

"Hey, it's a nice place," said Tozour, who got married two days before basic training. His wife works at a Wal-Mart back home, and he said he joined the Army "for the benefits. I mean, I don't need to pay for dental, medical, none of that."

At 9:50 a.m., Daniel checked his watch. They gathered their duffel bags and carried them out of the tent, through the maze of blast walls designed to protect against mortars and other dangers.

"Hey, Daniel!" called out a burly staff sergeant.

Daniel spun on his heels and snapped to "parade rest" -- hands clasped smartly behind his back, feet shoulder width apart, eyes straight ahead.

"Yes, sergeant!" both men said.

"It's okay, you can stand easy. Are you guys new?"

"Yes, sergeant," came the replies. They unclasped their hands.

He asked what job they had trained for and where they were headed. It's tough here, he said. "Keep your eyes open. Be alert."

"Yes, sergeant."

"Don't relax. This is no place to relax."

"Yes, sergeant."

The sergeant looked them over. "But you guys are going to have a lot of fun," he said as he sent them on their way. "Be safe."

Just out of the sergeant's earshot, Daniel turned to Tozour. "Don't relax speech Number 208," he said.

Their ride arrived a few minutes after 10 a.m., and they headed back to the landing zone.

Shortly afterward, the sergeant who had given them the "don't relax" speech, Staff Sgt. Benjamin Maldonado, 31, had a minute to reflect. An infantryman in his second year in Iraq, his current job is to help run the transient tents and other facilities on the base.

U.S. casualties are piling up here now, slowly but steadily. Maldonado said he doesn't see things here getting better, and it's tough to watch new guys go off into the fight. "It would be one thing if you saw some improvement."

A few minutes later, Maldonado ushered some Iraqi workers into tent MC-01. They started sweeping, and the air was filled with dust.

Strengthen Civilian Forces, Too (WT)

By Richard Lugar

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan are foremost in our thoughts and prayers, but the U.S. military has been quietly fighting the war against terror in scores of other foreign countries. Since September 11, 2001, the number of military personnel and Defense Department activities in non-combat countries has soared.

Finding, capturing and eliminating terrorists and their support networks are only part of the military's new mission. They have won new authority outside the traditional foreign aid framework to provide military training to foreign countries. Increasingly, the military is taking on roles once reserved for civilian agencies, such as building schools and clinics, drilling wells and conducting public information campaigns.

A strong military response is necessary for the war against terrorism. When our foreign friends use our training and intelligence to round up global terrorists on their soil, it is clearly a mutual success. But over-reliance on the military also carries risks.

To succeed, we need diplomats who can shape complex bilateral relationships, repair and build alliances and navigate through a labyrinth of foreign languages and cultures. We need foreign aid experts who know how best to promote democratic practices and economic development. And we need communication professionals to get our message across to foreign audiences.

These civilians are our best hope for defusing religious extremism and defeating international terrorism long-term. They are found in the State Department, the U.S. Agency for International Development and other civilian agencies. The military's encroachment into traditionally civilian activities risks blurring lines of authority and weakening the secretary of state's lead role in foreign policy.

Worse, it could actually hurt our anti-terror efforts by giving too strong a military cast to our programs and policies, fueling suspicion and resentment overseas.

The shift is not the result of carefully considered policy. Often, the Pentagon is taking on these civilian responsibilities simply because it has the money to do so. Currently we have almost a 14:1 ratio of military spending to spending on the diplomatic and foreign aid agencies. The president's new budget for fiscal 2008 seeks an increase in routine defense spending (excluding supplemental requests for Afghanistan and Iraq) over the fiscal 2006 appropriation of some $71 billion. This two-year increase alone is roughly twice what we spend on the entire civilian foreign affairs budget.

And because the Pentagon now has authority to conduct its own foreign assistance programs, albeit with the "concurrence" of the State Department, the likelihood increases of skewing the balance between civilian and military programs. In the Dominican Republic, for instance, the Pentagon has $7.5 million to offer for military equipment and training, but only $800,000 in U.S. funds goes to public diplomacy.

While the military has received hefty budget increases since September 11, 2001, Congress has shortchanged the president's requests for civilian foreign affairs funding by $5.6 billion. Yet it is precisely vigorous action by those agencies that we need for success.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff members who recently visited a number of embassies to assess the impact of our growing military presence found that our ambassadors and a number of foreign officials are concerned. In particular, in countries where U.S. military assistance now exceeds our traditional economic aid, they worry that the U.S. ambassador could lose effective leadership of the bilateral relationship in-country as well as control over the coordination between Pentagon and civilian agencies.

I welcome the increased resources the military brings, and I believe strong military-to-military relations are an important ingredient in winning cooperation against terrorism. But the administration and Congress should adopt three important principles to bolster our civilian forces in the campaign against terror.

Full authority for ambassadors. An ambassador is the personal representative of the president and must direct all U.S. government activities in-country. That means he or she must be consulted ahead of time on all planned U.S. military activities and programs, and must have authority to overrule the Pentagon when necessary.

One voice in foreign policy. All security assistance, like other foreign aid, should go through the secretary of state, who should rationalize and prioritize our many assistance programs according to the president's strategic vision.

Match money to mission. Civilian foreign policy agencies get far less funding than they need. The administration should develop a comprehensive spending plan for robust diplomatic capability and assistance in every country important to our anti-terror campaign. Money should flow to the agencies with the expertise to accomplish the mission, rather than assigning the mission to whomever happens to have the money to pay for it.

Taliban Offensive Expected In Spring (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

Some observers worry that NATO forces in Afghanistan have failed to seize the initiative.

KANDAHAR, AFGHANISTAN — As the U.S. Black Hawk helicopter skimmed low over the desert, the signs of approaching spring were everywhere: melting frost in the hollows, the first shoots of green in the nearby fields, shrinking snowcaps on distant peaks.

In coming weeks, winter will loosen its grip on Afghanistan. Senior NATO generals insist that their troops are well positioned to confront the Taliban offensive that is expected to follow.

But some analysts, diplomats and other observers think the Western alliance, and the Afghan government it supports, has failed to use winter's relative lull in fighting to seize the initiative in advance of a new battle with the insurgents.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces in the south are being bolstered, but the influx of about 3,000 additional troops is privately described by field commanders as both tardy and considerably smaller than what they had hoped for.

The reinforcements will come almost exclusively from the United States and Britain; troop commitments by other alliance members have failed to materialize.

In some key districts, Taliban militants have reinfiltrated areas they were driven from months ago. Even before the start of any large-scale offensive, the insurgents are demonstrating an ability to capture territory, including their brazen seizure of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province this month.

With Western troop levels at their highest since the fall of the Taliban in 2001, including a record 26,000 U.S. soldiers, senior NATO officials in Kabul, the capital, described the insurgents as scattered and demoralized after defeats last year — the bloodiest year of the conflict, with about 4,000 people killed.

The Taliban harbored ambitions of seizing Kandahar, the movement's onetime stronghold, but were blocked in that drive last autumn, though fighting came within 10 miles of the city.

"2006 was a year of Taliban failure," said British Gen. David Richards, who turned over command of NATO forces to U.S. Army Gen. Dan McNeill this month. "The Taliban did not achieve a single objective…. We proved that NATO can and will defeat the Taliban militarily."

But commanders of remote coalition outposts that have come under frequent hit-and-run attacks this winter describe a resourceful and determined foe they think will be back in force to fight again.

"They're hard-core — very determined, very disciplined. They know the ground and they know how to fight, and they know how to adapt to changing conditions," said Canadian army Capt. Piers Pappin, whose mud-walled, thatched-roof outpost in the desert west of Kandahar was repeatedly attacked by bands of insurgents, even during the supposed winter lull.

Insurgent commandants have boasted that in coming months they will step up the use of crude yet lethal tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings, with which they can counter NATO troops' vastly superior firepower.

Suicide attacks increased fivefold in 2006, and the use of remotely detonated devices nearly doubled from the previous year, according to U.S. military figures.

'The call of extremists'

In Afghanistan's impoverished south, which is expected to be the focal point of fighting in the spring and summer, the slow pace of reconstruction has hurt allied military efforts to build the trust of villagers.

"While the growing insurgency is attracting increasing attention, long-term efforts to build the solid governmental institutions a stable Afghanistan requires are faltering," the Brussels-based International Crisis Group said in a report released at the end of January. As a result, "disillusioned, disenfranchised Afghans are … responding to the call of extremists."

Aid groups and nongovernmental organizations have characterized the reconstruction effort as falling far short of the targets set a year ago by Western nations and the Afghan government.

"So much could have been done over the winter to make these people's lives better," said Norine MacDonald, who works in Kandahar province in village outreach programs sponsored by the nonprofit Senlis Council. "Instead, their situation is getting worse all the time."

Heading into the next round of fighting, the dubious efficacy of the Afghan army is also a growing cause for concern. Coalition goals call for the force to expand to 80,000 troops by next year, but at this point, struggling with a high desertion rate, it is fielding about 20,000.

Senior Western military officials put a positive face on the progress made in arming and training the force. But field-level allied officers who work closely with the Afghan troops privately predict that it will take many years to shape them into a professional army capable of confronting the insurgents on their own.

The Afghan troops protest that they are counted on to smooth over anger when NATO operations result in civilian deaths and injuries. At least 100 Afghan civilians died last year at the hands of allied forces, according to New York-based Human Rights Watch, and Afghan rights groups put the figure many times higher.

"Whenever they do something that is against our culture, people get angry, very angry," said Lt. Col. Sheehin Shah Kabandi, a regional Afghan army commander in Kandahar. "We remind them again and again: If you enter someone's house by breaking down his door, that man and all his relatives are your enemy forever."

Local resentment is sometimes inflamed by what Western military officials see as an effort by Afghans to better their lot. In the Panjwayi district outside Kandahar, NATO troops for months have been bulldozing vineyards, arbors and orchards to build three wide roads radiating from their bases. Alliance officials say the roads will be an economic boon to villagers.

But some farmers said that promised compensation never arrived and that the roads appeared to be mainly for the troops' use.

"What do we gain?" said a weathered villager named Rahmatullah, bent nearly double under a load of dry sticks. "My grapes are gone, and I have nothing.

"I'm angry at the Taliban who were hiding here, but I'm angry at them too," he said, pointing with his chin toward NATO combat engineers leveling ground for the latest stretch of road.

Civilian casualties

As they seek to benefit from any NATO missteps, the insurgents have honed their tactics. Western commanders describe how the insurgents seed an area with arms caches, then blend with farmers and villagers until they are ready to pick up their weapons and fight.

One commander at an outpost near Kandahar said he was grudgingly impressed when Afghan men who later proved to be insurgents loitered in a field by day, stacking stones that hours later were used to precisely position a rocket-propelled grenade launcher for a nighttime attack.

During a sweep last month, NATO soldiers found a compound that apparently had been used as an insurgent field hospital, with bandages, syringes and painkillers, within 200 yards of a troop outpost.

When the insurgents are able to establish themselves in a populated area, coalition forces face a difficult decision: whether to risk civilian casualties by attacking.

Musa Qala, a town in Helmand province's poppy-growing belt that was overrun by the Taliban early this month after a British-brokered truce collapsed, is a case in point.

NATO used a pinpoint airstrike to kill the Taliban commander who had led the takeover and said it would evict the rest of the insurgents when it was ready to do so. But military officials acknowledged it would be difficult to dislodge the Taliban fighters without inflicting civilian casualties, even though many residents had fled.

Civilian deaths have become a highly sensitive subject, particularly after Afghan President Hamid Karzai publicly broke into tears late last year while imploring allied troops to be more careful.

Bombers-in-waiting

Air power has become a much-relied-on advantage for coalition troops, but in addition to the risk of civilian casualties, springtime fighting will bring other challenges: for example, keeping helicopters and other aircraft in the skies when dust storms send columns of fine, sandy grit thousands of feet aloft.

Low-altitude surveillance carries the risk of drawing fire, but from higher altitudes "it's really hard to tell what's a threat and what isn't," said Sgt. Scott Campbell, a Black Hawk gunner with the Army's 10th Mountain Division at the Kandahar base.

Travel on the ground is also dangerous. Over the last several months, Taliban commanders have boasted that hundreds of would-be suicide bombers are waiting to be sent into action. Afghan and coalition arrest figures seem to bear out the claim; during one recent week, nearly a dozen suspected bombers-in-waiting were detained in and around Kandahar.

As a result, coalition convoys tend to race through the city after dark rather than moving about freely during the day.

Late one moonless night last month, NATO soldiers prepared for a run that would take their armored vehicles through downtown Kandahar and deep into the desert. With the engines rumbling, they listened to a squad commander's grim and detailed litany of attacks that had taken place recently in the area.

"What I'd say is this: Try not to stop," he told them. "Really try not to stop."

Everyone nodded.

U.S.-led Coalition Helicopter Crashes In Southeastern Afghanistan (AP)

AP, February 17, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A U.S.-led coalition helicopter crashed Sunday in southeastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure, a coalition statement said. An official said the helicopter was not shot down.

"It was not enemy fire related," said Col. Tom Collins, spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force. "The pilot was able to radio in that he was having engine problems. We're confident it was not due to enemy action."

It wasn't immediately clear how many people were on board or what type of helicopter it was. The coalition has launched a search and rescue operation for the helicopter and its occupants, said U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta.

"For the safety of the people on board, we will not release the number of people on board until rescue operations are complete," Accetta said. "Rescue operations are underway."

Accetta also declined to give details about the model of the helicopter and the exact location of the crash.

The mountainous region of southeastern Afghanistan is under the command of U.S.-led forces.

Helicopter Crashes In Afghanistan (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

The US-led coalition has said one of its helicopters has crashed in south-eastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure.

The helicopter is reported to be an American Chinook, but the coalition did not give any more details.

An operation has been mounted to locate and rescue the helicopter's occupants.

Coalition and Nato forces have lost several helicopters in Afghanistan in the last few years but only one is thought to have been shot down.

Taleban claim

DOJ_NMG_0133305

"It was not enemy fire related," Col Tom Collins, of Nato's International Security Assistance Force (Isaf), was quoted by the Associated Press news agency as saying.

The Chinook is regularly used as a troop carrier in Afghanistan

"The pilot was able to radio in that he was having engine problems. We're confident it was not due to enemy action."

The helicopter crashed in the Shah Joy district of Zabul province. The province borders Pakistan and has been the scene of Taleban activity recently.

A Taleban spokesman said the helicopter had been shot down, but the BBC's Alastair Leithead in Kabul says they frequently make similar claims that are unfounded.

There is no indication as to whether the helicopter was on a military mission.

Our correspondent says the helicopter was based in Bagram airbase, near Kabul, where the weather has been poor.

But he said the weather further south in Zabul has been clearer.

Nato and coalition forces in Afghanistan are bracing for an expected spring offensive from regrouping Taleban fighters.

NATO Troops Mistakenly Kill Afghan Man (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

NATO-led forces in southern Afghanistan shot to death an Afghan civilian mistaken for a suicide bomber because of twine and straps protruding from his jacket, the alliance said Sunday.

The man was crossing a road Saturday about seven miles west of Kandahar and appeared to be approaching a NATO convoy, said a statement from NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

"He appeared to be chanting and refused to heed warnings to stop," a NATO statement said. "As he continued his approach, members of the convoy noted what appeared to be a device with wires protruding from it on his chest."

The man failed to stop after the troops fired two warning shots, said Capt. Andre Salloum, an ISAF spokesman in Kandahar. They then shot him.

The troops searched the man and found that "he had twine, straps and other materials protruding from his jacket, which resembled wires, but there were no explosives," the statement said.

It was the second such civilian shooting Saturday in Kandahar.

NATO-led troops shot to death another Afghan man on Saturday as he ran between vehicles of a military convoy stopped near Kandahar's military airfield. The troops fired upon him after he failed to heed warning shots.

President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly called on U.S. and NATO-led troops to exercise extreme caution to prevent civilian casualties. Dozens of civilian deaths during operations by foreign troops have undermined his authority among Afghans.

Coalition Copter Crashes In Afghanistan; Search Launched (CNN)

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- A coalition helicopter went down in southeastern Afghanistan early Sunday after reporting an engine failure, according to a statement issued by the coalition headquarters in Bagram.

A search-and-rescue operation for the helicopter and its occupants was launched. "An investigation will be conducted into the cause of the incident," the statement said.

No further information was immediately available.

Also Saturday, NATO troops in southern Afghanistan shot and killed a man they mistakenly thought was a suicide bomber, according to NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

The incident occurred near Kandahar Airfield, in Kandahar province, and involved ISAF personnel.

ISAF said a man had been running "between the vehicles of a stopped convoy."

ISAF troops "believing he might be a suicide bomber, attempted to stop him. A gunner on one of the vehicles flashed a light at the individual after he kept moving toward the convoy, then fired warning shots. When the individual failed to stop, ISAF forces fired upon him."

They later determined the man -- who died at a medical facility at Kandahar Airfield -- was not carrying explosives.

"ISAF deeply regrets this loss of life" ISAF spokesperson Lt. Col. Angela Billings said in the statement.

"ISAF forces attempted to warn the individual away from the convoy, but he did not respond. Local nationals are encouraged to keep clear of all convoys, whether they are moving or stopped, to avoid further incidents," the statement said.

On Thursday, President Bush warned that U.S. and NATO forces can expect a heating up of the Taliban offensive as the snow melts in the mountains of eastern Afghanistan.

In comments to the American Enterprise Institute, Bush said "fierce fighting" will continue in the Afghan-Pakistani frontier region, but he vowed that international forces are ready.

"Taliban and al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks," Bush said. "Our strategy is not to be on the defensive but to go on the offense. This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan and it's going to be a NATO offensive, and that's part of our strategy."

Bush described the resurgence of Taliban and their attacks in 2006 as the "most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country."

The Afghan Crucible (LAT)

'LAST YEAR, THE NUMBER of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold." That's not a quote from one of the president's critics about Iraq — it's from the president himself, and he was talking about Afghanistan.

It's not quite fair to call Afghanistan the war the administration forgot. But it was heartening last week to hear President Bush give a speech about that other war for the first time in his second term, to acknowledge the growing Taliban threat and to call for a renewed U.S. and NATO commitment. Still, military power alone won't make Afghanistan secure — the country must also undergo substantial economic development.

Congress should approve Bush's request for $11.8 billion for the next two years of operations in Afghanistan, but this will not suffice. Without a plan to jump-start reconstruction — and convince the Afghan people that the civil society the West wants to build for them is not just obtainable but worth fighting for — all could be lost.

The old saw that there are no military solutions to political conflicts was never more true than in Afghanistan. Yet, in the five years since U.S. forces toppled the Taliban government with a "light footprint," the Bush administration has never spent enough on reconstruction, opium-crop substitution payments for farmers, road building, education, healthcare or jobs programs — or enough on security to make sure the rebuilding succeeds.

Bush will not get the full support and cooperation of NATO allies until he demonstrates that reconstruction is not a second priority to fighting Al Qaeda. There are serious differences with Germany, which has sent thousands of troops and spent millions in Afghanistan, commanded NATO forces and been responsible for security in the country's north, where Berlin believes its style of nation-building has been notably successful. The government of Angela Merkel has signaled it believes that Washington is relying too heavily on military solutions.

The war effort cannot be allowed to falter over an "Americans are from Mars, Europeans are from Venus" cultural divide on whether to emphasize military commitment or nation-building. Both approaches are necessary.

NATO needs to bear its share of the burden, contributing troops to the fight in the south and continuing to lift conditions on their deployment. And Washington, however distracted by its Iraqi adventure, cannot shortchange the effort to rebuild the nation whose failure led directly to 9/11. The possibility that democracy could fail in Afghanistan is awful to contemplate.

Shooting Pain (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

If you're worried about terrorism, upset about the war in Iraq, and depressed by global chaos, violence and death, cheer up. The U.S. military just invented a weapon that fires a beam of searing pain.

Three weeks ago, it was tested on volunteers at an Air Force base in Georgia. You can watch the video on a military Web site (http://https://www.jnlwp.com/ActiveDenialSystem.asp). Three colonels get zapped, along with an Associated Press reporter. The beam is invisible, but its effects are vivid. Two dozen airmen scatter. The AP guy shrieks and bolts out of the target zone. He says it felt like heat all over his body, as though his jacket were on fire.

The feeling is an illusion. No one is harmed. The beam's energy waves penetrate just 1/64 of an inch into your body, heating your skin like microwaves. They inflame your nerve endings without burning you. This could be the future of warfare: less bloodshed, more pain.

Military technology has always sought a greater precision from a longer range. In the Persian Gulf War, Kosovo and Afghanistan, we exploited the increasing accuracy of laser-guided bombs. In the post-9/11 terrorist hunt and the occupation of Iraq, we've sent hundreds of remotely piloted aerial drones to spy and kill. But the lives protected by drones are ours. The pain beam is more ambitious: It can spare civilians and even the enemy. Precision isn't just the ability to kill. Sometimes, it's the ability to disperse and deter without killing.

That kind of precision is becoming more important. Twelve years ago, the Defense Department observed that our armed forces were increasingly being used for peacekeeping, humanitarian aid and protection of civil society. More of our enemies were blending in with, or disguising themselves as, civilians. Through the media, more eyeballs, hearts and minds could see the infrastructure we destroyed. DOD proposed the development of weapons "to incapacitate personnel or materiel, while minimizing fatalities, permanent injury to personnel, and undesired damage to property and the environment."

Like lethal weapons, nonlethal weapons have evolved from short to long range. Batons and pepper spray required hand-to-hand combat. Water cannons, rubber bullets, beanbag rounds and stingball grenades have extended our reach, but not far enough to keep troops clear of rocks or small-arms fire. Some of those nonlethal weapons are insufficiently discriminate. Tear gas torments a whole crowd, not just the miscreants using the crowd for cover.

Projectiles are also unpredictable. At long range, particularly in crosswinds, rubber bullets can hit the wrong people, or the right people in the wrong places. At close range, they can kill. Look at the absurdly named "FN303 less lethal launcher." It's supposed to fire "nonlethal projectiles at established nonlethal ranges." But when launching things, less lethal is the best you can do.

That's where the pain beam comes in. Unlike projectiles, beams are "directed energy." They travel in a straight line over long distances, ignoring gravity and wind. They cause no more damage at 10 feet than at 1,000. Unlike gas, they discriminate. Raytheon, the pain beam's manufacturer, points out that the weapon "allows precise targeting of specific individuals" and that the pain "ceases immediately" when the beam is diverted or the target flees.

The shift from hardware to software, from matter to energy, can do more than control the unpredictability of weapons. It can control the unpredictability of the people who fire them. Early nonlethal devices, such as rubber bullets and Mace, often caused injuries because of abuse by hotheads. When the pain beam was being developed, somebody accidentally fired it on a high setting, inflicting a second-degree burn. The designers responded by programming limits on the beam's power and duration.

Years of work have gone into making the beam safe. It has been tested thousands of times on 600 volunteers. It has been reviewed and revised by the military's Human Effects Review Board, a Human Effects Advisory Panel made up of nonmilitary experts in the field and military surgeons general. It has been tested for effects on skin cancer, fertility, jewelry and drunks. The results have been published in peer-reviewed journals. Never has an organization that is licensed to kill jumped through so many hoops to make sure nobody gets injured.

The DOD's nonlethal weapons program is a pacifist's dream. Its "vehicle lightweight arresting devices" are built to stop cars with minimal damage, allowing minor injuries only if you're "not wearing a seat belt." Its "acoustic hailing devices" are engineered to deliver sound waves "below Occupational Safety and Health Administration hearing limits for prolonged exposure." Its founding directive pledges to avoid environmental damage. Even the Less Lethal Launcher projectiles are "nontoxic."

But the ability to inflict pain without injury doesn't just make injury less necessary. It makes pain more essential to military operations -- and easier to inflict. To achieve the desired "repel effect," I have to make you suffer. Knowing that your agony will be brief and leave no physical damage makes the weapon easier to fire. It's almost as though, like the flames the AP reporter imagined were engulfing his jacket, your pain isn't real.

That's the metaphysical gap that nonlethal energy weapons exploit. The rain of pain falls mainly in the brain. The long-range acoustic device, for instance, "can target narrow sound beams at excruciating decibel levels, but below the threshold of hearing damage," according to a military account of a presentation by its project manager. Four months ago, Congress passed and President Bush signed legislation to prosecute torture, defined as intentional infliction of "serious physical or mental pain or suffering." But that rule applies only in captivity. On the street, pain administration won't be a crime. It'll be a policy.

Two weeks from now, military leaders will convene in London to discuss the pain beam and the next generation of directed-energy weapons, including microwaves and lasers. Law enforcement agencies are interested. Raytheon is already advertising the technology for commercial applications. The military is even developing a "personnel halting and stimulation response" system -- yes, a PHaSR -- to stun targets instead of killing them. But don't worry, nobody will get hurt. Sort of.

DOJ:

6 Of 7 Dismissed U.S. Attorneys Had Positive Job Evaluations (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

All but one of the U.S. attorneys recently fired by the Justice Department had positive job reviews before they were dismissed, but many ran into political trouble with Washington over issues ranging from immigration to the death penalty, according to prosecutors, congressional aides and others familiar with the cases.

Two months after the firings first began to make waves on Capitol Hill, it has also become clear that most of the prosecutors were overseeing significant public-corruption investigations at the time they were asked to leave. Four of the probes target Republican politicians or their supporters, prosecutors and other officials said.

The emerging details stand in contrast to repeated statements from the Justice Department that six of the Republican-appointed prosecutors were dismissed because of poor performance. In one of the most prominent examples, agency officials pointed to widely known management and morale problems surrounding then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in San Francisco.

But the assertions enraged the rest of the group, some of whom feel betrayed after staying silent about the way they have been shoved from office.

Bud Cummins, the former U.S. attorney in Little Rock, who was asked to resign earlier than the others to make way for a former White House aide, said Justice Department officials crossed a line by publicly criticizing the performance of his well-regarded colleagues.

"They're entitled to make these changes for any reason or no reason or even for an idiotic reason," Cummins said. "But if they are trying to suggest that people have inferior performance to hide whatever their true agenda is, that is wrong. They should retract those statements."

The decision by Cummins and some of the others to speak out underscores the extent to which the firings have spiraled out of the Justice Department's control. Officials initially sought to obscure the firings even from some senators, and have since issued confusing signals and contradictory information about the episode.

For example, one source who was familiar with the episode said last week that an eighth U.S. attorney was asked to resign in December along with the others. The unidentified prosecutor is negotiating to stay in the job, said the source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of those discussions.

The end result is an unusual spectacle in which Democratic lawmakers are bemoaning the firings of Republican-appointed prosecutors. The political pressure has become so great that Cummins's successor in Arkansas, former White House aide J. Timothy Griffin, announced on Friday that he had decided not to submit his name to the Senate for a permanent appointment.

Lawmakers from both parties are pushing to strip Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales of his power to name replacement U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period, although Republicans blocked that proposal in the Senate last week. The House Judiciary Committee is planning hearings on similar legislation in March.

"I don't know how they could have mishandled this any worse," said one of the fired U.S. prosecutors, who declined to be quoted by name because he feared repercussions.

"There always have traditionally been tensions between main Justice and U.S. attorneys in the districts," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "But it does seem like there's an effort to centralize authority in Washington more than there has been in the past and in prior administrations."

Most of the firings came on Dec. 7, when senior Justice Department official Michael A. Battle -- a former U.S. attorney himself -- called at least six prosecutors to inform them that they were being asked to resign. Battle was apologetic but offered little in the way of explanations, telling some that the order had come from "on high," according to sources familiar with the calls.

In addition to Ryan in San Francisco, the prosecutors who were called that day included Carol S. Lam in San Diego, John McKay in Seattle, David C. Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona. Cummins had been informed of his dismissal last summer but stayed until December.

The breaking point for Cummins and the others was testimony this month by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest had been dismissed for "performance-related" reasons and that Cummins had been pushed out to make room for Griffin.

That testimony "was the moment the gloves came off," said one fired prosecutor who declined to be identified.

Five of the dismissed prosecutors -- Bogden, Charlton, Cummins, Iglesias and McKay -- told reporters that they were not given any reason for their firings and had not been told of any performance problems. Only one of the fired prosecutors, Ryan in San Francisco, faced substantive complaints about turnover or other management-related issues, officials said.

Justice Department officials in recent days have sought to clarify the performance comments, saying the dispute is mired in "semantics." The officials said McNulty was referring to policy differences between the Bush administration and some of its employees. One official also said that the department had not made a list of replacements ahead of time.

"When you are setting national policy, you cannot have U.S. attorneys setting their own policies," said a Justice Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Bogden and Lam are among a handful of declared independents who worked as U.S. attorneys in the Bush administration. The rest of the group are viewed as moderate Republicans who have sometimes been at odds with their Washington bosses or more conservative Republicans.

In Seattle, for example, local Republicans complained to Gonzales about McKay's decision not to intervene in the disputed Washington gubernatorial race in 2006, which a Democrat eventually won by 129 votes.

Lam was the target of repeated complaints from conservative House Republicans, who asserted that she was lax in enforcing immigration laws. The Justice Department also points to drops in the number of firearms cases filed by her office.

Charlton in Arizona clashed with the Justice Department's headquarters on at least two occasions over murder cases in which he opposed seeking the death penalty, including one that prompted an outcry from Navajo groups opposed to the use of capital punishment. He was overruled in both cases, officials said.

"There was no public controversy about any of these; any controversy was within the Justice Department," said J. Grant Woods, a Republican and former Arizona attorney general.

But the cases that have gotten most of the attention among Democrats in Congress involve public-corruption investigations. In San Diego, Lam oversaw the probe that resulted in the guilty plea of then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican. Two others connected to that case, including a former senior CIA official, were indicted two days before Lam left the job on Thursday.

Bogden in Nevada and Charlton in Arizona were also in the midst of investigations targeting current or former Republican members of Congress when they were fired. And in New Mexico, Iglesias's office had been examining alleged wrongdoing involving state Democrats.

Gonzales, McNulty and other Justice Department officials have strongly denied that those investigations played a role in the dismissals.

"The department's commitment to pursuing prosecuting public-corruption cases is clear," said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. "Any suggestion that removal of these particular U.S. attorneys was political or in any way would harm ongoing investigations is 100 percent false."

Ark. U.S. Attorney Appointee Won't Seek Senate Confirmation (AP)

By Jon Gambrell, Associated Press

AP, February 18, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. – An interim U.S. attorney says a “partisan circus” over his recess appointment makes it impossible for him to receive fair consideration, and he will not seek Senate confirmation to his Arkansas district.

However, Tim Griffin can remain at the post without confirmation under a new provision in the Patriot Act that allow recess appointments to last until the end of a president's term, instead of 120 days. That provision was included in the act's reauthorization last year.

The new rules became fuel for hearings when the Democratic-controlled Congress took power this year, with Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., questioning Griffin's appointment.

“They should do the right thing and name another interim appointment,” said Michael Teague, a spokesman for Pryor. “Let's get back to the way the founding fathers saw this process working.”

Griffin left open whether he would remain in the position until the end of President Bush's term, but he said he has not looked for another job.

“The upside is I'm here in the job and will remain in the job until such time the White House asks me to move on,” Griffin said Friday.

Griffin, 38, is a former military lawyer who worked in the White House under Karl Rove as a special assistant to the president. He replaced former U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins in a December recess appointment.

White House officials did not immediately comment on Griffin's decision. In a statement, Department of Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was “disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation.”

“We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed,” Talamona said.

Senators continue to debate a bill that would change the provision of the Patriot Act that allows the indefinite appointments and return to the 120-day deadline for legislative approval.

Politicizing Justice (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, February 18, 2007

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty just couldn't tell a lie. So when pressed during Senate hearings on the unceremonious firing of seven U.S. attorneys, Mr. McNulty had to concede that politics did play a role in dumping the chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark. The replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, was an FOK - friend of Karl. That's Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser and key Republican strategist.

You can't get any more political than that.

With Arkansas Sen. Mark Pryor raising serious questions about the appointment, Mr. Griffin wisely withdrew his name for permanent consideration.

Mr. McNulty and his boss at the Justice Department, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, should stop conning the American people. Their explanation for the firings - that they were "performance-related" - is pure poppycock. Congress should move swiftly to repeal an aspect of the Patriot Act that gives the attorney general the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period of time, which could result in someone serving in this powerful post without congressional consent. Mr. Gonzales doesn't deserve this power.

His recent firings show what matters to Mr. Gonzales, and it isn't performance:

Consider the dismissal of the U.S. attorney in San Diego, Carol S. Lam. She successfully prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican, for influence peddling.

Then there's John McKay, U.S. attorney in Seattle. He had received a glowing report from Justice Department auditors last year, and a follow-up letter from a Justice official congratulating him on the good work. That same official called him in December, and without explanation told him his time in office was over. The chief judge of the federal court there took the unusual step of speaking out in defense of Mr. McKay, calling him "absolutely superb."

And there was the U.S. attorney in Nevada, Daniel G. Bogden, who, in comments to the Las Vegas Review-Journal, said he was given no indication his performance was a problem.

U.S. attorneys have enormous power. By politicizing the appointments, the Bush administration has diminished their ability to fairly and judiciously carry out their responsibility.

A New Crimefighter In Town (STPPP)

By Ellen Tomson

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 18, 2007

Rachel Paulose is a U.S. attorney who is comfortable quoting Bible verses. She believes it is a blessing to live in a country where a person can take on crime, terror and corruption.

The daughter of immigrants who support her every move, she works herself hard, shorts herself on sleep and sacrifices her social life in the pursuit of justice.

Meeting her for the first time, you might not detect her underlying strengths. She easily disarms you.

Glimpsed down a hallway at the federal courthouse in Minneapolis, she's a slight, 5-foot-6-inch figure who moves gracefully from an open office doorway. She's wearing her dark hair long down her back. She's smiling as she offers a greeting and a handshake.

"The greatest reward is seeing the impact we have on people's lives," she says. That's the kind of statement that normally prompts eye rolls. But Paulose's intensity sidetracks questions about her sincerity.

At 33, she's the youngest current U.S. attorney and the first woman to serve in the position in Minnesota.

She manages some 50 assistant U.S. attorneys in an office that examines and seeks to successfully prosecute the most repulsive and harmful of crimes.

She points with pride to the more-than-20-year prison sentences obtained by her office in three child pornography cases during the past six months and then, referring to predators as yet uncaught, she promises: "We're going to find you, hold you, and you're going to do a long time in federal prison."

"The crimes have become more depraved, more heinous, and the victims are subjected to particularly sadistic forms of abuse that the general public would find unimaginable," she says. "The reality is that good people don't know about this because they're not online looking."

'THIS COUNTRY IS A GIFT TO THE WORLD'

PPaulose (pronounced "Paul-us") was 8 when she asked for a Time magazine subscription for her next birthday. She was in elementary school when she organized her first political rally.

Her mother recalls, "She was always interested in understanding what was going on around her — and wanted to make a difference.

"She's very strong in what she believes in, whether it is moral values, spiritual values or effects on society," Lucy Paulose says.

Rachel Paulose's family background and faith are keys to understanding her patriotism and the passion she brings to her work.

"I have a great appreciation of how special this country is," she says. "I believe this country is a gift to the world."

Her grandfather, a government official in India, came to the United States to study theology in the 1960s.

"I have a hard time talking about this without becoming emotional," Paulose says, her eyes suddenly welling with tears. Her family, she explains, "came here hoping for the American dream at a time when the Communists were basically sweeping across Southeast Asia."

Her last name is Greek and derives from a branch of her ancestry that included a Greek Orthodox bishop. Her first name and middle name, Kunjummen, are drawn from the Semitic origins of ancestors from the Middle East. But her family converted to Christianity, most likely in the first century after St. Thomas is said to have traveled to India. She and her family currently attend Plymouth Bible Chapel.

Paulose's grandparents Daniel and Sara Kunjummen have lived in Bloomington for 40 years, but she grew up in Findlay, Ohio, a 30-minute drive from Toledo. Paulose graduated from high school a year early, and the family moved to Minnesota after her mother received job offers here and Paulose was accepted to the University of Minnesota.

Paulose's father, Joseph, is a Hopkins school district administrator and former economics professor in India. Her mother owns Home Electronic Specialists in Hudson, Wis.

They raised Rachel and her younger sister, Elizabeth Schulte, with the idea "you have to have a passion for what you do and should make a difference," says Lucy Paulose. "Enjoy the journey, but make this a better place."

Paulose's parents, as well as an extended family of more than 100 relatives who have settled in the United States, have always provided a tight network of support.

While in high school, Paulose was selected for the American Legion-sponsored Girls State and elected governor in the mock government and citizenship program. She recalls her parents' patience when she changed her mind three times about what she wanted to wear after she was elected Girls State "governor." They drove home to retrieve each outfit.

Throughout high school, college and even while preparing for the bar exam, Paulose's parents stayed up late with her while she studied, providing help, snacks and hot chocolate. After Paulose was accepted to both Harvard and Yale law schools, an uncle accompanied her on a trip to New England to help her decide between the two. When Paulose moved briefly to Washington to work for the Justice Department, another uncle helped her find a place to live and helped her move in. And Paulose's grandfather, who was disappointed when she chose law over medicine after three years as a pre-med student, nevertheless indicated his pride in her by providing her registration fee for law school.

Many family members were present at her Yale Law School commencement to see Paulose, chosen as the law school's representative, carry a banner in the procession.

"So many people in my family had invested in me," she says. "It was the culmination of years and years of hard work by all of us."

'ETHICAL IN EVERYTHING SHE DOES'

IIn just 10 years, Paulose has compiled an impressive record. After graduating from Yale Law School, she snagged a sought-after position in Minneapolis as a law clerk to James Loken, chief judge of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. She worked for four years in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm and served in the U.S. Justice Department as an Attorney General's Honors Program trial attorney for the civil rights division.

She also prosecuted criminal and civil cases as an assistant U.S. attorney for Minnesota; served as senior counsel to Acting Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, and as the Justice Department's special counsel for health care fraud.

Nevertheless, her appointment a year ago as U.S. attorney for the District of Minnesota was headline news and raised a few eyebrows.

The appointment departed from normal practice. For the first time in decades, an interim U.S. attorney was sent directly from the Department of Justice to fill the job in Minnesota. Traditionally, interim appointees have come from within the Minnesota office, promoted either from first assistant U.S. attorney or chief of the criminal division.

"There were plenty of women who wanted that job — and plenty of men, too," says A.M. "Sandy" Keith, former chief justice of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

Keith and others who know Paulose describe her as well qualified for her job, which includes taking on corrupt public officials and law enforcement officers — "policing the police," as Paulose describes it.

Hank Shea, a fellow at the University of St. Thomas Law School's Holloran Center for Ethical Leadership in the Professions, worked with Paulose from 1999 to 2002. The fact that she began working in the U.S. attorney's office as a law student and now leads the office, he says, "shows a real commitment to public service on her part."

"Her integrity is unbelievably high, and she is ethical in everything she does. For the top federal attorney in a state, there are no more important qualities than those."

Paulose works 10 to 12 hours a day, six days a week, and forces herself to leave her office no later than 8 p.m. on some days by scheduling workouts. She's serious in every endeavor she undertakes, including exercise. Kickboxing and karate are her favorite sports.

"I've had my share of injuries," she says during a recent interview in a corner conference room at her office. In fact, her injuries have been numerous, including a concussion and broken collarbone.

She grins as she extends one foot to show the location of a scar and a swollen ankle.

She's normally media shy, prefers press releases to interviews and is particular about how she is portrayed. She refused to have her picture taken in a non-work venue, for example.

"I'm wearing a suit, and I'm going to be in my office," she stated firmly. Her suggestion for the background of the photo? The American flag.

'A FAST LEARNER'

PPaulose graduated summa cum laude from the University of Minnesota, where she was a member of Phi Beta Kappa and a Truman Scholar.

Keith met her while she served as a student representative on the university's Board of Regents. Even then, Paulose was a newsmaker, objecting to proposed tuition increases, which she argued would deny poor students access to the university.

Keith, a Yale Law School graduate, became her mentor. He is executive director of the Rochester Downtown Alliance and displays her photo in his office.

After law school, Paulose clerked for Loken from 1997 to 1998. Loken, a Harvard Law School graduate and former longtime partner at Faegre & Benson, receives about 300 applicants for the three clerk positions he offers each year.

"I look for academic superstardom, undergraduate years as well as law school, first and foremost, because that's the most likely guarantor of someone who can do the incredibly difficult analytical work required," says the judge, who assigns his clerks separate cases. He estimates he judges 600 to 800 cases a year, writing 50 to 60 opinions to be published in law books, in addition to writing shorter orders and papers not requiring published opinions.

Because the work is intense and his office is small — just himself, a secretary and the three clerks — he says, "I also look for people who would be fun to spend a year with." Paulose's interview was "delightful and her zeal pretty apparent," he recalls.

Paulose is his "first former clerk to be confirmed by the (U.S.) Senate for anything," Loken notes. She is also likely the only one working as a prosecutor. Most former clerks are in private practice.

"She's come a long way very, very rapidly, and the reason is she's very, very competent and can do the job, obviously," Keith says. "She's tough, a fast learner, very hard working, disciplined, focused and is very, very skilled."

She is also adept at figuring out how an office or organization functions, how to get to know the right people in the right places and what she needs to learn to move up, he says.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appointed Paulose as Minnesota's acting U.S. attorney a year ago. She replaced Thomas Heffelfinger, whom she had worked under previously.

Gonzales has fired some top federal prosecutors, replacing them with attorneys regarded as more conservative and, some critics say, less likely to buck Washington. Some current and former prosecutors allege the changes are an attempt by the Bush administration to curb prosecutors' independence.

The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process, and while Paulose's name is sometimes mentioned in the context of the recent firing and hiring controversy, the circumstances of her appointment and confirmation were different.

Heffelfinger, her predecessor, was expected to continue in the job but surprised the Justice Department when he announced his resignation.

"I left for personal and financial reasons and delayed announcing my departure until the last minute to avoid being a lame duck," Heffelfinger says.

Unlike other new appointees named by Gonzales last March, Paulose was named to her position in mid-February, following Heffelfinger's announcement. And, unlike some other appointees, she was confirmed by the U.S. Senate (in December). Her investiture ceremony is set for next month.

'A SENSE OF MISSION'

TThe six priorities of her office include terrorism, violent crime, drug trafficking, cybercrime, government and corporate corruption, and civil rights, especially as they relate to human trafficking and housing discrimination.

Her job is a vantage point for Minnesota's worst problems and also involves anticipating worst-case scenarios. As she refers to two high-profile cases charging terrorism, for example, she notes the state's "points of vulnerability," which include a portion of the longest unarmed border in the world, a trucking industry that is among the most active in the country and an inland harbor that is one of the largest in the world.

Ordinary citizens sometimes need to be educated about crime that they may not notice but is taking its societal toll nevertheless. Several months ago, she co-wrote an editorial in an effort to make people more aware of the negative effects of methamphetamine, "the Number 1 narcotics threat in Minnesota." The manufacture and use of the drug harms not just users, she says, but also families and children because people are making it in their garages and homes.

She also wants people to know that human trafficking, a form of modern slavery for sex and labor, is more relevant to Minnesota than most of us realize. Recent immigrant populations, particularly Hmong and Somali, are especially vulnerable. Her office recently indicted one case and is investigating several others in an effort to shut down and deter smuggling rings of human traffickers.

In one case, a professional couple held someone from a developing country as a worker, against the person's will, and paid the person nothing. In other instances, young women are held as sexual slaves and "tortured or threatened to prevent them from escaping," she says.

Paulose refers to her job in the public sector, which is a lot less lucrative than many of the private practice jobs held by her peers, as "a privilege" and "an opportunity to serve." She especially thrives, she says, when she works with others who also "have a sense of mission."

As an appointee with Republican ties, she could be replaced when President Bush leaves office. So, what might be next for Paulose? Politics?

"No!" she says. But she would love to stay in public service and in Minnesota.

"When I keep my focus on those things, good opportunities appear."

CRIMINAL LAW:

'McMissile' Moment Lands Mom In Jail (WP)

By Theresa Vargas, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Driver Gets Felony Conviction For Tossing Cup of Ice Into Car

To the locals, it's the "McMissile" case.

And like the name, the details of it spill forth like a bad joke: A woman is driving north on Interstate 95. Three kids squirm in the back seat, and her sister, six months pregnant and having early contractions, sits in the front. The stress starts to simmer. Traffic slows, then crawls, then creeps. More stress. A car cuts in front of her, then scoots away. A short time later, it darts in again. She can no longer take it. She veers onto the shoulder and speeds up. Wham! She tosses a large McDonald's cup filled with ice into the other car.

"From my side, I heard a whoomp," recalled the woman's sister, LaJeanna Porter, 27. "I was like, 'I know you didn't throw that cup.' She said, 'Yes I did.' "

Neither woman foresaw the seemingly supersize repercussions of that misguided moment July 2.

No one was injured, but the cup launcher, Jessica Hall, 25, of Jacksonville, N.C., was charged and convicted by a Stafford County jury of maliciously throwing a missile into an occupied vehicle, a felony in Virginia. The instructions given to the jury said that "any physical object can be considered a missile. A missile can be propelled by any force, including throwing."

Hall, a mother of three young children whose husband is serving his third tour in Iraq, has spent more than a month in jail.

The jury sentenced her to two years in prison, the minimum, and a judge will formally impose a sentence Wednesday. Under state law, the judge can only decrease the jury's sentence.

"We didn't think it would go this far," Hall said in an interview at the Rappahannock Regional Jail. "Two years! What did I do?"

DOJ_NMG_0133314

There are two versions of what happened that day. The occupants of both cars agree on this: It was hot, the kind of hot in which legs stick to leather seats, and the traffic was barely moving, slowed by a fatal crash up the road in Prince William County.

In one car, driver Pete Ballin, 36, and girlfriend Eliza Fowle, 28, were heading home to the District after visiting her father in North Carolina. They said they were maneuvering through the stalled traffic, not even noticing Hall until the Mickey-D moment.

"I guess we inadvertently merged back in front of her," Fowle said. "She apparently took that as some sort of aggressive maneuver on our part."

The next thing they knew, Fowle said, Hall was pulling up in the emergency lane and "chucking a big, supersized McDonald's cup at us." It flew diagonally across Ballin and onto Fowle. "It was gross and sticky and got all over me and the front of our car, the dashboard and the windshield," Fowle said.

Hall, whose family was driving from North Carolina to New York for a family party, saw the situation differently. She said she had never driven that route and was trying to keep up with her father's truck when Ballin cut in front of her the second time, causing her to swerve onto the shoulder. She said she was worried because her sister's bulging belly almost slammed into the dashboard.

Hall's next move was wrong, she said, but she felt provoked.

"It was past me ignoring him. I'm not going to lie; I was cursing him," she said. "I took the McDonald's cup. I tossed it over my car."

She never fathomed that it would land her in jail for the first time in her life, wearing a standard-issue jumpsuit frayed up both legs and learning to curl her hair using toilet paper. Not even when she saw Ballin talking to the state trooper up the highway, or when she was arrested and released on her own recognizance, or even when a trial date was set for Jan. 3.

Even when Ballin testified, Hall said, "I'm thinking about what I'm going to cook when I get home."

"I passed out when they said guilty, two years," she added. "I became a convicted felon."

Fowle stands by the couple's decision to report the crime but concedes that even she and Ballin were surprised at the conviction.

"I think that this is way too much of a punishment for her actions. This is just to me absolutely ridiculous," Fowle said. Community service would have made more sense, she said. "It's something that's going to make someone realize I did screw up, and I'm going to remember this, and I'm not going to do something like this again."

Hall's attorney, public defender Terence Patton, did not return calls for comment. Nor did Commonwealth's Attorney Daniel M. Chichester or Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney George Elsasser, who handled the case.

Elsasser argued in court that had Ballin been hit by the drink, he might have gotten into a serious accident with injuries. Hall also was found guilty of reckless driving, assault against Ballin and assault and battery against Fowle. For her conviction on those charges, the jury recommended she be fined $1,000.

According to court documents, Hall is unemployed and, with her husband's salary, the couple takes in $30,384 a year. She receives $388 a month in food stamps.

"It doesn't seem right for her not to be around," said Porter, who is watching one of Hall's three children, ages 4, 6 and 8. The younger two are with their grandparents. "We just hope that whatever they do, don't let them keep her. Without her, I don't know what I'll do."

Hall said she has cried every day she has spent locked up and wakes most days to find clumps of hair on her pillow from the stress. She shares a cell with two other women and spends 19 hours a day in the cell, she said.

When Hall talks about the incident, she sometimes jokes about how she will only fly over Virginia from now on and says other inmates sometimes throw things in her direction and say, "Watch out McMissile."

But in other moments, when she talks about the reality of a felony conviction, her expression goes blank. She was supposed to start nursing school the day after she was sent to jail, and she wonders what job she will be able to get once potential employers do a background check.

"Now people are going to see me as an angry, road rage, convicted felon. And it really upsets me," she said. "I must have been wrong . . . but seriously, God. Lesson learned. Lesson learned is one hour in this place."

Hornsby Indictments Revive Questions Of His Time As Yonkers Schools Chief (NYJN)

By David Mckay Wilson, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, February 18, 2007

Former schools chief Andre Hornsby burst on the scene in Yonkers nine years ago with a cadre of Texas educators, fresh from helping transform the Houston school system. He came east to boost test scores and bridge the digital divide in city schools.

DOJ_NMG_0133315

With the aid of Cynthia Joffrion, the Texas technology maven who joined him in Yonkers, new computers flooded into classrooms while Hornsby's leadership helped raise test scores. Throughout his stormy 23-month tenure, however, Hornsby was dogged with questions about his dealings with technology vendors.

It turns out that Joffrion, assistant superintendent for technology support services under Hornsby, was among his accusers, according to an FBI affidavit obtained by The Journal News. Joffrion in 1999 told authorities that Hornsby had ordered Yonkers employees to send new computers to his relatives. But then-Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's investigation of those allegations never led to charges after Hornsby caught wind of the probe.

In hindsight, Hornsby's Yonkers troubles seemed to presage what was to come following his hiring in 2003 as chief executive officer of the school system in Prince George's County, Md., the nation's 18th largest district. It borders Washington and has more than 130,000 students and a budget exceeding $1 billion. Hornsby now awaits trial on a 16-count federal indictment arising from a scheme in which prosecutors say he awarded lucrative technology contracts that benefited himself and close associates.

One of the case's key witnesses appears to be none other than Joffrion, who cooperated in Pirro's investigation as well as the FBI inquiry that led to Hornsby's downfall, according to documents and interviews.

Hornsby stepped down from his $250,000-a-year post in 2006 just before his indictment.

"What a travesty," said former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, who backed Hornsby's hiring in 1998 but then urged his firing less than two years later. "We got rid of him, then he goes to Prince George's, he rips those people off, and they finally catch him. They should have caught him here."

Joffrion, who played a central role in the Westchester and Maryland probes, left Yonkers in June 2000, two weeks after Hornsby was fired. She later worked on technology issues for the Mount Vernon school district before becoming a private consultant. Attempts to reach Joffrion were unsuccessful.

"I think she was in over her head," recalled retired Yonkers teacher Florence McCue, who worked with Joffrion on computer issues. "I think her position was more than she bargained for. But she was the technology person, and she was good at talking."

Details of the aborted Westchester investigation are included in an affidavit from the Maryland case, made by FBI Special Agent John Sheridan in 2005 as he sought a warrant to seize Hornsby's office computers.

The FBI affidavit does not identify Joffrion, but refers to her as a cooperating witness who worked on technology issues with Hornsby in Texas in the late 1990s and joined him as an assistant superintendent in Yonkers in the fall of 1998. Joffrion was hired in Yonkers on Sept. 28, 1998. It also identifies the cooperating witness as the complainant to Yonkers Inspector General Phil Zisman in 1999 regarding a questionable computer deal. Zisman said Joffrion made such a complaint.

Zisman said Joffrion came to his office in 1999 with allegations concerning the school district's deal with both Compaq and Apple computers, in which the manufacturers sold computers in bundles of 10 and provided one or two extra units as an incentive. Joffrion alleged that Hornsby told her to send the extra computers to his relatives, and threatened to fire her when she refused. The computers were sent, according to the FBI affidavit.

"We basically did some preliminary investigation and referred it to the district attorney," Zisman said. "We thought the information was accurate. I think there was criminality. He was not prosecuted. You can ask Mrs. Pirro about that."

During Pirro's investigation, Joffrion recorded about 40 telephone and in-person conversations with Hornsby, according to the affidavit. Before the issuance of search warrants in connection with the computers, Hornsby was informed of the search by a friend and two others whose names are blacked out in the affidavit.

"(They) notified Hornsby so he could dispose of the evidence," the affidavit stated.

Hornsby's attorney, Robert Bonsib, did not return phone or e-mail messages.

Pirro spokesman Michael Edelman said Pirro was unavailable for comment.

Pirro's successor, District Attorney Janet DiFiore, has cooperated with the U.S. Justice Department's investigation of Hornsby, sending material from the Westchester probe, which was conducted by Pirro's Public Integrity Unit, said DiFiore spokesman Lucien Chalfen.

"Not every investigation leads to a prosecution," he said.

Despite her attempt to blow the whistle on Hornsby in Yonkers, Joffrion maintained contact with him. After he was named CEO in Prince George's County in 2003, he awarded a lucrative contract to Erate Managers LLC, a Texas company operated by Joffrion to obtain low-cost technology services under the federal E-rate program.

According to the affidavit, Joffrion agreed to make kickbacks of $144,000 to Hornsby. At the time, she was cooperating with the FBI, and authorities in December 2004 recorded her giving Hornsby $1,000 as her first payment under the contract.

The indictment also charged Hornsby with mail and wire fraud in connection with a kickback scheme with his live-in girlfriend, who worked for the software company LeapFrog Enterprises Inc., which received a $1 million contract from the district. The indictment states his girlfriend split her $20,000 commission with him. She subsequently pleaded guilty to tax evasion.

No trial date has been set as federal prosecutors and Hornsby's legal team fight over whether Bonsib should be allowed to continue representing Hornsby because he may be called as a witness.

As Hornsby prepares his case, Yonkers residents have reflected on Hornsby's controversial tenure.

"People tend to forget what he accomplished here," said former school board Trustee Maria Chiulli. "We have very old schools, and he brought them up to par electricity-wise, and put computers in every classroom. It saddens me when I hear the bad news. It takes away from our success."

But former Trustee Tom Weibrecht said Hornsby's legal problems were not unexpected.

"The fact that he was terminated here says it all," Weibrecht said. "His current problems don't surprise me in the least."

Trial In Error (WP)

By Victoria Toensing

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

If You're Going to Charge Scooter, Then What About These Guys?

Could someone please explain to me why Scooter Libby is the only person on trial in the Valerie Plame leak investigation?

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald charged Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff with perjury on the theory that Libby had a nefarious reason for lying to a grand jury about what he told reporters regarding CIA officer Plame: He was trying to cover up a White House conspiracy to retaliate against Plame's husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson had infuriated Vice President Cheney by accusing the Bush administration of lying about intelligence in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Fitzgerald apparently concluded that a purported cover-up was sufficient motive for Libby to trim his recollections in a criminal way. So when Libby's testimony differed from that of others, it was Libby who got indicted.

There's a reason why responsible prosecutors don't bring perjury cases on mere "he said, he said" evidence. Without an underlying crime or tangible evidence of obstruction (think Martha Stewart trying to destroy phone logs), the trial becomes a mishmash of faulty memories in which witnesses can seem as guilty as the defendant. Any prosecutor knows that memories differ, even vividly, and each party can be convinced that his or her version is the truthful one.

If we accept Fitzgerald's low threshold for bringing a criminal case, then why stop at Libby? This investigation has enough questionable motives and shadowy half-truths and flawed recollections to fill a court docket for months. So here are my own personal bills of indictment:

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES PATRICK J. FITZERALD with ignoring the fact that there was no basis for a criminal investigation from the day he was appointed, with handling some witnesses with kid gloves and banging on others with a mallet, with engaging in past contretemps with certain individuals that might have influenced his pursuit of their liberty, and with misleading the public in a news conference because . . . well, just because. To wit:

Â· On Dec. 30, 2003, the day Fitzgerald was appointed special counsel, he should have known (all he had to do was ask the CIA) that Plame was not covert, knowledge that should have stopped the investigation right there. The law prohibiting disclosure of a covert agent's identity requires that the person have a foreign assignment at the time or have had one within five years of the disclosure, that the government be taking affirmative steps to conceal the government relationship, and for the discloser to have actual knowledge of the covert status.

From FBI interviews conducted after Oct. 1, 2003, Fitzgerald also knew that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had identified Plame as a CIA officer to columnist Robert D. Novak, who first published Plame's name on July 14, 2003.

Â· In January 2001, Libby was the lawyer for millionaire financier Marc Rich, whom President Bill Clinton pardoned shortly before leaving office. Fitzgerald, who was then an assistant U.S. attorney in the southern district of New York, and U.S. Attorney James Comey spearheaded the criminal investigation of that pardon.

Â· Fitzgerald jailed former New York Times reporter Judith Miller for almost 90 days for not providing evidence in a matter that involved no crime. Yet the two were engaged in another dispute: Fitzgerald wanted Miller's phone records, contending that by contacting an Islamic charity, she had alerted it to a government search the day before it happened.

Â· Fitzgerald granted immunity to former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer without ever asking what he would testify to; he permitted NBC News bureau chief Tim Russert to be interviewed in a law firm office with his lawyer present, while Novak was forced to testify before the grand jury without counsel present.

Â· Armitage, like Bush adviser Karl Rove, forgot one conversation with a reporter. Fitzgerald threatened Rove with prosecution; Armitage bragged that he didn't even need a lawyer.

Â· In violating prosecutorial ethics by discussing facts outside the indictment during his Oct. 28, 2005, news conference, Fitzgerald made one factual assertion that turned out to be flat wrong: Libby was not "the first official" to reveal Plame's identity.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE CIA for making a boilerplate criminal referral to cover its derriÃ¨re.

The CIA is well aware of the requirements of the law protecting the identity of covert officers and agents. I know, because in 1982, as chief counsel to the Senate intelligence committee, I negotiated the terms of that legislation between the media and the intelligence community. Even if Plame's status were "classified"--Fitzgerald never introduced one piece of evidence to support such status -- no law would be violated.

There is no better evidence that the CIA was only covering its rear by requesting a Justice Department criminal investigation than the fact that it sent a boiler-plate referral regarding a classified leak and not one addressing the elements of a covert officer's disclosure.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES JOSEPH C. WILSON IV with misleading the public about how he was sent to Niger, about the thrust of his March 2003 oral report of that trip, and about his wife's CIA status, perhaps for the purpose of getting book and movie contracts.

Â· On July 6, 2003, Wilson appeared on "Meet the Press" hours after the New York Times published his op-ed "What I Didn't Find in Africa," which accused the administration of twisting intelligence to exaggerate the Iraq threat. The piece suggested that Wilson had been sent to Niger at the vice president's request to look into foreign intelligence reports of Iraqi efforts to obtain yellowcake uranium. Wilson told Andrea Mitchell, "The office of the vice president, I am absolutely convinced, received a very specific response to the question it asked and that response was based upon my trip there." But Cheney said he had no knowledge of Wilson's trip and was never briefed on his oral report to the CIA.

Â· Wilson has claimed repeatedly -- including on MSNBC's "Countdown" on July 22, 2005 and at the National Press Club on Oct. 31, 2005 -- that he was sent to Niger because of his "specific skill set" and not because of his wife. But Senate intelligence committee documents indicate that Plame suggested his name for the trip, as did a State Department report and a CIA official who briefed the vice president's office.

Â· Although Wilson has repeatedly claimed that neither his trip nor his oral report was classified, the CIA sent documents about the trip marked "classified" to the vice president's office and to date has not released the essence of the oral report. A source later identified as Wilson claimed in a Washington Post article on June 12, 2003, that documents related to an alleged Iraq-Niger uranium deal were forged because "the dates were wrong and the names were wrong." When Senate intelligence committee staff questioned that, as Wilson had never seen the documents, he responded that he may have "misspoken."

Â· Wilson has continually played coy about his wife's status. On July 16, 2003, David Corn wrote in the Nation: "Did senior Bush officials blow the cover of a U.S. intelligence officer working covertly in a field of vital importance to national security -- and break the law -- in order to strike at a Bush administration critic and intimidate others?" Corn acknowledged talking to Wilson but said that Wilson refused to talk about his wife. Yet Corn also published Wilson's rather unsubtle suggestion: "Naming her this way would have compromised every operation, every relationship, every network with which she had been associated in her entire career."

Plame was not covert. She worked at CIA headquarters and had not been stationed abroad within five years of the date of Novak's column.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE MEDIA with hypocrisy in asserting that criminal law was applicable to this "leak" and with misreporting facts to wage a political attack on an increasingly unpopular White House. To wit:

Â· Notwithstanding the fact that major newspapers have highfalutin', well-paid in-house and outside counsel who can find the disclosure law and even interpret it, the following publications called for a criminal investigation:

Â· The Atlanta Journal-Constitution called the appointment of a special independent counsel "absolutely necessary" because the allegations "come perilously close to treason" -- even though treason is a constitutional crime requiring two witnesses and the levying of war against the United States.

Â· The Boston Globe wrote: "This is a case that clearly calls for the appointment of an independent counsel."

Â· The New York Times naively approved the investigation if it "focused on the White House, not on journalists." It later applauded Fitzgerald's appointment, declaring that he must be allowed "to use the full powers of a special counsel."

Â· The Washington Post refrained from expressing shock at a "leak." But The Post had contributed to the fray by reporting on Sept. 28, 2003, that "two White House officials called at least six Washington journalists and disclosed the identity and occupation of Wilson's wife . . . to undercut Wilson's credibility." This article was the likely impetus for the other papers' editorials.

As recently as a week ago, the media were displaying their prejudice in this case. On "Meet the Press," journalists lamented that the Libby trial was revealing how government officials can use their relationships with reporters to plant stories that hurt their political enemies. Where was the voice at the table asking, "Didn't Wilson also use the media with his assertions in the New York Times and The Post?"

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES ARI FLEISCHER because his testimony about conversations differs from reporters' testimony, just as Libby's does. To wit:

Â· The former White House press secretary testified before the grand jury and at the trial that he had revealed Plame's identity to two reporters -- John Dickerson, then of Time magazine, and NBC News's David Gregory. Dickerson denied it. Gregory won't comment.

Â· On cross-examination, Fleischer testified that it was "absolutely correct" that he did not tell The Post's Walter Pincus on July 12, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Pincus emphatically contradicted this, swearing that in the middle of a discussion, Fleischer "swerved off," asking, "Why do you keep writing about Joe Wilson and Joe Wilson's trip? Don't you know his wife worked for the CIA as an analyst for weapons of mass destruction and arranged for it?"

So indict Fleischer. He contradicted Pincus as materially as Libby contradicted Russert or Time's Matthew Cooper, the two witnesses who were the basis for the Libby indictment. Whoops! Can't do that. Fitzgerald gave Fleischer "pig in a poke" immunity. That's an old prosecutor's phrase meaning that Fitzgerald granted Fleischer immunity from prosecution without knowing what Fleischer would say. No problem -- indict Pincus. His testimony differed from Fleischer's and he didn't ask for immunity.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES RICHARD L. ARMITAGE with intentionally keeping silent about being the first person to reveal Plame's identity to reporters and with falsely telling the public that he did so at Fitzgerald's request because he did not want to be publicly embarrassed. To wit:

Â· Novak testified that Armitage told him on July 8, 2003, that it was Wilson's wife, "Valerie," who sent him on the Niger trip. Not until September 2006 did Armitage release Novak to reveal publicly that he had been the columnist's source.

Â· The Post's Bob Woodward testified that Armitage told him on June 13, 2003, rather colorfully: Wilson's "wife's a [expletive] analyst at the agency." When the FBI interviewed Armitage on Oct. 2, 2003, he apparently forgot about his taped interview with perhaps the most famous journalist of this generation. In November 2005 Armitage released Woodward from their confidentiality agreement -- but only to tell Fitzgerald, not the rest of us, how he had learned of Plame's identity.

Â· Armitage attributed his more than three years of silence to Fitzgerald's request that he not discuss the matter with anyone. But Fitzgerald was not appointed until Dec. 30, 2003, three months after Armitage now says he realized that he was Novak's source.

Â· Despite Armitage's claim as to why he kept silent, he yakked to his subordinate Marc Grossman about what he had said in his FBI interview -- conveniently, the night before Grossman's own FBI interview.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE U.S. JUSTICE DEPARTMENT with abdicating its legal and professional responsibility by passing the investigation off to a special counsel out of personal pique and reasons of ambition.

Â· Both then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and Deputy Attorney General James Comey not only had access to the law books but also the clout and clearances to demand that the CIA tell them whether Plame was covert.

Â· In the fall of 2003, Ashcroft, having learned that he would probably be replaced after the 2004 elections, had grown weary of taking flak for the president and threw the Libby investigation hot potato to Comey.

Â· In the fall of 2003, Comey, who hoped to replace Ashcroft as attorney general, in turn passed the hot potato to Fitzgerald, a former colleague and one of his best friends.

I rest my cases.

CIVIL LAW:

Drug Firms Accused Of Huge Fraud (TTNJ)

By Robert Cohen, Newhouse News Service

Trenton Times (NJ), February 18, 2007

Long line of pending cases involves Medicaid money

WASHINGTON -- The nation's big drugmakers have been systematically overcharging the Medicaid health-care program for the poor, reaping billions of dollars in illegal windfalls at the expense of the taxpayers, according to federal officials, members of Congress and a watchdog group.

Drugmakers are required by law to provide Medicaid with the same discounts they offer to big managed-care plans and hospital chains, but they have been disguis ing those prices, Ronald Tenpas, a U.S. associate deputy attorney general, told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform earlier this month.

"We are not seeing isolated instances of misconduct, but repeated practices within the indus try that have resulted in significant loses to federal health-care programs," he said.

The federal and state governments have had some success in recapturing money from the drug makers: During the last six years, government bodies have recouped about $3.9 billion in civil damages and criminal penalties stemming from 16 legal settlements involving Medicaid.

The settlements involve some of the biggest names in the industry, including Pfizer, Schering-Plough, GlaxoSmithKline, AstraZeneca and Bayer. Those cases dealt with overcharging the government for cancer, asthma, cholesterol, allergy and seizure medications.

But the scope of the problem could be much bigger. There are 150 pending federal investigations centering on Medicaid and two other government health-care programs that could find billions of dollars more in pharmaceutical company fraud.

Tenpas testified that those cases involve allegations of unlaw ful pricing and marketing practices related to hundreds of prescription drugs sold to Medicaid, Medicare and the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program.

"It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs," said Tenpas.

James Moorman, president of the nonprofit group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said public records show the pending inquiries involve other well-known companies, including Merck, Abbott, Novartis, and Johnson & Johnson. Based the history of past settlements, he said, the liability in the pending cases could amount to tens of billions of dollars.

'VERY SIMPLISTIC' The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the brand-name drug industry's trade group, declined comment on the al legations. Instead, it issued a statement asserting "the growth in spending on prescription medicines is at its lowest level in years."

Mike Moore, a Texas attorney who has represented Kenilworth- based Schering-Plough in drug- pricing litigation, said the pharmaceutical companies haven't de ceived the government on pricing. He said government regulators are aware of price differentials and, for a variety of policy reasons, have made decisions on reimbursement rates that some are now questioning.

Moore said the view offered by the Justice Department, some state attorneys general and members of Congress is "very simplistic and one-sided."

Medicaid, funded by the federal and state governments, provides health care to almost 50 million low-income beneficiaries. In 2005, the Department of Health and Human Services estimated that Medicaid purchased $41 billion worth of drugs, more than four times the $8.9 billion spent in 1994.

A 1990 law passed by Congress requires that drug manufacturers provide the Medicaid program, one of the nation's largest purchasers of drugs, with the same discounts they provide private purchasers.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the government reform panel, said the evidence shows Medicaid has been "repeatedly overcharged for essential medications" by pharmaceutical companies that have "deliberately crafted business plans to avoid giv ing Medicaid the proper discounts."

Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.) said he is baffled why there would be "so much wrongdoing going on" by a "group of very prestigious corporations."

EMPLOYEE-FUELED SUITS A majority of the investigations against the drugmakers have come through use of a provision of the federal False Claims Act, which allows people who have evidence of fraud involving government programs or contracts to bring suit on behalf of the federal government. The Medicaid cases stemmed from complaints by company employees, sales executives and pharmacies.

The cases are filed in federal court under seal, giving the Justice Department an opportunity to investigate the allegations and decide whether to intervene. If there is evidence of fraud, the Justice Department then ordinarily enters into lengthy negotiations with the companies, which can result in a monetary settlement instead of a trial.

Moorman said the 16 Medicaid- related cases settled since 2001 involved three types of schemes.

One common method, Moor man said, was for the manufacturer to conceal the best or lowest price it gave customers on brand-name drugs in order to avoid paying higher rebates to Medicaid. Nine of the 16 settlements were for cases using this scheme, he said, including a 2004 settlement after Scher ing-Plough was accused of hiding its best price on the allergy drug Claritin. Schering-Plough agreed to pay $345 million.

A second ploy involved manufacturers reporting inflated average wholesale prices to national reporting services, which were then used by Medicaid and Medicare to establish reimbursement rates.

Moorman said the inflated prices had no relation to the actual price paid by the pharmacists. But the pharmacists were allowed to keep the difference between the inflated Medicaid payment and the actual cost -- a scheme used by manufacturers as an incentive for pharmacies to purchase their drugs instead of ones made by competitors.

GlaxoSmithKline agreed in 2005 to pay nearly $150 million in a settlement of claims involving both Medicaid and Medicare, Moorman said, after being accused of engag ing in this type of inflated-pricing scheme to promote two drugs used to treat nausea associated with chemotherapy.

The third practice involved manufacturers unlawfully promot ing their drugs to physicians and others for unapproved uses, often accompanied by payment of illegal kickbacks.

Pfizer reached a $430million settlement with the government in 2004 after being accused of illegal off-label marketing of its anti-sei zure drug Neurotin.

"We can't afford to have these health programs if people are going to engage in this scale of fraud," said Moorman. "The whole thing is mind-boggling."

Moorman criticized the Justice Department for not being more aggressive in pursuing the pending False Claims Act cases. He charged the Bush administration has not committed enough resources and on average is settling only three cases a year.

"If they acted more forcefully, we might get the pharmaceutical companies to have a change in atti tude toward Medicaid and Medicare," he said.

Tenpas said the Justice Department takes the issue seriously. He told the congressional committee that the administration is moving as quickly as it can to resolve the inquiries and protect the health care programs from fraud.

"These are very complex cases," Tenpas said.

Cruel And Unusual Punishment For Inmates? (HC)

By Steve Mcvicker, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Over the past 6 years, at least 101 inmates have died at the Harris County Jail

Harris County Jail inmate Calvin Mack lay sprawled on a cellblock floor, coughing up blood, bleeding profusely, his fellow prisoners yelling for guards to get help.

Mack, a homeless and hardened drug addict, continued to bleed, continued to die. "What do you want me to do, get a Band-Aid ... ?" a deputy quipped when he first appeared at the cellblock. Four hours passed before the officer called for medical help.

By then, Mack was all but dead.

By inmate standards, Calvin Mack's life was not unusual. A petty criminal who spent most of his time smoking crack under cover of the Fifth Ward shadow world, he had been arrested on minor drug charges almost every other year over the past decade.

His death, on the other hand, was anything but usual. But questionable care in the Harris County jail is not isolated to his case.

A Houston Chronicle review of state and county records reveals that from January 2001 through December 2006, at least 101 inmates — an average of about 17 a year — have died while in the custody of the Harris County Jail. In 2006 alone, after three consecutive years of failing to be in compliance with state standards, the jail recorded 22 in-custody deaths.

At the time of their deaths, at least 72 of the inmates — more than 70 percent — were awaiting court hearings and had yet to be convicted of the crimes that led to their incarceration.

Records and interviews show that almost one-third of the deaths involve questions of inadequate responses from guards and staff, failure by jail officials to provide inmates with essential medical and psychiatric care and medications, unsanitary conditions, and two allegations of physical abuse by guards.

In at least 13 cases, relatives or documents raise questions over whether inmates received needed medications prior to their deaths. Additionally, 11 of the deaths involve infections and illnesses suggesting sanitation problems. In 10 other cases, death reports suggest possible neglect, as in the Mack case.

None of the records reviewed, however, concludes that jail staff contributed directly to the 101 deaths since 2001. During the same period, the Dallas County jail recorded 70 deaths.

Harris County Sheriff Tommy Thomas declined the Chronicle's request for an interview. He did reply to written questions, though he would not comment on specific cases, citing confidentiality laws.

Overall, Thomas wrote, the Harris County Sheriff's Office "takes great pride" in the health care it provides to jail inmates. He pointed out that jail officials are charged with the massive task of conducting medical screening on the more than 9,100 prisoners housed in the jail each month.

The sheriff also noted that "delivery of health care to inmates is further challenged by the fact that many inmates lacked preventative health care in the free world, many suffered from substance abuse prior to incarceration, and many come to jail with chronic, untreated medical conditions."

"We feel that we are meeting the challenges of inmate health care delivery within those constraints, are committed to making ongoing improvements in all that we do, and are doing our best to exceed constitutionally mandated services to the inmate population," Thomas wrote.

Twelve years ago, prisoner litigation forced the county to spend more than $100 million in jail construction because of crowding. The money was meant to improve jail conditions and alleviate problems with safety, security and inmate care, many of which still exist.

The jail is struggling with a guard shortage and has budgeted more than $20 million on overtime in the past year to meet minimum staffing standards required by state law.

Custodial Death ReportTexas requires all law enforcement agencies to file a Custodial Death Report with the state Attorney General's Office any time an in-custody death occurs. However, the AG's office serves basically as "a repository of the reports," said AG spokesman Tom Kelley. "That's all we do."

The Texas Commission on Jail Standards keeps no records or figures on in-custody deaths. The commission does monitor county jail populations and determines whether the facilities are in compliance with the state-mandated ratio of one guard to every 48 prisoners — a standard that Harris County had failed to meet the past three years.

Most health care in the jail system is provided by the University of Texas Health Science Center at Houston. Health care cost the county more than $18 million in the past year.

Plans are under way to improve the jail's health care system. a Dr. Michael Seale, the jail's medical director, declined to comment for this article.

Thomas, in his letter to the Chronicle, said the jail is committed to becoming "the benchmark for the delivery of correctional medicine nationally" and "will provide efficient, effective and compassionate medical care within the constraints of the jail's security operations."

State records show Harris County's daily jail population averaged more than 9,100 inmates through the first 10 months of 2006. Sixteen percent of those inmates — more than 1,400 — have what the executive director of the Mental Health Association of Greater Houston describes as "a serious mental illness." Yet the county provides only 51 mental health beds at the jail. The rest are housed in the jail's general population, although some in solitary cells.

Dispensing medicationsExacerbating the mental and medical challenges of inmates are rules that ban inmates from bringing their own medicines into the jail. Instead, they must wait for a jail doctor to prescribe them and a staffer to hand them out. For some, that can mean delays in getting crucial care.

The Chronicle attempted to contact the relatives of every person who has died at the jail since 2001, and many of them claimed that inmates were not regularly receiving medications they had been prescribed before going to jail.

Travis McKinney, an epileptic, had not had a seizure in the eight months before his arrest for assault. During the four weeks he was in jail, he had two, the last one fatal.

The 21-year-old's body was discovered on the cell floor near toilets where investigators say he slept. His anti-seizure medication was on the floor near his blanket. Whether he was getting and taking the medication regularly is unclear, according to the records. Though jail nurses reported they saw McKinney take his pills the night before his death, medical examiner's records state that "he was not compliant with his medications."

McKinney had spent substantial time in county mental health facilities and had a known history of epilepsy, leaving his family members to wonder why he was not placed in the jail's mental health ward — instead of with the general population — where his condition might have been more closely monitored.

Similarly, Leamon Caldwell, 58, died in the jail in February 2006 from hypertension, or high blood pressure. Family members were told that Caldwell refused to take his medication. They suspect he wasn't receiving meds at all.

Thomas disputes many claims about health care problems as "anecdotal," adding, "While we would have little reason to question the sincerity of the families and friends in reporting what they have been told by the inmates, we do question the credibility of what the inmates themselves allegedly reported. Inmates will cast their jail experience in the worst possible light in an attempt to gain sympathy."

He told the Chronicle that every inmate undergoes "medical intake screening" when booked into the jail, and at least 1,000 each month are later assessed by doctors.

Bad conditions reportedPrisoners also claim they have been forced to sleep on mattresses on cellblock floors — sometimes next to toilets. They maintain that the crowded living conditions at the jail are ripe for disease and bacteria, particularly methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, or staph, a potentially lethal blood infection.

As a result, numerous inmates contend they have contracted staph infections while incarcerated. Jail records show that between January 2001 and April 2005, there were 60 medical quarantines at the jail. The records show at least two of the quarantines were related to staph infections. The causes of 11 other quarantines are not listed.

Many inmates come to the jail already fraught with myriad health problems. If they arrive with pre-existing medical conditions, as many do, conditions at the jail can make matters worse.

In October 2001, inmate Stacy Earl Matlock, 38, died from "complications of cirrhosis of the liver," according to the autopsy report. The report also notes that Matlock "developed multisystem organ failure secondary to a multi-resistant staph aureus bacteremia."

In July 2002, according to the autopsy report, prisoner Roland Oliva, 33, died of sepsis, a bacterial infection of the blood.

Concerns by inmates and family members, particularly about sanitation, also have been raised by the Texas Commission on Jail Standards, which found crowded conditions have created sanitation, safety and security issues.

These problems and others at the jail have provoked the scrutiny of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas, which is concerned about overpopulation, in part because of a slow-moving criminal justice system.

"The size of the Harris County Jail population makes it difficult for jail administrators to manage the (inmates) and provide the necessary level of care that not only is necessary for the inmates but protection of the correctional officers and other staff members," said Nicole Porter, the ACLU's jail-project director.

Richard Newby, president of the Harris County Deputies Organization, said overtime demands and manpower shortages force guards to "prioritze" their attention to inmates: "Unless you see something that makes you think there's something (serious) going on, the standard answer is to tell the inmate" to put it in writing.

Faster responseInevitably, some deaths are impossible to prevent. The question is whether some inmates might be saved with more rapid medical response or thorough attention.

David Whitlock, 46, fell from his bunk, collapsed on the floor and succumbed to heart failure three hours later. But records show attempts to treat him before he died might have been obstructed by the lack of proper medical equipment.

According to statements from Debra Alston, the jail's former head of nursing, an adult-sized breathing tube could not be found on the emergency crash cart, a factor that could have contributed to his death.

Jail officials disagreed with the nurse. She was fired 14 months after asking questions about the death for reasons "both related and unrelated to the allegations" about Whitlock, the sheriff said. Among other things, she was accused of "provoking disharmony," breaching confidentiality and dishonesty, records show. Alston told the Chronicle her firing was in retaliation for the Whitlock matter.

Thomas said the death was investigated internally by the Board of Nursing Examiners and "closed without recommendation."

The same, however, cannot be said for Calvin Mack, whose case was among the most troubling, even by the admission of jail authorities.

Final trip to jailMack was booked into the Harris County Jail for the final time May 30, 2005. Six days later, he was dead.

His older sister, Harriett Mack, said she tried for years without success to get her brother off the streets and off drugs. But nothing worked. He also had AIDS.

The AIDS diagnosis earned him a bed in the medical division on the second floor of the jail's 1200 Baker facility in downtown Houston. But five days later, when his condition turned critical, jailers did little to help him, records show.

According to inmate Clifford Olson, several prisoners noticed that Mack was in physical distress while sitting on the toilet. He soon began coughing up blood and bleeding from his rectum. Olson says Mack asked the other inmates to get the attention of the guards.

It was about that time — at the beginning of the overnight shift — that Phillip G. Balthazar came on duty to guard the medical cellblock. Olson and other inmates told him Mack needed medical attention.

"What do you want me to do, get a Band-Aid for his ass?" Balthazar asked the inmates, according to both Olson and a sheriff's office report obtained by the Chronicle.

During the next several hours, Olson and other inmates continued unsuccessfully to plead with Balthazar about Mack's deteriorating condition. Mack pulled himself into the showers, which also are used by the other inmates.

"So everybody could see a wide little river of blood going down the drain, being washed out of the shower, for about an hour," Olson said.

About 2 a.m. Mack began having seizures. It took another 40 minutes for medical personnel to arrive with a gurney — four hours after inmates first called for help.

Mack was taken to LBJ Hospital, where he died from "respiratory distress," according to the Custodial Death Report.

Three months later, Dr. Ana E. Lopez of the Harris County Medical Examiner's Office ruled that Mack's death was an "accident" caused from "intracerebral hemorrhage due to hypertensive cardiovascular disease and cocaine toxicity." In other words: a brain hemorrhage from high blood pressure and history of cocaine use.

But investigators from the medical examiner's office were never informed by the sheriff's office about the delay in Mack's medical care, she said. Asked whether that might have made a difference in her ruling of an accidental death, she replied, "I'd have to think about that."

Lopez stressed that Mack's stroke was massive. She was not sure whether prompt medical attention would have saved his life. "The cause and manner of death would still be the same," Lopez said.

The sheriff's office's internal affairs division conducted its own probe of Mack's death. Detectives interviewed the 66 inmates who were housed in cellblock 2F1 with Mack, including Olson.

Of those inmates, 32 gave statements similar or identical to Olson's. Several were given polygraph examinations, which they passed.

"It is clear that Deputy Balthazar was notified by numerous inmates that an inmate under his control was experiencing a medical emergency," reads the internal affairs report. "It (was) his duty to evaluate and report such a condition in a timely manner. It appears Deputy Balthazar chose not to do so. ... This delay in effective intervention may have been a factor which contributed to catastrophic medical results for Mack."

Balthazar was dismissed Aug. 3, 2005. The termination letter accuses him of a "significant discrepancy" in his statement to detectives and of giving "deceptive" answers during a polygraph exam.

In a report on the incident that Balthazar filed with the sheriff's office, the deputy concluded that Mack "might be having a bad case of hemorrhoids" and that he immediately notified the medical clinic of the situation.

Contacted by the Chronicle, Balthazar said, "I was in charge of 133 people by myself. If I'd had some help, things might have been better." He added that he called the jail clinic and was told no one was available to help Mack.

He also denies making the "Band-Aid" statement.

Balthazar now serves as a reserve deputy for the Harris County Precinct 6 Constable's Office.

The Mack probe also resulted in the demotion of Lt. Christopher Y. Lee to deputy. In his disciplinary letter dated Aug. 9, 2005, Lee is accused of "failing to initiate any type of investigation into the events leading up to and surrounding inmate Mack's need for medical attention."

Lee did not return calls from the Chronicle.

Sheriff Thomas said the case was referred to the Harris County District Attorney's Office. The DA closed it with no action.

According to inmates, there also was little concern for decontaminating the cell after Mack had been taken to the hospital. It took more than five hours before workers arrived with supplies to clean the infected area.

Mack's sister Harriett expected more.

"I expected them to treat him like a human," she said.

Team May Revisit Cold Cases (BSUN)

By Jamie Stiehm, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 18, 2007

Attorney general wants unit to probe potential civil rights crimes

Cold-case investigations may heal wounds, supporters say

Maryland's attorney general is exploring the creation of a cold-case squad to investigate unsolved homicides, with an emphasis on racial crimes dating back to the civil rights era.

"Having a civil rights component to this office affords us the opportunity to look into current and past civil rights violations," said Douglas F. Gansler, who took office last month and has announced plans to increase prosecutions of environmental violators and gang members.

Gansler met Friday with top aides to discuss the idea of the new squad. The investigative unit would examine unsolved homicides from police files around the state, using modern forensic and DNA techniques, he said.

Compared to states in the Deep South, Maryland has fewer outstanding civil rights cases. Gansler said a survey is needed to count feasible cold cases with civil rights implications.

"If a lot of these people are still alive, witnesses and perpetrators, and if we have the ability to pursue them, the government has the onus to do so," Gansler said.

The investigations would include race-based homicides and cases of civil rights workers who might have been killed because they were identified with the movement. The unit's unsolved cases could also encompass desecrations of synagogues or other houses of worship.

A handful of states have taken similar steps in establishing cold-case or civil rights divisions, including Florida. Alabama intends to add a cold-case unit this year that looks into civil rights crimes and review the fatal shooting in 1965 of a young black man, Jimmy Lee Jackson, that involved state troopers.

A bill before Congress, with co-sponsors including Rep. John Lewis of Georgia and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, both Democrats, would require the Justice Department and the FBI to create cold-case units dedicated to civil rights.

The legislation, the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, is named for one of the most notorious race crimes, left cold for half a century. A black Chicago youth, Emmett Till, was slain in 1955 while visiting family in Mississippi and tossed in a river, allegedly for whistling at a white woman named Carolyn Bryant.

A Mississippi grand jury will convene next month to hear allegations that Bryant was a party to the killing. Bryant's late husband and another man were acquitted by an all-white jury shortly after the slaying.

During the Democratic primary last year, Gansler was criticized by an opponent for pledging to take on crime-fighting initiatives historically left to local state's attorneys. One of his first efforts after taking office -- forming a group of attorneys to tackle gang crimes -- was met with resistance from many state's attorneys, who do not want him to probe gang crimes or prosecute them without the consent of the local jurisdiction.

In an interview, Gansler said he recognized the delicate ground he was treading.

"To set up a cold-case squad, we'd have to have a lot of stakeholders, including local and federal authorities, and a concerted effort throughout the state," Gansler said. "We'll determine the feasibility and try to understand the universe of those civil rights-era crimes that were unsolved."

Special Agent Michelle Crnkovich, a Baltimore FBI spokeswoman, said the bureau was not aware of Gansler's proposed squad. "The FBI is always receptive to requests for our resources," she said. "Civil rights is a very important priority to the FBI."

With only about 30 homicide prosecutions nationwide for cold civil rights cases since 1989, experts say laws and investigative squads may not always achieve their aims.

Mark Potok, a spokesman for the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala., said, "The bitter reality is that many witnesses have died and cannot recall key events, and there are fewer of them as time goes by."

Yet a statewide cold-case unit could help heal lingering scars of racial crimes, said Carl O. Snowden, director for civil rights for the attorney general's office. He compared the concept to the U.S. Justice Department division that hunts down aging Nazi war criminals to bring them to justice before they die.

The 1970 death of Ralph E. Featherstone is one case that deserves a second look, Snowden said. Featherstone, a 31-year-old black man and former organizer for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, died in an explosion in Bel Air.

State police ruled that Featherstone was carrying explosives on his way to a pretrial hearing for his friend, H. Rap Brown, a Black Panther leader, at the Harford County courthouse. Brown was charged with inciting a race riot in Cambridge in 1967.

"There are a lot of people still living who vividly remember the riots of Cambridge," Snowden said. "People who were teenagers then are now in their 50s and 60s."

A lawyer and native of Cambridge, E. Thomas Merryweather, said he didn't see the point in dredging up painful scenes from the past.

"Everybody would like to think those days are behind us and we're moving forward in the correct direction," Merryweather said.

DOJ_NMG_0133325

Sherrilyn Ifill, a law professor at the University of Maryland, said, "This idea is part of a national movement in many ways, prodded by families of victims of crimes never brought to justice."

Author of On the Courthouse Lawn: Confronting the Legacy of Lynching in the 21st Century, Ifill has raised the idea of an investigative unit with Gansler's office.

"The community can become whole," Ifill said. "Complicity has the most corrosive effect, and this [model] helps to unburden the anger when society stands ready to use an authorized mechanism, the apparatus of justice."

Alabama Attorney General Troy King agreed.

"It brings peace and justice to the victims' families to have suspects brought before the bar of justice," King said. "They have a right to expect that we do that, whether they live in urban or rural areas. It shouldn't matter where they live."

Fact, Fiction Of Till's Murder (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, February 18, 2007

Legends abound regarding the events surrounding 1955 slaying

Few homicide cases in this nation's history have been shrouded by as much legend as the 1955 killing of Emmett Till.

Now, more than a half century after the 14-year-old's slaying, prosecutors are preparing to present the case to a Leflore County grand jury, separating fact from fiction, what's known from what may never be known.

"Because of its importance to the civil rights movement, it has this mythic quality like the Kennedy assassination," said David Beito, a University of Alabama professor who's an expert in the Till case. "You get all sorts of conspiracies."

Some of those legends took root not long after the black youth from Chicago was abducted, beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant at a grocery store in Money. Some have sprung up since.

Less than a month after Till's Aug. 28, 1955, slaying, an all-white jury acquitted her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam - only to see them confess their guilt months later to Look magazine. The half-brothers have since died.

In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's killing. A grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the case.

The FBI's more than 8,000-page report on the Till case sheds new light on the legends surrounding the killing, and in some cases, contradicts them.

Legend No. 1: Up to 14 people were involved in Till's abduction and killing, and five of them are still alive.

This idea surfaced at the time the Justice Department opened its probe.

Filmmaker Keith Beauchamp, who made the 2005 documentary, The Untold Story of Emmett Louis Till, said he found this information in his research. Those still living could be charged today, he said.

The FBI was unable to prove this claim.

Beito said the most people mentioned in 1955 news accounts were six - four white men and two black men.

In his testimony in 1955, Mose Wright said in the wee hours of Aug. 28, 1955, Milam and Bryant were not alone. He said someone in the truck with a "lighter" voice identified Till as the one. Some have speculated that someone was Carolyn Bryant, who has told relatives and the FBI she wasn't there.

Wright also described what he believed was a black man standing in the shadows. Wright's son, Simeon, said they believed that man, now dead, led Milam and Bryant to their house in the darkness.

The FBI report details an interview with Willie Reed, who testified in the 1955 trial. He saw five men with Till the morning of the slaying - three white and two black.

Reed since has identified the two black men as Levi "Too Tight" Collins and Joe Willie Hubbard. Collins is now dead, Beito said. "Another legend is that Collins committed suicide after this out of remorse. That's not true. He died of natural causes."

It is unknown if Hubbard is still alive, Beito said.

Some have speculated the third white man was Milam's brother, Leslie Milam, who managed a plantation and is now deceased. If a fourth white man were present, it's possible it could have been another brother, said Beito, who noted Bryant was a twin.

Alvin Sykes of Kansas City, president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign, said stating publicly how many may have taken part could hurt the case. "If the number is true, it could endanger the lives of potential witnesses," he said. "If it's not true, it may build false expectations."

According to the FBI report, none of those identified as being involved is still alive. The report goes on to urge District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville to take a closer look at Carolyn Bryant, the FBI's lone living suspect who could be charged with kidnapping.

Beauchamp said he found proof of other possible co-conspirators in author Carolyn Haines' 2003 book on Peggy Morgan, My Mother's Witness. In that nonfiction book, Morgan overhears her father, Gene Albritton, uncle and other unnamed white men discussing the case. "Now all we have to do is keep our mouths shut," she quotes her uncle, Bob, as saying.

When Morgan's mother, Inez, threatens to make public what she knows about Till's killing, Morgan's father beats her unconscious, telling her "if she ever spoke the name Emmett Till again, she would pay a terrible price," the book says. After that, he committed her to a mental institution.

"For some reason, the FBI is not believing" Morgan, Beauchamp said. "Their focus was to find enough evidence on one person to bring that person to court. That person was Carolyn Bryant."

Legend No. 2: Henry Lee Loggins took part in the killing.

The names of two black field hands, Collins and Loggins, emerged in 1955 news accounts as potential prosecution witnesses then-Tallahatchie County Sheriff H.C. Strider jailed to keep from testifying.

Loggins told reporters in 1955 and later repeated to Beauchamp that he had no role in the killing. "God help me, I knew nothing about it," he said.

In his interview with Beauchamp, Loggins describes in detail what supposedly happened to Till - repeatedly saying that was what he was told. He said the sheriff jailed him for six months without charges.

News accounts from the time show Loggins was indeed in jail, but not during the trial, Beito said. "Loggins was accused of stealing iron."

The FBI concluded there was no proof Loggins had a role. Disabled by a stroke, he now lives with a sister in Ohio.

His son, Glendora Mayor Johnny Thomas, said he was "elated" to hear the FBI's conclusion.

Philip Dray, author of At the Hands of Persons Unknown: The Lynching of Black America, said black field hands coerced into helping hardly fall into the same category as vicious killers.

"Maybe they helped wash out a truck of blood, but in a way they're like the other victims," he said. "They're frightened and have to keep their mouths shut."

Legend No. 3: Emmett Till was castrated.

In the wake of Reconstruction, castration was part of the ritual of the lynchings of African Americans, Dray said. "It was a very elaborate procedure done for public consumption."

Not surprisingly, castration rumors persist in the Till case.

But in her book and in interviews, Till's mother, Mamie Till Mobley, said her son was intact when she viewed his body.

Till's autopsy shows no evidence of castration.

Beauchamp said a relative of Till's told him Till had been castrated: "That's something we'll never really know."

Legend No. 4: Mose Wright pointed at J.W. Milam and said, "Thar he."

The words "Thar he" (also written "dar he") have become a legend surrounding the case for more than five decades.

In the documentary, Eyes on the Prize, African-American journalist James L. Hicks, who reported on the trial for the Cleveland Call and Post, quoted Wright as saying the famous phrase.

Wright's son, Simeon, said his father was articulate and never spoke those words.

Beauchamp agreed. "He said, 'That's him,'" the filmmaker said. "It came from the media trying to make him sound country."

The 320-page transcript records Wright as saying, "There he is."

But Beito asked, "Would the transcript actually say, 'Thar he'?"

One of those present said Wright indeed spoke those words. "No question," said Betty Pearson of Sumner, who attended the 1955 trial. "People have tried to put words in his mouth, but that's what he said."

Some may feel such a quote denigrates Wright, she said, but she felt it merely reflected who he was - an African-American sharecropper who dared to stand up and identify a white killer in court.

"It almost looked like he was standing on his tiptoes when he pointed at (Milam)," she said.

Veteran journalist Bill Minor of Jackson, who covered the trial for the Times-Picayune in New Orleans, recalled Wright stood, pointed his bent finger at Milam and said, "thar's the one."

"It was the most dramatic thing I saw in my career," he said.

Mississippi writer Will Campbell immortalized the words, "Thar he," on his personal stationery.

DOJ_NMG_0133327

"Mose Wright said, 'Thar he.' He didn't say, 'There's that gentleman,'" Campbell said. "He was a field hand, a proud man and, God knows, a brave man. Those are the two bravest words I think I've ever heard. Most of the people in that courtroom were hostile. He knew it, but it didn't stop him."

ANTITRUST:

Monsanto Deal Ruffles Seed Rivals (MCA)

By Jane Roberts Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 18, 2007

Six months after Monsanto Co. agreed to pay $1.5 billion for Delta and Pine Land -- the largest cottonseed company in the country -- the pot bubbles with intrigue.

Producers don't seem as worried as much as Monsanto rivals Switzerland-based Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., owned by DuPont.

Both have licensing agreements with D&PL and don't relish the idea of having to cooperate with Monsanto.

But what is really at stake is this: Monsanto owns more transgenetic cotton traits than any company in the world. If it also owns the largest cottonseed company, it would control the most cotton varieties, transgenes and -- in this case -- the herbicide Roundup, central to many recent biotech advances in agriculture.

"Farmers are not very happy unless they have stock in Monsanto," said Bill Meredith, longtime U.S. Department of Agriculture cotton breeder in Stoneville, Miss. "They fear they will have to pay more to get a product not as good as what they've got."

The Department of Justice was expected to rule on the antitrust issue by Wednesday. Now, it looks like the deal will close by spring.

If the merger goes through, Monsanto will control 85 percent of the mainstream bloodlines of cotton and every kind of cotton planted in the Mid-South.

"The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anti-competitive," said Doyle Karr, DuPont spokesman. "We have serious concerns about the impact it would have on farmers, the agricultural industry and ultimately consumers."

While Syngenta says it is not engaged in a grass-roots effort to defeat the sale, it has told the Justice Department and others that it doesn't "believe it's in the best interest of the growers," said Anne Burt, spokeswoman.

"But for the time being, it's business as usual," Burt said. "We have an agreement with Delta and Pine Land to market and develop a particular trait, and that work is still proceeding."

The issue all comes down to transgenetics, the science of transplanting traits in seed to create crops resistant to pests and herbicides.

Monsanto, the first to enter the biotech field in agriculture, introduced a trait in 1996 that made cotton resistant to bud- and boll worms.

A year later, it introduced its Roundup Ready trait, which allows farmers to spray its trademark herbicide over the crop, killing the weeds but not the cotton.

Yields increased overnight. But the science also reduced labor, herbicide and petroleum costs so effectively, few farmers today plant anything but transgenes, particularly in the Mid-South where 98 to 99 percent of the cotton planted in 2006 was from transgenetic seed.

"Without transgenes, we wouldn't even be in the game of international competition in coton. We'd be completely behind because our costs would be so much higher," said Carl Anderson, agricultural economic professor emeritus Texas A&M.

DuPont and Syngenta both have agreements with D&PL to insert traits in its seed, giving farmers alternatives to Monsanto's monopoly on herbicide- and pest-resistance.

Last summer, for instance, D&PL paid DuPont $20.5 million to license its dual traits for herbicide resistance in cotton as early as 2011.

University researchers here praised the partnership, saying the genes would give farmers protection against stubborn weeds showing resistance to Roundup or glyphosate -- its generic equivalent -- plus provide an alternative to Monsanto.

Rivals worry that if they license their transgenetic traits to Monsanto, they won't get a fair shake in the marketplace because Monsanto would control the test plots and marketing.

Tom Jagodinski, D&PL president and chief executive, calls the rhetoric "sour grapes.

"They and anybody else could have bought Delta Pine, but they didn't step up," he said. "They are probably kicking themselves for not buying us. And they hope that if the U.S. Department of Justice were to block the deal, then they come and buy Delta Pine."

He says farmers will get new and better technology earlier than D&PL could do it alone, including cotton resistant to drought and nematodes, and varieties that use nitrogen more efficiently and produce better fiber.

"We've gotten a better understanding of what Monsanto is working on. Clearly, they have some interesting technologies farmers are going to like."

While Anderson agrees the R&D advantages of the merger could be significant, he worries that there will be no way to test Monsanto's claims.

"When you have a dominant industry where competition is not very strong, it's best to have some real good, effective guidelines," Anderson said. "I don't think we have that.

"When you buy a labeled variety of seed, you need to be able to check to see if the true variety is stated. There's no way to do that now."

Monsanto tried to buy D&PL in 1998 but scrapped the deal when a Justice review dragged on. D&PL sued Monsanto as a result.

The sides have spent millions fighting each other in court. If the deal goes through, the lawsuit would be settled as part of the sale.

If it doesn't, Monsanto would have to pay D&PL $600 million.

For a "little more money," insiders say, Monsanto can buy the whole company, get the market dominance that comes with it, plus derail its competitors.

Monsanto says the theory is simplistic and overstated.

"If you look historically at what we've done with trade technology, you see we have broadly licensed it to other cottonseed companies throughout the Cotton Belt," said Lee Quarles, spokesman.

"The whole reason is that farmers like the technologies, but they want it in the seed brands that mean the most to their farm."

ENVIRONMENT:

An Oil Reserve Right At Hand (WP)

By Gal Luft

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

In his State of the Union address last month, President Bush announced his intention to expand the Strategic Petroleum Reserve as a way to strengthen America's energy security. The 20-year effort to increase the emergency stockpile from its current capacity, 691 million barrels, to 1.5 billion barrels would provide enough oil to compensate for a loss of nearly 100 days of net oil imports, almost double today's reserve. (Since it is virtually impossible that all of America's suppliers would be cut off at once, the period would actually be much longer.)

This move reflects the president's belief that oil-rich regions such as the Middle East and Africa will continue to be unstable and that the United States is likely to become ever more vulnerable to terrorist attacks against oil facilities worldwide and to erratic weather patterns in the Atlantic Ocean.

In an increasingly unstable world, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is a much-needed insurance policy. But the way the president chose to expand it is ill-considered. First, his plan requires purchasing oil at a rate of 110,000 barrels a day -- every day -- for the next 20 years. Assuming oil prices average $60 to $80 a barrel in the next two decades, it would cost $48 billion to $65 billion just to buy the oil. Add the cost of building and maintaining storage sites, and the price tag could easily be as much as $82 billion. And this is only the beginning.

If the United States expands its strategic reserve, other major oil consumers will do the same. Emerging giants such as China and India, which import much less than America does, have barely 10 days' worth of stockpiles. When other consumers rush to buy oil for their reserves, the added demand will drive up prices on the already tight oil market. So in addition to the cost of expanding the reserve, Americans will pay extra at the pump.

The implementation of the plan also leaves much to be desired. The reserve is divided among four major sites in Texas and Louisiana. The Energy Department announced last week that the site for the expansion will be in Richton, Miss., and that it will be connected to refiners and marine facilities in Pascagoula, on the Gulf Coast, for oil distribution.

The Gulf states are highly vulnerable to destructive hurricanes, yet the administration aims to put all our eggs in one basket, rather than identify safer areas. The plan ignores the likelihood that violent storms could damage the pipelines that connect our economy with its emergency oil stockpile and that pumping stations might not have electricity.

For the United States to have a reliable emergency stockpile, new locations must be identified. This may not be easy. Geological formations such as the salt domes in the South that host the reserve are uncommon, and not-in-my-back-yard opposition is likely.

The administration should consider a radically different and much cheaper approach to boosting our security: make ANWR our strategic reserve. For many years, supporters of drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge have failed to open it for production. With the Democrats controlling Congress, the chances of drilling are slimmer than ever. President Bush didn't even bother to raise the issue last month. But reframing the issue to cast the refuge as an emergency stockpile rather than a source of production might well change the politics.

Defining the refuge as a strategic reserve would not provoke a rush by other countries to double their reserves (and thus would avoid spurring a rise in global oil prices). Further, the Alaskan oil is already in our possession; tapping it wouldn't require paying tens of billions of dollars to countries with which we are at odds. Congress could compensate Alaskans by leasing the oil for a predetermined period after which the state would be able to sell its oil, provided lawmakers approved. This might not generate the same per-barrel income Alaskans would receive if the oil were sold today, but it's much more than what they are getting now.

Treating the refuge as a reserve would not pose the same environmental problems as full-scale production. Drilling several wells and building the necessary infrastructure would have minimal impact on the surrounding wildlife. If America were ever hit by an oil shock and our way of life was at stake, the caribou would have to excuse us; until then, and under this plan, they could live in peace.

Disagreements on ANWR have led to a political gridlock that has prevented any major progress toward energy security. As a result, America is increasingly dependent on foreign oil, to the detriment of its national and economic security. By resolving this issue once and for all, we can finally begin to implement policies that move the United States toward increased energy security.

The writer is executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, a Washington-based energy security think tank.

Editorial: Criminals, Guns Don't Mix (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, February 18, 2007

Cities need help, not hindrance, from federal authorities in tracking illegal sales

Earlier this month we wrote in support of an effort by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department to track the origin of guns used in crimes. The department had traced several such weapons to a gun shop in Sparks, just outside of Reno.

Such efforts are undertaken to determine whether gun shops are permitting "straw purchases" - those made with the intent of giving or selling the guns to criminals. Support for these investigations comes from the Mayors Against Illegal Guns Coalition, which counts 150 U.S. mayors in its membership, including Geno Martini of Sparks.

A co-founder of the group, New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, last year sent police investigators into many of his city's gun shops. As the requirement for gun shop operators to be vigilant against straw purchases comes under federal law, all Bloomberg could do was press civil suits against those found to be in violation.

He hoped the Justice Department would take it from there, and file criminal charges where the evidence was strongest. But not only did the Justice Department refuse to bring charges, it also warned Bloomberg about "potential legal liabilities" the city could face if it continued such investigations.

Straw purchases are a mounting problem in communities across the country. The federal government should assist cities as they try to protect their citizens from the danger presented by criminals who can easily obtain guns from seemingly legitimate purchasers.

IMMIGRATION:

Nafta Should Have Stopped Illegal Immigration, Right? (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

THE North American Free Trade Agreement, enacted by Congress 14 years ago, held out an alluring promise: the agreement would reduce illegal immigration from Mexico. Mexicans, the argument went, would enjoy the prosperity and employment that the trade agreement would undoubtedly generate — and not feel the need to cross the border into the United States.

But today the number of illegal migrants has only continued to rise. Why didn't Nafta curb this immigration? The answer is complicated, of course. But a major factor lies in the assumptions made in drafting the trade agreement, assumptions about the way governments would behave (that is, rationally) and the way markets would respond (rationally, as well).

Neither happened, yet Nafta remains the model for trade agreements with developing Latin countries, including the Central American Free Trade Agreement, passed by Congress in 2005. Three more Nafta-like agreements are now pending in Congress — with Panama, Columbia and Peru.

When Nafta finally became a reality, on Jan. 1, 1994, American investment flooded into Mexico, mostly to finance factories that manufacture automobiles, appliances, TV sets, apparel and the like. The expectation was that the Mexican government would do its part by investing billions of dollars in roads, schooling, sanitation, housing and other needs to accommodate the new factories as they spread through the country.

It was more than an expectation. Many Mexican officials in the government of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari assured the Clinton administration that the investment would take place, and believed it themselves, said Gary Hufbauer, a senior fellow at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington who campaigned for Nafta in the early 1990s.

"It just did not happen," he said.

Absent that investment, foreign factories congregated in the north, within 300 miles of the American border, where some infrastructure already existed. "Monterrey is quite good," Mr. Hufbauer said, "but in a lot of other cities the infrastructure is terrible, not even enough running water or electricity in poor neighborhoods. People get temporary jobs, but that is all."

Meanwhile, Mexican manufacturers, once protected by tariffs on a host of products, were driven out of business as less expensive, higher quality merchandise flowed into the country. Later, China, with its even-cheaper labor, added to the pressure, luring away manufacturers and jobs.

Indeed, despite the influx of foreign-owned factories, total manufacturing employment in Mexico declined to 3.5 million by 2004 from a high of 4.1 million in 2000, according to a calculation of Robert A. Blecker, an American University economist.

As relatively well-paying jobs disappeared, Mexico's average wage for production workers, already low, fell further behind the average hourly pay of production workers in the United States, and Mexicans responded by migrating.

"The main thing that would have stemmed the flow of people across the border was a rapid increase in wages in Mexico," said Dani Rodrik, an economist and trade specialist at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "And that certainly has not happened."

Something similar occurred in agriculture. The assumption was that tens of thousands of farmers who cultivated corn would act "rationally" and continue farming, even as less expensive corn imported from the United States flooded the market. The farmers, it was assumed, would switch to growing strawberries and vegetables — with some help from foreign investment — and then export these crops to the United States. Instead, the farmers exported themselves, partly because the Mexican government decided to reduce tariffs on corn even faster than Nafta required, according to Philip Martin, an agricultural economist at the University of California, Davis.

"We understood that the transition from corn to strawberries would not be smooth," Professor Martin said. "But we did not think there would be almost no transition."

A financial crisis also dashed expectations. One expectation was that the Mexican economy, driven by Nafta, would grow rapidly, generating jobs and keeping Mexicans home. The peso crisis of 1994-95, however, provoked a steep recession, and while there was some big growth later, the average annual growth rate over Nafta's lifetime has been less than 3 percent.

The financial crisis struck just months after Nafta came into existence, undermining, early on, the Mexican government's ability to spend money on roads, education and other necessary government functions.

"We underestimated Mexico's deficits in physical and human infrastructure," said J. Bradford DeLong, an economist at the University of California, Berkeley, and a Treasury official in the Clinton administration.

But, he says, without Nafta the migration would have been even greater. For instance, he says, there would not have been as much investment in the north of the country.

Finally, the steady flow of Mexicans to the United States has produced a momentum of its own — what Jeffrey Passel, a demographer at the Pew Hispanic Institute, calls a "network effect," in which young Mexicans travel to the United States in growing numbers to join the growing number of family members already here.

The upshot is that Mexican migration to the United States has risen to 500,000 a year from less than 400,000 in the early 1990s, before Nafta, Mr. Passel estimates. Roughly 80 percent to 85 percent of immigrants are here illegally, he says.

The peso crisis, recession, the network effect — their impact may have been beyond anyone's control, but not the assumptions about how the market and the government would act.

"We have indeed had one disappointment after another on this score," Mr. Rodrik said, noting that the same assumption about government spending is part and parcel of the agreements, now before Congress, with Columbia, Peru and Panama.

While there is opposition to these proposals, it is mainly from Democrats who want a better safety net for American workers who might be hurt.

The European Union, in contrast, assumes little about government spending on the part of economically weaker nations joining it. The union itself has hugely subsidized the improved services needed by entering countries like Portugal, Spain, Greece and Poland, rather than leave financing to the relatively meager resources of entering countries.

The money is used not only for public investment, Mr. Rodrik noted, but also to subsidize companies setting up operations in the new countries and to support government budgets.

"I am not saying Nafta was a bad agreement," Mr. Rodrik said. "But more than a trade agreement is required for countries to converge economically. And Nafta has been viewed as a shortcut to convergence without having to do all the other stuff."

Georgia Revisits Legal Restrictions On Illegal Aliens (WT/AP)

ATLANTA (AP) -- There have been no protests on the steps of the Georgia Capitol like those that greeted the state's sweeping immigration legislation last year. But quietly, and in piecemeal fashion, state lawmakers have been working around the edges to crack down again on aliens in the country illegally.

Georgia made international headlines last spring when it passed some of the toughest laws in the U.S. targeting illegal aliens within its borders. Those laws included provisions to sanction employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens and deny some state services -- such as nonemergency medical care and unemployment checks -- to adults who can't verify that they're in the country legally.

A flurry of smaller proposals has been moving through the state legislature this year, including several that would make it tougher for illegal aliens to drive in Georgia.

"This is an issue that I hear from my constituents all the time about," said state Rep. Timothy Bearden, a Republican from Villa Rica, who wants to require all state forms to be in English only.

"The federal government has been derelict in their duty, and until they do something, I guess it's going to be left up to us here in the states," he said.

State Sen. Chip Rogers was the author last year of the Georgia Security and Immigration Compliance Act. Most provisions of that law aren't set to take effect until July, and Mr. Rogers said he doesn't foresee another comprehensive immigration bill until the effects of that legislation can be judged.

"But there is still room to do other things," said the Republican from Woodstock, a north Atlanta suburb.

Last week, a proposal by Mr. Rogers coasted through the state Senate that would require Georgians to obtain a valid state driver's license before they can get their car licensed. To get a Georgia driver's license, residents must already verify that they are in the country legally.

Mr. Rogers portrayed it as a public safety measure but acknowledged that it would make it harder for people in the country illegally to get behind the wheel, because their vehicles wouldn't have valid plates and would be easy for law enforcement to spot and stop.

The measure passed unanimously without debate. It moves to the House, which like the state Senate is controlled by Republicans.

Jerry Gonzalez, executive director of the Georgia Association of Latino Elected Officials, said the measures are little more than a backhanded way to go again after illegal aliens.

"In some ways, it's worse than last year because it's sneakier," he said.

Mr. Gonzalez said the measures under consideration would drive the state's growing Hispanic population deeper underground and discourage them from cooperating with law enforcement.

But Republican backers of the new proposals say they are needed to close loopholes.

The crackdown is coming not just from the state legislature. Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican, announced during his re-election bid that 10 new investigators would be placed at driver services centers -- where driver's licenses are issued -- that are thought to be at the highest risk for receiving forged documents.

They Are America (NYT)

Almost a year ago, hundreds of thousands of immigrant workers and their families slipped out from the shadows of American life and walked boldly in daylight through Los Angeles, Washington, Chicago, New York and other cities. "We Are America," their banners cried. The crowds, determined but peaceful, swelled into an immense sea. The nation was momentarily stunned.

A lot has happened since then. The country has summoned great energy to confront the immigration problem, but most of it has been misplaced, crudely and unevenly applied. It seeks not to solve the conundrum of a broken immigration system, but to subdue, in a million ways, the vulnerable men and women who are part of it. Government at all levels is working to keep unwanted immigrants in their place — on the other side of the border, in detention or in fear, toiling silently in the underground economy without recourse to the laws and protections the native-born expect.

The overwhelming impulse has been to get tough, and tough we have gotten:

Border enforcement. What little the last Congress did about immigration was focused on appeasing hard-line conservatives by appearing to seal the border. President Bush's new budget continues that approach, seeking 3,000 more Border Patrol officers and another $1 billion for a 700-mile fence, adding to the billions spent to militarize the border since the 1990s. That still isn't enough to build the fence and it hasn't controlled the illegal flow; you need more visas and better workplace enforcement to do that. It has directed much traffic into the remote Southwest desert, making more immigrants vulnerable to smugglers and leaving many people dead.

Federal raids. In December federal agents stormed a half-dozen Swift meatpacking plants, rounding up hundreds of suspected illegal immigrants and exposing the secret that is no secret: America's dirtiest, hardest jobs are done by people too desperate to shun them and too afraid to complain. The raids have been replicated in other states and industries, on day-labor street corners and in homes from Connecticut to California. In immigrant communities, the undercurrent of fear has been replaced by terror, and employers are jittery, too. The immigration agency says it singles out only fugitives in Operation Return to Sender, but the sweeps are broad and panic is indiscriminate.

Local crackdowns. State, county and local officials have picked up where they left off last year, introducing bills to get tough on illegal immigrants. They cannot control federal policy, so they try other ways to punish those they see as unfit neighbors, to stifle their opportunities, extract money, expose them to legal jeopardy and otherwise inflict suffering, in the deluded hope that piling on miseries will make them disappear. In suburban Long Island, where resentment over an influx of day laborers has festered under a hapless and intolerant county government, lawmakers are considering banning workers from county roadsides. Texas legislators are mulling a bill to reject the 14th Amendment and deny the benefits of citizenship to children born in this country to undocumented parents. Local officials all over are trying to deputize police officers as immigration agents, causing overburdened police forces and prosecutors to bristle. Some bills are symbolic, most are simply spiteful, and their effect is a chaotic patchwork, not a sane national policy.

Gutted due process. Laws enacted a decade ago and tightened after 9/11 distance even legal immigrants from the protection of the law. Immigrants are routinely detained without bond, denied access to lawyers, deported without appeal and punished for one-time or minor infractions with a mechanistic ferocity that precludes a judge's discretion or mercy. Several of the immigration bills that Congress has considered seek to heighten the efficiency with which immigrants who run afoul of the authorities can be railroaded out of the country. This gums up another aspect of the legal system, which deals with refugees and asylum seekers. A much tighter web for immigrants has been erected, and it catches many blameless victims.

The web of suspicion. The Justice Department wants to expand routine DNA collection to include detained illegal immigrants, creating a vast new database that will sweep up hundreds of thousands of innocent people. DNA, far more than fingerprints, is a trove of deeply personal information. Its routine collection from law-abiding citizens is considered an outrageous violation of privacy rights. In the belief that illegal immigrants lack such rights, DNA swabs and blood would be collected even if a detainee is not suspected of a crime. This reinforces the notion that immigrants should be treated as one huge class of criminal suspects.

The bureaucratic trap. The federal bureaucracy, notorious for backlogs and bad service, wants to charge more to immigrants who want to become Americans — an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers. Such steep and arbitrary increases would create a means test for citizenship, an affront to our national values.

The rise of hate. The Anti-Defamation League, acutely sensitive to the presence of intolerance, has detected an increase in Ku Klux Klan activity around the country, much of it focused on hatred of new immigrants. This virus in the bloodstream usually erupts amid national ferment and fear, and according to a report available at www.adl.org, hate groups like the Klan have moved quickly to exploit the simmering debate over immigration.

Hopelessly fixated on toughness, the immigration debate has lost its balance, overlooking the humanity of the immigrant. There is a starkly diminished understanding that hospitality for the stranger is part of the American ethos, and that as much as we claim to be a nation of immigrants, we have thwarted them at every turn. We must do better.

The new year began with renewed optimism for the chances of sensible immigration reform in Washington. The hope is justified, but time is short and real change will still require boldness and courage. Citizenship must be the key to reform. The idea of an earned path to citizenship for illegal immigrants was missing from President Bush's State of the Union address this year, though he has continued to say his usual favorable words about reform. The new Democratic Congress and moderate Republicans cannot be afraid to stand up to the anti-amnesty demagogues and lead Mr. Bush to a solution.

Enforcement of laws cannot be ignored. Punish immigrants who enter illegally, make them pay back taxes and fines, restrict their ability to get work through deceit and false identities. But open a path to their full inclusion in the life of this country.

The alternative — the path of immigrant exploitation, of harassment without hope — will only repeat the ways the country has shamed itself at countless points in its history.

Republican Poe Helped Elevate Border Agents' Case (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Congressman from Humble says 2 ex-border agents got bad rap

WASHINGTON — Flip on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight show these days and chances are pretty good you'll see Texas Congressman Ted Poe lamenting the fate of two ex-Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker.

For months, the Republican from Humble has relentlessly championed the agents' case on cable-TV shows and behind the scenes, helping foment public outrage directed at the White House and President Bush's appointees in the Justice and Homeland Security departments.

Poe, who spent 22 years as a hard-nosed criminal court judge in Houston and eight years before that as a Harris County prosecutor, seems an unlikely choice to be carrying the banner for two convicts.

"It surprises some that I am seen to be on the side of the defendants," Poe acknowledged in an interview.

But the lawmaker, in his second term, said his stance stems directly from his experiences on the bench and at the prosecution table.

"I know the power of the prosecution and how powerful they are," said Poe, who argues that the Justice Department went to extraordinary lengths to prosecute ex-agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos for wounding the drug trafficker in a 2005 border altercation.

Though the two men were duly convicted in a jury trial in El Paso, Poe contends the game was rigged against the defendants because of "back-room deals" given by the prosecution to get the trafficker and other involved Border Patrol agents to testify. He also questions whether information was withheld from the jury.

And Poe is uneasy about what he views as Mexican interference into the case, citing letters written by Mexican consular officials seeking prosecution.

Asked whether he ever worries that he may be defending rogue officers, which is what prosecutors insist Ramos and Compean were, Poe expresses no uncertainty.

"They are not rogue border agents," he said.

But Poe also has no patience with fellow conservatives whose rhetoric has soared to broach the possibility of impeachment of Bush if either of the ex-agents is killed in prison. Ramos was attacked by six inmates at his Mississippi prison recently after they saw his case air on TV.

"That's an absurd answer," Poe said of the impeachment talk.

Cornyn on a quest for campaign cashTexas Sen. John Cornyn will have to get down to some serious fundraising in preparation for his re-election run in 2008.

The Republican raised $3.3 million during the past two years and began 2007 with a little more than $3 million in the bank. Considering he spent $15 million in campaign contributions on his 2002 election, he's got a ways to go in the quest for campaign cash.

"I'm working on it," Cornyn said, predicting he will have banked at least $6 million by next January's filing deadline.

Cornyn estimated he'll need about $20 million if he has a serious Democratic rival. Among those who may be eyeing the race: former Comptroller John Sharp, former Dallas mayor and 2002 Senate nominee Ron Kirk and Houston Mayor Bill White, though many think he is far more inclined to make a gubernatorial run in 2010.

Houston Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky, who unsuccessfully challenged Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison last year, also is in the mix.

"I'm just going to try to be ready for whatever comes," Cornyn said.

Measure honors civil rights figuresThe Senate voted last week to add the names of former Houston Congresswoman Barbara Jordan and three other prominent civil rights figures, including fellow Texan Hector P. Garcia, to the title of the 2006 law reauthorizing portions of the Voting Rights Act.

The measure now moves to the House.

TAX:

Senators Set Sights On Overseas Tax Havens (WP/BLOOM)

By Mark Drajem, Ryan J. Donmoyer, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Three senators proposed legislation that would target what they say is $100 billion a year in tax revenue lost each year because of overseas tax havens, in part by forcing hedge funds to track their foreign investors.

The measure would impose tougher requirements on U.S. taxpayers using offshore secrecy jurisdictions, give the U.S. Treasury the authority to take action against foreign jurisdictions that impede tax enforcement, stiffen penalties against abusers and close offshore trust loopholes, according to a summary of the bill released by Michigan Democrat Carl M. Levin.

The legislation would require hedge funds to establish programs to combat money laundering and better track offshore investors, under guidance from the Treasury Department. The measure would also prohibit the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office from issuing patents for accounting strategies intended to "minimize, avoid, defer, or otherwise affect liability for federal, state, local, or foreign tax."

"We cannot tolerate tax cheats offloading their unpaid taxes onto the backs of honest taxpayers," Levin said in a joint statement with co-sponsors Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). "Offshore tax havens have declared economic war on honest taxpayers by helping tax cheats hide income and assets that should be taxed in the same way as other Americans."

The Treasury Department and top lawmakers in both houses of Congress have made a priority this year reducing the so-called tax gap, the difference between what individuals and companies owe and what they pay. The IRS said a study of 2001 tax returns shows the tax gap is about $345 billion a year, only $55 billion of which is recovered.

The legislation is a "strengthened" version of a measure introduced in 2005 by the senators, Levin said, and is the product of a four-year probe by the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Action On Health Insurance (NYT)

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — President Bush urged Congress again Saturday to create a tax break that would help people buy private health insurance outside the workplace.

Repeating points made in his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush said that he wanted to create a standard tax deduction for health insurance and that he would “continue to reach across party lines to enact common-sense health care reforms.”

“Health care costs are rising rapidly, more than twice as fast as wages,” Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address. “These rising costs are driving up the price of health insurance.”

Mr. Bush said he was pleased to receive a letter this week from 10 senators — 5 Democrats and 5 Republicans — who wanted to work with him on the nation’s health care system.

Gov.'s Health Plan Leaves Some In Bind (LAT)

By Jordan Rau, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Its subsidies wouldn't cover nearly 1 million middle-class workers.

— Shannon Corona had stomach surgery in 2004, but she has not been back to her specialist for a checkup in two years.

DOJ_NMG_0133335

Her employer, a landscape architectural firm where she is a drafter, doesn't offer health insurance, and she says she can't afford it.

"I have too many bills: two student loans, a car payment and car insurance," said Corona, a 23-year-old from San Dimas.

Corona is the kind of Californian who Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger says would be helped by his proposed overhaul of the state's healthcare system. But compelling everyone to obtain insurance — the linchpin of his plan — may not work for many Californians in need of aid, according to health policy experts.

Under the governor's plan, nearly 1 million middle-class people would be caught in a tough bind, those experts say: They earn too much to qualify for the insurance subsidies Schwarzenegger wants the state to provide but not enough to afford comprehensive coverage.

Only those whose yearly earnings are less than 250% of the federal poverty level — about $25,525 for individuals and $51,625 for families of four — would qualify for the proposed subsidies.

People earning more would be required by law to have, at a minimum, a high-deductible catastrophic insurance plan. Such policies, which the administration says cost about $1,200 per person a year, would not pay for anything until a patient's annual medical costs exceeded $5,000.

And families could owe as much as $5,000 more in co-payments before insurers absorbed further medical bills.

Those who earn more than Schwarzenegger's subsidy threshold but are hardly affluent can include fitness trainers, retail sales workers, child-care workers, actors, dental assistants, artists, social workers, construction workers and legal assistants. Many retired people and those in part-time jobs also routinely earn just a little more than the cutoff amount.

"I think the biggest weakness is just not addressing where people 2 1/2 times poverty are going to go if they want something more than catastrophic coverage," said Jonathan Gruber, an economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who analyzed the governor's proposal at Schwarzenegger's request.

Democratic leaders in the Legislature, which must approve any healthcare overhaul and is weighing several proposals, have been skeptical of requiring coverage without regulating how much insurers can charge.

E. Richard Brown, director of the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research, told a Senate panel Thursday that 917,000 of the 2 million uninsured who earn more than Schwarzenegger's threshold would have difficulty affording the coverage the governor wants to require.

The administration says many components of Schwarzenegger's plan would help lower premiums, although they have no estimates of how much. One provision would limit how much insurers and hospitals could use for things other than medical care, specifically profits and administration. At least 85% of premiums would have to be spent on care.

But both the administration and independent experts say Schwarzenegger's plan would need the mandatory insurance element in order to work. The mandate would ensure that the healthy and the young, who pay more in premiums than they spend on care, sign up for insurance.

"There will be a larger risk pool that will lower the individual premiums," Schwarzenegger told a gathering of healthcare professionals in Los Angeles on Thursday.

Massachusetts is the only other state that requires health insurance coverage. Even though its mandate doesn't kick in until July, the initial experience has been dispiriting.

When a state board created to help arrange coverage sought bids, insurers proposed premiums far above state projections: between $3,000 and $6,000 a year, depending on a person's age. Massachusetts is soliciting new bids, for less comprehensive coverage than originally planned.

Dr. Mark Smith, president of the California Health Care Foundation, an Oakland nonpartisan group that is analyzing the various proposals being considered in the Capitol, said any workable plan would have to "have some credible evidence that costs will be controlled." That, he said, "is the most questionable part of all the plans I've seen so far."

The minimum insurance policies that Schwarzenegger wants to require would cost less than those in Massachusetts, because in California they would be reserved for catastrophic illness or injury.

But the limited uses of those policies make them unappealing to some who would be required by law to buy them.

"I don't want to be forced to buy [health] insurance like I buy auto insurance," said Nick Trasente, a bartender and aspiring actor in Burbank.

Schwarzenegger acknowledged that high-deductible plans are not "the ideal situation," but he said they could help protect people from the kind of medical bills that cause bankruptcy. "I guarantee you," he said at a news conference last month, that an uninsured family hit with $150,000 in medical costs "would have been happier with the $5,000" deductible of a catastrophic policy.

But some people who already hold such policies say they are of little help when it comes to routine medical care, the kind that can help identify health problems before they become financially overwhelming.

Kari Picolla, a 28-year-old assistant to two actors in Glendale, purchased catastrophic insurance from Blue Cross of California after her regular coverage became too expensive. It costs $85 a month and pays for four doctor visits a year.

"I can definitely afford the premium. What I can't afford is healthcare, going to the doctor" after exceeding the visit limit. "It's $120 a pop if I go more than four times a year. Getting those bills is tough."

Catastrophic plans are even less attractive to older people and those who require regular medical care.

Jim Thompson, a 61-year-old musician from Santa Monica, wanted to retire early with his 54-year-old wife, Mara. But the cost of buying a comprehensive insurance policy would have been $1,300 a month.

"She has gone back to work full time for one reason only: healthcare," he said. Though the couple's financial picture is "rosy," he said, "our entire well-being is under threat, because without health insurance you can be wiped out."

On average last year, annual premiums in California cost $4,548 for individuals and $11,856 for families, according to a survey of employers by the California Health Care Foundation. Premiums rose 8.7% in 2006, more than twice the state's rate of inflation.

The state's Managed Risk Medical Insurance Board runs a last-resort insurance program for people private insurers won't take. But its offerings are not cheap: For the least expensive plan, families of three or more in Los Angeles County must pay between $10,050 and $14,245, depending on age.

Robin Corona, Shannon Corona's mother, looked into the program for her daughter, who makes more than the threshold. But the family determined that even the cheapest plan she could buy would be too much at $2,681 a year. .

Both parents are retired and said they want to help. But they have their own financial challenges, including the care of Shannon Corona's 91-year-old grandmother and her medical expenses. And Robin Corona said the insurance rates for her and her husband just went up.

"We can't help her, and that's where I feel terrible," Robin Corona said. "I'm not Rockefeller. Nobody can afford those prices.

"We're supposed to be the No. 1 nation in the world, but we're so far behind everybody," she added. "There's got to be a better way."

In Majority, Democrats Run Hill Much As GOP Did (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Democrats pledged to bring courtesy to the Capitol when they assumed control of Congress last month. But from the start, the new majority used its muscle to force through its agenda in the House and sideline Republicans.

And after an initial burst of lawmaking, the Democratic juggernaut has kept on rolling.

Of nine major bills passed by the House since the 110th Congress began, Republicans have been allowed to make amendments to just one, a measure directing federal research into additives to biofuels. In the arcane world of Capitol Hill, where the majority dictates which legislation comes before the House and which dies on a shelf, the ability to offer amendments from the floor is one of the minority's few tools.

Last week, the strong-arming continued during the most important debate the Congress has faced yet -- the discussion about the Iraq war. Democrats initially said they would allow Republicans to propose one alternative to the resolution denouncing a troop buildup but, days later, they thought better of it.

"It sounds like we're not doing what we said we would do -- I understand that," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Tuesday. "Here, however, we believe we are very justified in one of the most important issues confronting the country, which clearly was a huge issue in the election and which got bottled up in the Senate."

Republican leaders have been complaining daily about being pushed to the margins. "It's hypocritical because they campaigned on openness and bipartisanship," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.), adding that shutting out the minority hurts Congress. "It stifles debate and ideas and also manipulates the outcome."

And yet, significant numbers of House Republicans have voted along with Democrats on the legislation passed so far -- a fact that somewhat mutes criticism about iron-fisted tactics.

Some say Democrats risk being accused of the same abuse of power that Republicans were charged with when they were running Capitol Hill. Republicans became notorious for tactics such as prolonging a roll call vote for three hours in order to round up enough Republicans to pass a bill or failing to notify Democratic members of committee meetings or negotiating sessions.

"They're on thin ice now," Norman J. Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said of the new Democratic leaders. "I'm getting uneasy about this lack of amendments. . . . They're getting to the point where you're past the initial period where you've got an excuse to operate with a firm hand. It's going to be increasingly difficult to rationalize."

In May, months before her party won control of Congress and she became speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said "bills should generally come to the floor under a procedure that allows open, full and fair debate consisting of a full amendment process that grants the minority the right to offer its alternatives, including a substitute." After the election, Pelosi told the Associated Press: "The principle of civility and respect for minority participation in this House is something we promised the American people. It's the right thing to do."

In the first weeks of the new Congress, however, Democrats bypassed the usual legislative committees, refused to allow any amendments and took their agenda straight to the floor for passage. They said they needed a clear path to pass a handful of popular measures that were the basis of their successful November campaign, including expanded money for stem cell research, an increase in the federal minimum wage and implementation of recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Democrats said they would impose "regular order," the rules that permit the minority to participate more widely, in short order.

But even after passing their domestic agenda, Democratic leaders have continued to marginalize Republicans, preventing them from having a voice in legislation such as a bill to withhold federal pensions from lawmakers convicted of ethics felonies and a $463 billion bill to fund the federal government for the rest of this fiscal year.

"This is the legislative equivalent of 'the check is in the mail,' " said Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, referring to repeated promises by the Democrats to open up the legislative process to Republicans. "The Democrats are paying lip service to principle, but it's the same old high-handedness, except with a friendly face."

After watching the Senate stall over competing war resolutions and tangled discussions over the terms of debate, Hoyer and Pelosi said they wanted to prevent similar "confusion" in their chamber.

Republicans hoped to introduce a bill similar to one written by Rep. Sam Johnson, a Texas Republican who flew combat missions in Korea and Vietnam and was a prisoner of war in Hanoi. It says Congress would not cut off money for soldiers in the field. But Democrats worried it would place some members of their party in a difficult position.

The only way to avoid that was to limit discussion to one narrowly worded resolution, Hoyer said.

He said it left no room for "Well, I don't like that 'whereas' " or "I don't like that 'therefore.' " "It's very simple," Hoyer said. "If you've seen the resolution, you can read it in about 60 seconds. We support the troops, we're going to protect the troops, we disagree with the president's proposal."

Last week's debate on the Iraq war, culminating in its passage Friday by a vote of 246 to 182, was conducted under a "closed rule," which means Republicans could not offer alternatives. "I understand what they did on their agenda," said Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho). "But to do a closed rule on something like this is a huge mistake. We're talking about war and peace. You don't play politics with war."

In the closely divided Senate, Republicans made similar accusations when Democrats announced plans to introduce an Iraq resolution without permitting Republican alternatives.

"If this is allowed, this is the second bill in a row where no amendments were offered to the 49-member Republican minority," Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) said, referring to the $463 billion bill to fund the federal government as well as the Iraq resolution. "I've been here a couple of decades and I have a hard time recalling anything like this. It's inappropriate in a body that thrives on deliberation. . . . That's simply not acceptable on this side of the aisle."

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) suggested that McConnell had a short memory. "On a multitude of issues when we were in the minority, we had no opportunities to offer amendments or anything," Reid said.

And the Democrats are not completely running roughshod over Republicans, as the GOP did to the Democrats when they controlled Congress.

While they did not allow amendments on the Iraq debate, the Democrats gave every member of the chamber five minutes to speak on the resolution -- an unprecedented amount of debate on a nonbinding resolution, according to Thomas E. Mann, a scholar at Brookings Institution. He said that is more than the Republicans offered Democrats when the GOP passed a resolution last spring supporting the war in Iraq.

"So far the Democrats have had a rationale for each cluster of these votes," said Mann, who co-wrote a book about congressional dysfunction with Ornstein. "And they never said they were going to disarm. But they better pretty quickly find matters which they care about but allow reasonable deliberation in committee and amendments on the floor, or they're not going to be able to sustain this over time without damaging the institution."

Leftward, Ho? (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

THESE are balmy days on the American left — genuine, uncharacteristic sunniness unpolluted by some fluky political climate change. There is even talk of a — stutter, clear-throat, perish-thought — liberal resurgence.

Or, treading gingerly, a "liberal moment."

"Hell, ya, this is a liberal moment," exults Thomas Frank, author of "What's the Matter With Kansas?" — and yes, he even calls himself a "liberal" writer, eschewing the sleeker "progressive" stage name that many lefties are preferring these days. He declares this "liberal moment" loud and proud. Until the inevitable qualifier comes.

"A potentially liberal moment," Mr. Frank says, "assuming that liberal politicians can seize the moment and get beyond their usual plague of incompetence."

Oh, snap. Liberal optimism, thy name is caution and caveat.

But it is optimism nonetheless, and well-founded, too, say Mr. Frank and a broad spectrum of political thinkers and leaders. And, they say, the evidence goes beyond the obvious indicators — the ascendance of Democrats in the House and Senate, President Bush's second-term belly-flop and poll numbers showing the Democratic Party trending left and the nation's political center trending Democratic.

The chicken-egg riddle is how much this alleged "liberal moment" bespeaks genuine momentum for the left and how much stems from anti-Bush, antiwar, anti-Republican fervor.

In other words, liberal moment or conservative slump?

Both, presumably, for reasons that could be explained in part by the "mommy party/daddy party" cliché — that is, that voters typically favor Democrats ("mommy party") on social issues and Republicans ("daddy party") on national security.

"At the moment, daddy seems to have messed up the war in Iraq," says Rich Lowry, editor of the conservative National Review magazine, "so people are much more willing to listen to mommy, which helps Democrats."

But beyond the time-worn parental paradigm, it's clear that issues once largely walled off to the liberal hinterlands have suddenly gained mainstream acceptance and urgency. "There does seem to be momentum around a set of issues that have traditionally been the property of the left," says David M. Kennedy, the Stanford University historian.

Presidential candidates, for instance, can now safely utter "universal health care" without being tarred as supporters of "socialized medicine." Polls show increasing support for raising the minimum wage, stem-cell research, gay and lesbian civil unions, alternative-energy initiatives and increased financial aid to offset the escalating cost of college.

Republicans can no longer blockade the cause of global warming to the wild-haired left. Once derided as "Ozone Man" by the former President Bush, Al Gore is now up for a Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar (while California's non-Oscar-nominated Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, has been hailed as an environmental action hero for introducing stringent emissions standards).

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, posits that President Bush's abortive attempt in 2005 to privatize the New Deal totem of Social Security helped usher in what he agrees is "a liberal moment."

After the 2004 election, "there was reason to think we were in the midst of a conservative moment," said Mr. Frank (no relation to Thomas Frank). He recalls that there was concern, at first, that Mr. Bush — stout from his re-election — would win the support of young voters and prevail easily on Social Security.

But the foray "flopped totally," Mr. Frank said, and it became a "powerful affirmation of the public sector."

A few months later, Mr. Frank says, the Terri Schiavo case repudiated what he calls "the Republican moral agenda" and became a seminal event in the dawning of a "liberal moment."

"Republicans thought this was a great issue for them," Mr. Frank remembers. But then, all of a sudden, he said, "people realized that 'Hey, those guys are trying to come into my life.' "

A Gallup survey last month found that Democrats led Republicans by 34 percent to 31 percent in party affiliation — the largest Democratic advantage since the Clinton administration (34 percent of respondents identified themselves as independents).

By the same token, voters aged 18 to 25 are far more Democratic than previous generations, according to a 2006 survey by Pew Research. And the ratio of Democratic voters who describe themselves as "liberal Democrats" (32 percent) has risen steadily while the share of "conservative Democrats" has dropped (23 percent). Four years earlier, 27 percent of Democrats identified as conservatives, 26 percent as liberals.

The right is seen as divided, demoralized and possibly saddled with a top duo of Republican presidential candidates — John McCain and Rudy Giuliani — who could be unnervingly palatable to moderates and even liberals on certain issues (climate change and campaign finance for Mr. McCain; abortion and gay rights for Mr. Giuliani). A third, Mitt Romney, was just four years ago elected governor of a state — Massachusetts — that many Republicans regard as the political equivalent of a Superfund site.

Conservatives are quick to maintain that while these may indeed be (vegan) salad days for liberals, it's more likely a phase than an era — and not necessarily anything that portends a blanket repudiation of conservatism. They are much quicker to blame the Republican Party — and President Bush — for their current troubles.

"Republicans basically have a shattered brand right now," said Rep. Tom Feeney, a Republican of Florida and outspoken "movement conservative." He mentions one poll in which voters overwhelmingly trusted Democrats over Republicans on matters of fiscal discipline, a finding he called "scary."

Ultimately, Mr. Feeney said, any "liberal moment" will ultimately rest on the left's ability to govern. He says the early wave of legislation passed by the new Democratic majority in the House — the so-called "six-for-'06" — dealt with easy, popular issues like supporting stem-cell research and raising the minimum wage.

"Democrats might have an edge on health care right now," Mr. Feeney said. "But let's see what happens when they put something forward that scares the bejeezus out of everyone."

Mr. Feeney's conservative confidence mirrors the inherent ambivalence of many liberals — especially when it comes to internalizing their own successes.

Even in the sweetest of times, liberals tend to be congenitally averse to walking tall, as if they're always half-expecting to be one step away from getting decked by a falling piano.

Years of ridicule, battering and electoral defeat will do that. The liberal imprint has been trashed by generations of conservative candidates and commentators drilled in every unbecoming association ("tax and spend liberal," "big government liberal," "ivory tower liberal," "limousine liberal," "commie, hippie, purple haired, weak kneed, bleeding heart, limp-wristed, weepy eyed, take your choice liberal").

It's also an open-question as to whether the "liberal moment" could survive a truly "daddy party" event — like a domestic terrorist attack.

"We're at a moment where I think the disasters of the Bush administration's domestic and foreign policies are being appreciated," said Bruce Ackerman, a professor of law and political science at Yale University and author of "Before the Next Attack."

These failures constitute what Mr. Ackerman calls "an opening" for American liberals, but hardly a triumph.

"This is a moment of relative calm," he says. "We'll see where it leads."

White House: Moles Taken From Bush's Face Benign (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Two moles President Bush had removed from his face Friday were benign, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Saturday.

Dermatologist Steve Krivda from Walter Reed Army Medical Center/ National Naval Medical Center and Bush's regular doctor, Richard Tubb, removed the moles from Bush's left temple using a local anesthetic, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Bush has a 1-inch scab on his left temple that is expected to heal in a week to 10 days, but he does not have a bandage, Stanzel said.

He said Bush noticed one mole and had Tubb examine it Monday. Tubb then noticed the second mole and suggested they both be removed. Tests indicated they were not cancerous, according to the White House.

Bush had lesions removed from his face in December 2001 and December 2004. His most recent physical was in August 2006, the White House said.

Warnings Over Privacy Of U.S. Health Network (NYT)

By Robert Pear

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — The Bush administration has no clear strategy to protect the privacy of patients as it promotes the use of electronic medical records throughout the nation's health care system, federal investigators say in a new report.

In the report, the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress, said the administration had a jumble of studies and vague policy statements but no overall strategy to ensure that privacy protections would be built into computer networks linking insurers, doctors, hospitals and other health care providers.

President Bush has repeatedly called for the creation of such networks, through which health care providers could share information on patients. In 2004, Mr. Bush declared that every American should have a "personal electronic medical record" within 10 years — by 2014. With computerized records, he said, "we can avoid dangerous medical mistakes, reduce costs and improve care."

In response to the president's plea, federal officials have developed elaborate plans for what they describe as "a nationwide health information network." Mr. Bush has said: "One of the things I've insisted upon is that it's got to be secure and private. There's nothing more private than your own health records."

But in the report, issued this month, the G.A.O. said the administration had taken only rudimentary steps to safeguard sensitive personal data that would be exchanged over the network.

Senator Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, who requested the investigation, said it showed that "the Bush administration is not doing enough to protect the privacy of confidential health information." As a result, Mr. Akaka said, "more and more companies, health care providers and carriers are moving forward with health information technology without the necessary protections."

In written comments on the report, Jim Nicholson, the secretary of veterans affairs, who supervises one of the nation's largest health care systems, said, "I concur with the G.A.O. findings."

But Dr. Robert M. Kolodner, who coordinates work on information technology at the Department of Health and Human Services, disputed the findings. Dr. Kolodner said his department was "very committed to privacy and security as it works toward the president's goal" of switching medical records from paper to electronic files.

Mark A. Rothstein, the chairman of a panel that advises the government on health information policy, essentially agreed with the accountability office. "Health privacy has not received adequate attention at the Department of Health and Human Services," said Mr. Rothstein, a professor of law and medical ethics at the University of Louisville School of Medicine. "A sense of urgency is lacking."

Mr. Rothstein said "time is of the essence" because "the private sector is racing ahead" to establish medical record banks and health information exchanges. In December, he noted, Wal-Mart, Intel and other companies announced they were creating a huge database that could store the personal health records of more than 2.5 million employees and retirees. The companies promised they would have "stringent privacy policies and procedures."

Mr. Rothstein said Congress should not provide more money for a nationwide health information network unless the administration did more to protect the privacy of electronic medical records.

Dr. William A. Yasnoff, a physician and computer scientist who worked at the Department of Health and Human Services from 2002 to 2005, said he too had found that "the department does not have a comprehensive approach to privacy."

Explaining why he saw a need for stronger privacy protections in the digital age, Dr. Yasnoff said: "Anything you do to make information more accessible for good, laudable purposes will simultaneously make it more accessible for evil, nefarious purposes. People intuitively understand that, and they are worried."

The accountability office said doubts about privacy could slow the adoption and use of electronic medical records. Professor Rothstein offered a similar prediction, saying: "If privacy protections are not built into the network, people will not trust it. They won't participate, or they will opt out if they are allowed to."

Legislation to encourage the use of health information technology has broad bipartisan support but died in Congress last year, partly because of disagreements over privacy protections.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, lawmakers said, it is not clear how much control people would have over their electronic medical records.

Several members of Congress have drafted legislation to clarify consumers' control over such data. One proposal, by Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Representative Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, both Republicans, would establish health data banks in which people could store electronic copies of their medical records. Under the bill, a consumer would "maintain ownership over the entire health record" and could control access to it.

By contrast, under existing federal rules, hospitals and other health care providers generally do not have to obtain a patient's consent to use or disclose information for "treatment, payment or health care operations."

Should There Be A Hispanic Caucus? (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

As Latinos become a large minority, political alliances may turn out to be liabilities.

DOJ_NMG_0133341

YOU GO, Loretta Sanchez. Just keep walking away from that Congressional Hispanic Caucus. No, not just because of the nasty name caucus chief Rep. Joe Baca allegedly called you. But because you'll be undermining a political practice that will increasingly hurt Mexican American statewide candidates in the most politically powerful states in the nation.

From all accounts, Rep. Sanchez's public feud with Baca is highly personal. (She says he called her a "whore.") Nonetheless, the moment provides an opportunity to ponder whether Latino legislative caucuses haven't outlived their usefulness. I say it's time to abolish them.

It's not because I stand in principled opposition to the idea of ethnic solidarity. It's just that both the demographic calculus and the political rationale that gave rise to Latino caucuses have disappeared. And as Latinos move toward becoming the largest ethnic group in the two most populous states, such caucuses become a political liability to statewide candidates vying to represent all constituencies.

Latino caucuses emerged in the 1970s when Hispanics made up a small percentage of the U.S. population. Founded in 1976 on the model of the Congressional Black Caucus, the Congressional Hispanic Caucus sought to unify regional political movements — primarily Mexican Americans in the Southwest and Puerto Ricans in the Northeast — into a single, cohesive national voice.

However, since 1970, the Latino population has grown by a whopping 267%, and today Latinos make up more than one-third of all Texans and Californians. Given the ethnic political lag, it will take Latinos at least a dozen years to constitute a third of California voters. But once they become a majority of the state's population, within 25 years, won't it be a bit unseemly to have a California Latino Legislative Caucus?

Political scientists tend to stress the symbolic rather than the substantive importance of these state and federal caucuses. "It stands for Hispanic presence and unity," says Harry Pachon of USC's Tomás Rivera Policy Institute. But symbolism can cut both ways, and the idea of a soon-to-be-majority group maintaining an ethnic-specific caucus is likely to rub future minority voters the wrong way.

Tidy multiculturalist theories notwithstanding, most diverse, modern nations rely on unspoken compromises that ease tensions between a country's parts and its whole. We can all understand how troubling the formation of a white caucus in the Senate would be.

While not entirely analogous, the Scottish experience in contemporary British politics may hold a lesson for Latino politicians. Recent polls indicate that the Scottish ancestry of Tony Blair's heir apparent, Gordon Brown, is becoming a liability among English voters. It seems that the formation of a Scottish parliament in 1999 is raising questions among English voters about their tradition of accepting Scottish politicians as their own. British voters now regard Brown as Scottish (the part) and not British (the whole). And that bodes ill for the Labor Party candidate.

Of course, a caucus is not a parliament but a group in which co-ethnics or like-minded politicians can hash out ideas and formulate a unified stance. Yet other than a few targeted issues, Latino politicians have had a hard time finding common ground. Once bipartisan, in the 1990s the Congressional Hispanic Caucus lost its Cuban-American Republican contingent after then-caucus head Rep. Xavier Becerra took an ill-advised trip to Cuba. Likewise, scholars are finding that the Latino electorate is not a cohesive ethnic vote.

"The idea of the caucus was to present ethnic unity back when people thought that was the only way they could be important," says Columbia University's Rodolfo de la Garza. "Those days are over." Indeed, as the number of Latino elected officials has multiplied, so has the number of voices, and unity has become something of a chimera.

But don't mistake the absence of unity and the abolishing of Latino caucuses as a form of retreat. Most observers would agree that American Jews have considerable political influence. Today there are 30 Jewish House members and 13 Jewish senators. But historically, Jewish members have resisted the idea of establishing a formal caucus, in part because they have not wanted to invite a backlash.

It might also help to know that New Mexico, the only state that has a Mexican American governor, does not have a Latino legislative caucus. "With Hispanics making up 43% of the population and represented in all walks of life, there is no perceived need to organize as a political interest group," says Jose Zebedeo Garcia, who teaches politics at New Mexico State University.

We're not there yet in California and Texas, but we had best be prepared for the day.

Rudy Giuliani As Foreign Policy Guru? (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

DOJ_NMG_0133342

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

THE NORMAL rule in American politics is that if you run for president and your experience comes at the state level, most people will assume that foreign policy is your weak point. You can overcome that political vulnerability — as George W. Bush, Bill Clinton and other governors did while getting elected. One would presume that this applies even more to presidential candidates whose highest office reached is mayor. And yet we have the strange case of Rudolph Giuliani.

Giuliani's presidential campaign is starting to win a cult following among conservatives. It's not his position on domestic policy that's doing it — he has nothing to say about that. Lord knows it's not his social issue positions, which even his strongest backers acknowledge are his political weak point. No, he has somehow built a record as a foreign policy guru despite having no experience beyond the municipal level.

What are Giuliani's credentials? Everybody knows the basics. On Sept. 11, 2001, he rolled up his shirt sleeves and gave reassuring speeches. He has a tough guy persona. He expresses extremely strong disapproval for enemies of the United States. (For instance, Giuliani has bragged about asking President Bush to let him personally execute Osama bin Laden.)

All this makes Republicans swoon. Sometimes literally. Conservative pundit Danielle Crittenden recently penned a Valentine's Day poem to Giuliani. One section summarized his foreign policy skills thusly:

"A man who's locked out Arafat/And thrown vagrants into prison

Won't cringe before a Democrat/ Or allow Iran nuclear fission."

I'm no poetry critic, but I do know that a tough policy against the homeless is not a good proxy for the conduct of foreign policy.

If having a macho swagger and talking tough about bad guys were enough to make a good commander in chief, we wouldn't have the worst foreign policy disaster in U.S. history on our hands right now in Iraq. And, need I remind anybody, one of the reasons Giuliani hasn't been able to fulfill his Bin Laden execution fantasy is that Bush allowed the Al Qaeda leader to escape at Tora Bora by using Afghan proxies instead of U.S. ground troops.

As I noted in this space last week, conservative foreign policy consists increasingly of abstract notions divorced from reality. In preparing for last week's House debate over the Iraq troop surge, the Republican leadership instructed its members in a memo: "The debate should not be about the surge or its details. This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date, mistakes that have been made or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

So they're strong on foreign policy, except insofar as it involves actual policy. They tend to be much better, however, at comparing themselves to figures such as Winston Churchill or Abraham Lincoln. They make such comparisons incessantly. Last week, Giuliani said that Lincoln had "that ability that a leader has — a leader like George Bush, a leader like Ronald Reagan — to look into the future."

A few days later, the New York Times revealed that the 2002 postwar plan for Iraq envisioned a broadly representative Iraqi government, an intact Iraqi army and just a handful of U.S. troops remaining. I would say this is not a good job of looking into the future.

I'm sure Giuliani and his fans would dismiss such slip-ups, and there have been many, as mere detail. The important thing to them is leadership — Bush has it; Giuliani has it.

Giuliani raked in millions after 9/11, appearing at motivational seminars, where anybody with $49 could listen to him recount his 9/11 heroics and also take in speeches by such foreign policy titans as Zig Ziglar and Goldie Hawn. Giuliani also wrote a book promising to show "how the leadership skills he practices can be employed successfully by anyone who has to run anything."

But if anybody who buys his book can acquire the same leadership skills, why do we need Giuliani?

A Man With A Mission (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Mitt Romney spent last week on a presidential candidate announcement tour, speaking in Michigan and Iowa on Tuesday, then hitting South Carolina, New Hampshire and Boston before heading to Florida. Today, in the second installment of Outlook's occasional series on the presidential candidates, classmates, colleagues and competitors from the past remember Romney and his journey from former governor's son to former governor. Also inside: a crash course on the Mormon faith and public life.

Mitt Romney had about the same success as a Mormon missionary in France as most people had: not much.

I served with him in Bordeaux and Paris off and on for 18 months, and for several months we worked as a pair, canvassing the countryside together. A very common way of making contacts is by knocking door to door. We would try to make our approach as interesting as possible. We would introduce ourselves as missionaries from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day

Saints, say that we had a message about Jesus Christ and his appearance on the American continent. Could we have a moment of their time?

Usually the answer was: " Non, merc i."

It was an exercise in humility in the face of rejection. But Mitt always knew how to encourage us to keep going despite the many doors slammed in our faces. Primarily, he led by example. During our service, some of the missionaries had begun to feel that in keeping with their ministerial calling it was not appropriate to laugh out loud very much. Mitt always had a strong laugh and at the time of the proposed laughing ban, he was the top leader in the mission, assistant to the mission president. So he really dispelled the anti-laughing crowd, mostly with his humor.

In the middle of his service in France, he was the driver in an automobile accident in which a woman who was very dear to us was killed. He could have been much more morose, but he led us through that difficult time and returned to his cheery self.

While we were there, we read the book "Think and Grow Rich!" by Napoleon Hill. Some of our church leaders recommended that we use those concepts of positive thinking to overcome doubt and discouragement so we could perform at a higher level. They meant it as applied to our missionary work, but of course it could be applied to business as well. I've often said that Mitt and I read that book at the same time but he read it better than I did.

-- Dane McBride, served as a missionary in France with Romney

Mitt's father, George, was the governor of Michigan all the years that I knew Mitt at the Cranbrook school. This meant that a Michigan state police detail was at their home all the time. Mitt befriended some of the officers and they left police gifts with him: a shirt, a faux badge, a light, a police belt, among other tokens. Mitt had an innate wackiness, and after we all turned 16 and could drive, he, our friend Butch McDonald and I hatched a plot to use some of those gifts to frighten our unsuspecting dates from Kingswood, Cranbrook's sister school.

The school policy was that the girls could sign out until 11 p.m. on weekends. Earlier in the afternoon of our date, we planted empty beer bottles in the trunk of Butch's car. We agreed that at the appointed time, 10:45 p.m., our car would slowly approach a secluded section of dirt road near the school, and that we would pull over and turn out the lights. Mitt, driving a dark '65 American Motors vehicle (his father had revived that ailing car company before running for governor) topped with a revolving red light, and dressed in his goofy police uniform with a U.S. Air Force hat and dark glasses, came up behind us and approached the driver's window. In a gravelly voice, he asked the two of us to exit the vehicle and open the trunk. The bottles were discovered and rattled for effect. "Step back into the car, boys," the "officer" said, and returned to his vehicle. We expressed mock alarm, peeled out on the dirt road and rushed the girls into the school parking lot just in time. Minutes later, at the local drive-in, we three perpetrators reveled in our success.

Mitt Romney and I were members of the Cranbrook pep squad -- also called cheerleaders. We were un-coached and only barely organized. We did lead the occasional cheer, drawing on whatever we could remember from television or movies. Someone gave me a domesticated duck and suggested that I bring it to one of our football games as the unofficial school mascot. We were the Cranbrook Cranes, and the school mascot, an elegant, regal, long-legged crane, is emblazoned in many places around campus, including on every chair in the dining hall. So I thought it was quite the joke for the pep squad to show up with a squat, fat pseudo-crane mascot to cheer on the football players. The problem came at the end of the game. We had no place to keep the duck. Giving it to a restaurant was all I could think of. Then Mitt stepped forward and volunteered to take charge of our little mascot. He'd put it at his parents' house, where there was a small pond and it could live in a natural, duck-friendly setting until the next game.

The next week, however, as I carefully set up the duck pen on the sidelines, Mitt showed up at the game sans duck. It seems that when he went to get the duck to bring it to the game, all he could find was a small patch of feathers. A fox had gotten there first. Mitt could have laughed this off, as probably the rest of us would have. But he didn't. It was quite obvious that he not only felt sorry for the duck, he also felt sorry that he had let us down. We tried to let him off the hook as best as we could, but I suspect that to this day, he still feels bad about that duck. In fact, as the years went by, it was one of those things you knew not to bring up.

I will never forget Mitt calmly rattling off and quantifying the different financial problems of the Salt Lake City Olympics. He had been running the operation for a few weeks, and the magnitude of the issues was coming into focus. Tens of millions here, tens of millions there, and the media and sponsors riveting their attention on the scandals he had inherited. I asked how I could help. Because his Bain Capital had been my first institutional investor at Staples and he had been a member of our board for 15 years, he said he knew full well that I was too cheap to buy an Olympic sponsorship for $10 million or so. A few months later he called with a different opportunity. He had personally solicited Office Depot and Office Max to be Olympic sponsors. Both had turned him down. Thus, he could now offer me an opportunity to become an official Olympic "supplier." Much less money, but the ability to use the rings and tickets. I jumped at it. However, for weeks his normally crackerjack staff did not follow through with our marketing department.

Then Mitt called. "Tom, I am terribly sorry. Right around the time of our meeting, IMG persuaded the brand new Office Depot CEO to take a major sponsorship. You are out. I feel terrible given my history with you and Staples, but I have to respect what is best for the Games versus my personal relationships. I will get you guys some tickets, but unfortunately they will not be great. " I wasn't happy, but I knew it was how Mitt operated: he did the right thing, whether his friends liked it or not.

When Mitt assumed leadership as president and CEO of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee, everybody saw our Olympic Games as having a very black mark on them. The Justice Department was considering indicting us as an organizing committee. Finances were in very troubling condition. We simply didn't have the money to put on the Games. Mitt immediately worked on raising revenue and on cutting costs. Before he arrived, the organizing board used to have elaborate lunches accented with elegant decorations. I wasn't there, but that high-end catering was the stuff of rumors. For Mitt's first meeting, he served pizza and charged a dollar a slice. The message was clear: be responsible about how you spend money.

However, the budget challenge was nothing compared with the obligation to keep people from 83 nations safe at the Olympics just five months after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

I will never forget the Opening Ceremonies of the Olympic Games and watching Mitt, President Bush and Jacques Rogge, the president of the International Olympic Committee, standing at attention as the flag from the World Trade Center was brought in to the stadium by several athletes. A hushed, reverent crowd, more than 50,000 strong, listened as our national anthem was played.

Mitt and I were in Torino, Italy, together. I hope we'll be in Beijing together next year. He may have some other plans for the summer of 2008, but I know he would love to go.

-- Fraser Bullock, chief operating officer and chief financial officer of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee

After we were sworn in as governor and lieutenant governor in Massachusetts, Mitt and I received some very sobering news: The true budget gap was more than $3 billion (out of a $23 billion budget), up from the projected $1 billion gap. We had campaigned during the fiscal crisis of 2002-03, when many states, including Massachusetts, saw their tax revenue collapse and vowed to close the gap without raising taxes. Mitt asked his managers to accomplish the same work, with fewer resources, by developing new approaches. So instead of inspecting wetlands from the ground, the new leaner environmental affairs office increased enforcement actions by taking regular aerial photos of endangered wetlands. A plane could cover more ground more cheaply and effectively than a bureaucrat in a car. Two parks departments (one a legendary haven for no-show patronage positions) were merged despite the howls from legislators on both sides of the aisle who counted on securing well-paid summer jobs by the public pool for kids of their friends and relatives. Mitt provided leadership in tough times, spurred innovation, honored the work behind each tax dollar and respected families -- that's the Mitt Romney I worked with for the past four years.

I had known Mitt Romney for more than 20 years when I went to speak to him in his campaign office in early 1994. We attended the same church and I know a couple of his children quite well and they're all lovely people. But there's a difference between being a lovely family and being a knowledgeable leader. When I went to see him, he had recently announced that he was running against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and I thought it would be important for him to hear from someone who'd been active in women's politics in Massachusetts.

I congratulated him on taking a pro-choice position, one of the reasons I had been open to working with him. I remember his response was something like: "Well, this is Massachusetts. I realized I had to take this position," which was the first indication to me that what I had understood to be his personal view was a stance he was actually taking pragmatically. He went on that day to talk about an aunt of his who had died during a botched abortion and how he thought legalized abortion was important. But those around him, and people who knew him closely in the ward, knew that it was a position he had taken because he thought he had to in order to win.

I watch with interest as Mitt Romney courts the conservative wing of the Republican Party with his antiabortion message. It reminds me of a pivotal moment in the 2002 campaign for governor of Massachusetts. In the final few weeks before the election, the polls indicated that although I had enjoyed a lead over Romney after I won the primary, the barrage of negative ads was helping to narrow the margin heading into the general election. In preparing for the final debate of the campaign, one strategy was to expose Romney's record of waffling on the issue of abortion, an important topic for a majority of voters in Massachusetts. I pointed out that, in his 1994 race against Sen. Ted Kennedy, Romney had accepted the endorsement of a pro-life group, and that when he was living in Utah while running the Olympics, his close friend and adviser had written a letter to the editor stating that Romney was not pro-choice and had taken on that label only to run against the senator. Romney responded that his support for a woman's right to an abortion was deep and long-held, dating to the early 1970s. He stated that since the 1970s, he had agreed with his mother, an unsuccessful candidate for the U.S. Senate, that to support abortion reflected an important belief in the separation of church and state. He was angered by my statements. He chastised me for being "unbecoming" because I was trying to scare the voters on this important issue, and insisted that he was truly pro-choice and "devoted and dedicated to honoring [his] word" on this issue. In that exchange, he was able to not only solidify his image as a strong pro-choice advocate, he was also masterful in spinning the story afterward that I was overly aggressive and indeed "unbecoming," because I had insisted that he was not telling the truth.

Mitt had hired me as a young associate at Bain & Co. in 1978, and we worked together occasionally between then and 1983, when we laid the foundations for the creation of Bain Capital. We started with a vision but virtually no experience in the realm that is now known as private equity. For six months, we traipsed around the United States, Europe and Latin America, seeking investors to back our plan, getting plenty of "no, thank yous" along the way.

One potential investor was concerned that we would spend lavishly on fancy offices and needless expenses. I could tell that this bothered Mitt, because he is very careful about spending. Finally, I told the gentleman: "You need to understand how frugal Mitt is. When he and Ann go to the movies, they pop their own popcorn in advance. Mitt figures the home-popped Orville Redenbacher costs him only 62 cents, which is a whole lot cheaper than $4.50 for the big tub at the movie counter."

-- Coleman Andrews, co-founded Bain Capital with Romney in 1983.

When Mitt was at Bain Capital, I referred a couple of deals to him. In that business, you have to be a vacuum cleaner and amass more facts about the investment than anyone else in the world. That's a skill set that serves him well. Romney was so successful as a private equity investor that he was able to command a 30 percent share of the profits for Bain as general partner. That figure normally would be 20 percent. He was the most successful private equity investor in the country and with his track record, people were happy to give a 30 percent share to Bain. If you pay sufficient attention to detail you have less risk. And with him, nothing is left to chance unless it has to be. He is running his campaign that way -- marvelous planning at all levels.

Debate Over Iraq Follows McCain To Iowa (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

Crowd's Questions Indicate Senator's Presidential Bid May Be Tied Closely to War

DES MOINES, Feb. 17 -- The war in Iraq followed Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) to Iowa on Saturday, as the Republican presidential candidate faced a series of skeptical questions about the lack of progress in the conflict and whether he or anyone has a plan for success.

It became clear from the opening minutes of his first meeting of the day just how much the presidential aspirations of the senator, who is one of the leading advocates of President Bush's troop-increase policy, may be tied to events in Iraq.

During the hour-long town hall meeting, McCain drew questions about the cost of the war, the prospects for success, the dangers of failure, the treatment of veterans and the new threats from Iran.

Throughout, he walked a line between strong advocacy for the troop buildup as the best chance to avoid a bloodletting in Iraq and defensiveness over the lack of progress and the growing impatience on the part of the public over what he said has been a badly mismanaged war effort dating back years.

"I know how tough it is for the American people," he told an audience of several hundred people. "I know how frustrated Americans are. I know how saddened we are when we lose our most precious treasure. I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I could not be honest with you without telling you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic and there would be genocide and chaos."

McCain's visit was his first to Iowa since establishing his presidential campaign committee. On a day when Democratic presidential candidates were tearing up their schedules to return to Washington for the unsuccessful Senate vote to begin debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop buildup, McCain chose to go ahead with a full day of events in Iowa.

McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade.

He ridiculed the action as a "purely political stunt" that was "insulting to the public and our soldiers" in Iraq. "This may be how Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi construe their responsibilities, but it's not how I construe mine," he told reporters.

Still, there was no escaping a debate over the war, even before a largely Republican audience that included veterans of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan, and their relatives.

McCain advisers think Republicans likely to vote in next year's Iowa precinct caucuses, which will kick off the presidential nominating contests, generally support Bush's, and by implication McCain's, position on Iraq. But McCain noted Saturday that he is aware that his views are at odds with those of a majority of Americans nationally.

"I don't know the views frankly of caucus-goers on this particular issue," he said. "But I unfortunately know the views of a majority of Americans."

The first question in Des Moines came from a veteran of two tours in Iraq and a tour in Afghanistan who said Americans are not being told about the progress in Iraq. McCain said progress has been overshadowed by the violence there -- and said Americans are understandably frustrated because of overly optimistic expectations raised by defenders of the war.

"We raised people's expectations -- 'mission accomplished,' 'few dead-enders,' 'last throes' -- all of those comments that made Americans believe that we were on the verge of getting this thing done," he said. Instead, he added, the war has been a "long, tough struggle that we should have told the American people about."

McCain said he has no fallback plan if the policy of sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq fails. "We live in a democracy, and when the American people don't support -- as we learned in Vietnam, as we learned in Beirut, as we learned in Somalia -- then we are not able to maintain a foreign endeavor. I can give you lots of options, but I'm hard-pressed to find one that will have the support of the American people."

A man who said his son had served in Afghanistan and Iraq challenged McCain to explain what it would cost the country to succeed in Iraq. McCain said he didn't know, other than to say it will take a long time before it is clear whether the United States is succeeding militarily.

"In terms of dollars and lives, I can't give you an estimate, except to say, sir, I think it's going to be very expensive," he said, "but not as expensive as the bloodletting, the killing fields that will take place in Baghdad if we just left."

Also Saturday, McCain won the endorsement of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), whose popularity among social conservatives could help McCain here in Iowa and elsewhere.

Thune said he recognizes that McCain has taken some positions that are not popular among conservatives but added that he extracted a promise from the Arizonan that he would appoint conservative jurists to the federal bench.

Without identifying them by name, Thune said McCain's rivals have questionable records on the issue of abortion. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani supports abortion rights, while former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney has changed his views and now opposes abortion. "Whether you like him or not, McCain has been consistent on issues," Thune said.

No Retreat On Iraq Stance, McCain Insists (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

DES MOINES, Feb. 17 — Senator John McCain arrived in Iowa on Saturday to begin testing one of the biggest questions so far of the presidential campaign: Can he win as an all-out supporter of the war in Iraq?

Almost from the moment he took the stage at his first event here since forming his presidential exploratory committee, Mr. McCain made clear that he was not backing down when it came to the war, and that in political terms, he might see an advantage in presenting himself to the first Republican voters in the nominating process as an unapologetic advocate for the war in Iraq.

He attacked Senate Democrats for what he called “a political stunt” in trying to join the House in passing a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush’s plan to send more troops to Baghdad. He warned of catastrophic consequences if the United States abandoned its effort in Iraq.

He belittled the White House for falsely raising hopes by asserting early American successes in the war. And he spent nearly 60 minutes fielding questions and challenges from an audience of Republicans, many of them clearly with Mr. McCain on the issue but others anguished over the war.

"I know how tough it is for the American people, I know how frustrated Americans are, I understand your frustration," Mr. McCain said. "I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic."

To be here, Mr. McCain skipped the debate in the Senate — he called the rare Saturday session in the Capitol "insulting to the public and our soldiers" — but the war was as omnipresent in the Des Moines hotel ballroom as it was in Washington.

It brought to life what has become a central strategic gamble for the McCain campaign: that his support of the war in Iraq would help him among the select groups of Iowa Republicans who will caucus here next January. It is a position that gives him an opportunity to reassure Republican activists here who have not forgotten or forgiven his frequent criticisms of the administration in the earlier years of Mr. Bush's presidency, according to state party officials.

"Even if it's not popular in the general election, everybody in the Republican primary process is supporting the surge," said Mark McKinnon, one of Mr. McCain's senior advisers.

In many ways, Mr. McCain finds himself in the opposite situation of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. He has embraced a position that may lift him through the primaries, but that could complicate his prospects against an antiwar Democrat in the general election, his own advisers said.

Mr. McCain's aides could barely contain their frustration, as Mr. McCain sailed off on this maiden voyage of his campaign, at the extent to which perhaps the most important factor in determining the 2008 race was beyond of their control. One aide, who was granted anonymity in order to offer a rather gloomy appraisal of Republican hopes for holding the White House in 2008, said that if the situation Iraq deteriorated or even stayed the same, it would be a major liability for the Republican who won the presidential nomination.

"Republicans are in a tough spot — there's nobody running for president who controls the destiny of what happens there," the aide said. "I do think as Republicans we have to get to a difference place on Iraq or we are in trouble as a party."

Mr. McCain's first stop Saturday suggested just how torn Americans are about this war, regardless of party. A questioner who introduced himself as a veteran of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan drew an ovation that lasted nearly 60 seconds. But moments later, Mr. McCain faced skeptical questioning from Marty Baddeloo, a business coach who lives in West Des Moines and who said he had a son who served in Iraq, about how much money — and how many lives — would be needed for Mr. McCain to accomplish his mission.

"I'd like to know what it's going to cost to be successful in Iraq," Mr. Baddeloo said. "Assuming you are elected president, if your plans are implemented, what is it going to cost in terms of time and dollars for us to be successful in Iraq?"

Mr. McCain, holding a wireless microphone and wearing a loose-fitting brown leather jacket, answered with a subdued tone. "I'd like to be able to give you an answer, sir," he said. "And you reflect the frustration that many Americans feel."

While the war in Iraq looms as a political liability for the major Republican contenders — Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, have also expressed support for Mr. Bush's war policy — none have been as closely identified with the war effort as Mr. McCain. And Mr. McCain showed no signs of walking away from a war that, his advisers said, he arguably owns as much as Mr. Bush does.

"I don't know what the other options are," Mr. McCain said when one questioner asked what would happen if this escalation of 21,500 troops — fewer than Mr. McCain had advocated — failed to work. "Because if we fail here — I'm going to give you very straight talk here — it's not going to maintain the support of the American people. I can give you lots of options, but I'm hard-pressed to find one that will get the support of the American people."

And he was disdainful of Senate Democrats, mocking them for pushing through a procedural vote in the Senate on a Saturday. "I'm more than willing to discuss Iraq and my views, but I think it's insulting to the public and our soldiers to pretend we are discharging our responsibilities in any meaningful way."

Mr. McCain said again at a news conference on Saturday morning that political factors played no role in his views. "I've said all along I cannot be concerned or will not be concerned if it helps me or hurts me with anyone," he said. "Its an issue that transcends any political ambitions I might have."

Still, that is something that Mr. McCain's advisers — thinking about both the primary battle and a general election fight — have given much thought to. Mr. McCain's advisers said they thought that he could be insulated to some extent by a failure of American policy in Iraq because of the fact that he has long been critical of the way the war was handled; he called for an increase in troop strength there long before Mr. Bush acted.

"The fact of the matter is McCain has been saying this for three years and maintained from Day 1 that we don't have enough troops there," said Dave Roederer, the Iowa chairman of Mr. McCain's campaign.

And Mr. McCain was openly scornful of the White House for raising expectations among the American public by making statements that conveyed that the effort in Iraq was far more successful than it actually was.

"We raised people's expectations: mission accomplished, a few dead-enders, last throes," he said. "All those comments that made Americans believe we were on the verge of getting this thing done when in reality on the ground, as you saw, it was a long, hard struggle that we should have told people that it is."

Mr. McCain's aides said they saw one upside for Mr. McCain now: that his position on the war could help him through the months ahead.

"In the Republican primary, this is going to be good for Senator McCain," said Russ Schriefer, Mr. McCain's media adviser. "It makes him more of a Republican. To those who might have been uneasy about him not being enough of a team player it shows him as very much a team player on this issue."

"Amen" To Brownback (TSSC)

By Lee Bandy

The State, February 18, 2007

Three weeks ago, an estimated 350 Republican Party activists attended a luncheon in Columbia for GOP presidential hopeful Sam Brownback.

Many came out of curiosity.

The U.S. senator from Kansas, viewed as an "ideologue," is considered by many the leading "Christian right" candidate in the race.

Brownback certainly didn't disappoint his audience, made up mostly of religious conservatives. Members punctuated the air with shouts of "amen" and "praise the Lord." It sounded more like a revival service than a political gathering.

Many conservatives and religious leaders view Brownback as a serious candidate to succeed President George W. Bush.

Whether Brownback does, there's little doubt he will become a major figure in U.S. public life and an increasingly critical player in its governing coalitions.

On the stump, Brownback preaches the gospel of the Christian right, stating his strong opposition to abortion and gay marriage.

Like Ronald Reagan, Brownback believes "America must be that 'Shining City on a Hill,' where faith, moral values and respect for life are celebrated."

He tells audiences, "I am unequivocally pro-life and believe in upholding the sanctity of marriage between one man and one woman."

Brownback says his stance on moral values will distinguish him from others vying for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

To that end, he and his staff have gone out of their way to portray former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's position on abortion as highly questionable.

They charge that Romney — who supported abortion rights before, more recently, opposing them — is no true-blue conservative.

"I think there's room in the field for someone with full-scale conservative values," Brownback recently told a Spartanburg audience.

And he made it clear he was that individual.

Religious conservatives, an important voting bloc for the GOP, comprise about a third of the Republican vote in S.C. primaries.

Brownback is one of the most conservative, religious, politicians in America today. A born-again Christian, he is engaged in humanitarian causes abroad. If there were any doubts that Brownback is a member of the Christian right, they were removed recently with the appointment of Nashville gospel-recording artist Michael W. Smith, as national co-chairman of the Brownback campaign.

But just when he thought he was home free as the Christian right's candidate, Brownback picked up competition for that vote with Monday's entry into the race of former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

An ordained Southern Baptist preacher, Huckabee has a big following in the evangelical community. He also has written a fun new book that should give him a bit of a national platform, according to "The Hotline," a Washington, D.C.-based political Web site.

Huckabee could be the break-out candidate in Iowa. But he lacks money and organization, says Drew McKissick, a Christian Coalition board member from Columbia.

South Carolina might be easier for Huckabee, Hotline said. But if he's not careful, Brownback might sew up the state's remaining social conservative endorsements before Huckabee can build any momentum.

Clinton Gives War Critics New Answer On '02 Vote (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

One of the most important decisions that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton made about her bid for the presidency came late last year when she ended a debate in her camp over whether she should repudiate her 2002 vote authorizing military action in Iraq.

Several advisers, friends and donors said in interviews that they had urged her to call her vote a mistake in order to appease antiwar Democrats, who play a critical role in the nominating process. Yet Mrs. Clinton herself, backed by another faction, never wanted to apologize — even if she viewed the war as a mistake — arguing that an apology would be a gimmick.

In the end, she settled on language that was similar to Senator John Kerry's when he was the Democratic nominee in 2004: that if she had known in 2002 what she knows now about Iraqi weaponry, she would never have voted for the Senate resolution authorizing force.

Yet antiwar anger has festered, and yesterday morning Mrs. Clinton rolled out a new response to those demanding contrition: She said she was willing to lose support from voters rather than make an apology she did not believe in.

"If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from," Mrs. Clinton told an audience in Dover, N.H., in a veiled reference to two rivals for the nomination, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

Her decision not to apologize is regarded so seriously within her campaign that some advisers believe it will be remembered as a turning point in the race: either ultimately galvanizing voters against her (if she loses the nomination), or highlighting her resolve and her willingness to buck Democratic conventional wisdom (if she wins).

At the same time, the level of Democratic anger has surprised some of her allies and advisers, and her campaign is worried about how long it will last and how much damage it might cause her.

"Some of her many advisers think she should've uttered the three magic words — 'I was wrong' — but she believes it's self-evident that the Senate Iraq resolution was based on false intelligence and never should've come to a vote," said Richard C. Holbrooke, the former United Nations ambassador and an adviser to Mrs. Clinton on foreign policy.

Navigating the antiwar anger, and toughing it out for 11 months until the primaries, is now perhaps Mrs. Clinton's biggest political challenge. Indeed, in many ways at this stage, Iraq has overtaken her and other candidates' campaigns, as was evident yesterday as she rearranged her schedule to appear briefly in New Hampshire before returning to the Senate for a debate on Mr. Bush's war strategy.

The campaign began a push yesterday to deal with its Iraq challenge. Besides her remarks in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton submitted a bill in the Senate to block sending more troops to Iraq, though she would not cut off financing. In a new video on her Web site, she called for starting to redeploy troops within 90 days — or else, she threatened, Congress should revoke authorization for the war.

"She is in a box now on her Iraq vote, but she doesn't want to be in a different, even worse box — the vacillating, flip-flopping Democratic candidate that went to defeat in 2000 and '04," said one adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "She wants to maintain a firmness, and I think a lot of people around her hope she maintains a firmness. That's what people will want in 2008."

Indeed, Mrs. Clinton believes that reversing course on her vote would invite the charge of flip-flopping that damaged Mr. Kerry or provoke the kind of accusations of political expediency that hung over Al Gore in 2000 and her and her husband, President Bill Clinton, in the 1990s, several advisers said. She has argued to associates in private discussions that Mr. Gore and Mr. Kerry lost, in part, because they could not convince enough Americans that they were resolute on national security, the associates said.

Mrs. Clinton's image as a strong leader, in turn, is critical to her hopes of becoming the nation's first female president. According to one adviser, her internal polling indicates that a high proportion of Democrats see her as strong and tough, both assets particularly valuable to a female candidate who is seeking to become commander in chief. Apologizing might hurt that image, this adviser said.

Mrs. Clinton's belief in executive power and authority is another factor weighing against an apology, advisers said. As a candidate, Mrs. Clinton likes to think and formulate ideas as if she were president — her "responsibility gene," she has called it. In that vein, she believes that a president usually deserves the benefit of the doubt from Congress on matters of executive authority.

Yet some Democrats are surprised that the Clinton campaign, which is widely regarded as a ferocious political operation, has not lanced this issue. After all, they said, a majority of Democrats tell pollsters they are against the war, and many Americans want a firm deadline to leave Iraq. Mrs. Clinton has called for capping the troop level, but has opposed a deadline.

"For the life of me I don't understand why she can't say, 'I made a mistake, I was misled, the country was misled, the intelligence was manipulated,' " said Robert M. Shrum, a senior adviser to Mr. Kerry in 2004. "I think there's this tremendous desire in her campaign not to get into a position where you're identified with traditional Democratic views. But this is now a party that is strongly antiwar, and is desperate for change on big issues like Iraq and health care."

Yet Mrs. Clinton's refusal to apologize yesterday in Dover drew support from some voters, and she also won strong applause for saying her priority now is to end the war.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have been split for some time about whether she would be better off if she apologized for the vote. Mark Penn, her chief strategist, who was also Mr. Clinton's pollster, carries considerable influence within the campaign, and he agrees with her that she should keep the "mistake" onus on Mr. Bush and turn her attention to finding "the right end" to the war, as she says.

Foreign policy advisers say they have made similar arguments: look to the future, not the past, and stand by a vote that was based on military intelligence that was widely accepted at the time.

The campaign faction that was more comfortable with an apology included advisers with war-room instincts who wanted to deal proactively with the attacks that would come. Yet they were torn, too. They argued that she should talk about the future, yet also deal decisively with her 2002 vote — either by saying it was wrong, or acknowledging that others saw it as wrong, or making a speech on Iraq.

The internal campaign debate concluded in December when Mrs. Clinton decided not to apologize or give a speech. Instead, she went on the "Today" show and, in a little-noticed remark, simply said she would not vote for the Senate Iraq resolution again.

By comparison, to the annoyance of Clinton advisers, Mr. Edwards has proved able to short-circuit questions about his own Senate vote for military action in 2002 by repeatedly calling it a mistake. He took a hard line against Iraq in 2002, then veered sharply in 2005 when he said he was wrong on the vote, and he has not suffered much politically.

A leading Republican candidate, Senator John McCain of Arizona, has defended the current war plan with language that could appeal to primary voters but perhaps hurt him in a general election. Mrs. Clinton is running, in part, a general-election strategy — taking positions on Iraq that might appeal to independents and some Republicans.

Yet her motivation not to apologize goes deeper than that, advisers said.

Her approach to leadership and national security was forged during her eight years in the White House: She believes in executive authority and Congressional deference, her advisers say, and is careful about suggesting that Congress can overrule a commander in chief.

"She thinks she will be president and will have to negotiate on the nation's behalf with world leaders," said one Clinton adviser. "She thinks we're likely to still be in this mess in 2009, and coming onto the campaign trail and groveling and saying at every opportunity that you made a mistake doesn't actually help you solve the problem."

GOP Hawks Circling Clinton's Campaign (LAT)

By Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Old enemies of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are out in force. Just weeks after she joined the Democratic Party's flock of presidential contenders, Clinton is being targeted by conservative and Republican-allied activists intent on derailing her campaign before the start of next year's primaries.

They have surfaced with a flurry of planned projects: a Michael Moore-style documentary film, book-length exposes, and websites such as StopHerNow.com and StopHillaryPAC.com.

Conservative admirers of the Swift Vets and POWs for Truth media blitz that helped torpedo Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004 are now agitating to "Swift-boat" Clinton.

"People are doing what they're doing because they want to defeat her before she has a chance to win. You can't hold off your silver bullet to the end," said veteran Republican operative David N. Bossie, who is involved in the film project with Dick Morris, a former advisor to Bill Clinton.

The emerging moves against Hillary Clinton reflect the accelerated pace of the 2008 race and conservatives' growing conviction that she poses a formidable threat that requires fast and early footwork.

The New York senator has been publicly bracing for "Republican machine" attacks from the moment she launched her exploratory committee last month.

Whether she can strike back quickly may prove crucial to winning over Democratic primary voters looking for assurance that she can survive a bruising general election and Swift-boat-style attacks.

"For Democrats, there's a strong sense this time around that they can't allow those same tactics to define Democratic candidates," said Democratic media consultant Jim Margolis.

At a recent Democratic National Committee gathering in Washington, Clinton told party officials, "I know how they think, how they act and how to defeat them" — a battle call echoing her 1998 evocation of a "vast right-wing conspiracy" during the furor over her husband's affair with intern Monica S. Lewinsky.

Every presidential candidate is scrutinized by opponents. But conservative antipathy toward Clinton is especially deep and long-standing — inflamed in part by her husband's two terms in the White House, her steady rise from first lady to senator, and the widespread belief on the right that the Clintons evaded justice during the nonstop investigations of the 1990s.

Clinton's foes on the right openly tell their supporters she is a ripe target for a campaign reminiscent of the challenge of Kerry's Vietnam War record.

"Those Swift Boat Veterans for Truth were the real heroes of the 2004 election," one online exhortation reads. "We at the StopHillaryPAC want to do the same thing to Hillary."

That group's website, headed by former Rep. John LeBoutillier (R-N.Y.), collected enough early funding to launch a round of negative television ads on Iowa stations timed to Clinton's visit there in late January.

StopHerNow.com mocks her with cartoon skits. And several books marketed as exposes are in the works, in addition to at least six other anti-Clinton books already hawked on conservative talk radio and blogs.

Bossie's film, scheduled for release by year's end, is being funded through appeals from Citizens United, a conservative interest group.

Bossie, a blunt-spoken opposition researcher who has mined Clinton controversies since Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, said that the film would mimic the hard-edged partisan style of left-wing filmmaker Moore and that camera-carrying "trackers" would tail Clinton during campaign events.

Bossie is delving into Hillary Clinton's roles in the Whitewater real estate deals, her $100,000 profit from cattle futures and the firing of White House travel officials — controversies that Clinton aides dismiss as old news. He and GOP allies are convinced new nuggets will turn up —and they also see new opportunities in contrasting Clinton's avowed centrism with what they call her "polarizing liberalism."

"Conservatives believe she's more dangerous today as a potential president than when she tried to take over the healthcare plan and root it in socialism," said public relations man Greg Mueller, who handled media appearances for anti-Kerry veterans in 2004.

Bossie and his Citizens United partners have long vexed the Clintons and Democratic presidential contenders. Morris — the architect of Bill Clinton's mid-1990s political revival until he was fired in August 1996 after revelations he consorted with a prostitute — declined interview requests from The Times, though he has discussed the movie on Fox News. Bossie said his partner's past "is an acceptable risk we'll take because of Dick's personal knowledge of Hillary Clinton."

Citizens United's chairman is Floyd G. Brown, a GOP media consultant who worked on the 1988 "Willie Horton" ad that blamed Democratic presidential candidate Michael S. Dukakis for the weekend furlough of a convicted murderer who went on to commit a rape. Democrats charged that the ad exploited racial fears.

Bossie worked with Brown in the 1992 presidential campaign and later served as chief investigator for a House investigation of Clinton administration fundraising scandals. Bossie was fired from that post in 1998 for releasing transcripts of prison conversations involving Hillary Clinton's convicted former law partner, Webster L. Hubbell.

Several people behind the upswing in anti-Clinton activity say there is no coordination among the groups.

"We're doing our own thing," said Dick Collins, a Dallas businessman who gave $135,000 in StopHerNow.com seed money. The site is a spinoff from a PAC originally aimed at Clinton's Senate reelection by New York GOP strategist Arthur Finkelstein.

Collins, who has also donated $10,000 to GOP presidential hopeful Rudolph W. Giuliani's political action committee, said the site was starting out with "light humor," featuring Clinton as a cartoon character: the host of an imaginary left-wing talk show. But he added that the site — organized, like the Swift-boat group, as a "527" organization that can raise unlimited "soft money" donations — would "try other things."

Collins hopes for financing from heavyweight Texas GOP donors like oilman T. Boone Pickens and Houston real estate developer Robert Perry. Multimillion-dollar donations from the two businessmen underwrote the Swift-boat group's campaign against Kerry.

"The Swifties played hardball," Collins said, "but the Clintons play the game a lot tougher than anybody else."

Hillary Clinton's longtime spokesman, Howard Wolfson, dismissed the early GOP moves with characteristic terseness: "One thing people know about the Clintons is they know how to fight back."

When a thinly sourced report from a conservative Web magazine falsely claimed last month that Clinton researchers had uncovered evidence showing that presidential rival Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) had been educated at an Islamist madrasa in Indonesia, Clinton's team moved swiftly to dismiss the story.

Clinton's allies criticize Kerry's response to the 2004 Swift-boat ads as inconsistent and slow. And though Kerry used surrogates to repeatedly counter the attacks, he didn't personally respond until the ads had sown deep doubts among voters.

"She's going to face the same choices," warned one former Kerry aide. "It's not just how fast you respond, it's choosing the right time to unload your big guns."

Advertising her toughness poses a delicate problem for Clinton as she tries to temper her reputation for ambition and political calculation. "She wants to make clear she won't be a punching bag," said a prominent Democrat who requested anonymity because of past relations with several contenders. "But you don't want to reinforce the very thing you're trying to soften."

Clinton campaign insiders say Web-savvy staffers are immersed in monitoring suspected enemy blogs and websites and conservative cable TV and radio talk shows.

Clinton also reportedly spent lavishly to hire a large team of opposition researchers headed by Judd Legum, previously research director for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank headed by former Clinton White House chief of staff John Podesta.

Clinton allies say she helped launch Podesta's group in 2003 and played a key role in starting Media Matters for America, which describes itself as "monitoring, analyzing and correcting conservative misinformation in the U.S. media." Run by David Brock, a former right-wing muckraker who once targeted the Clintons and now defends them, Media Matters was a latecomer to the Swift-boat volleys of 2004 but now has a full staff of researchers.

Brock said the emerging conservative efforts targeting Hillary Clinton operate as an "organized defamation industry" using "the same tactics in mutually reinforcing ways, often with the same funding, with a vast media echo chamber at their disposal."

L. Brent Bozell III, who heads the conservative Media Research Center, said Brock's group did the same, only as "part of the Clinton machine." Bozell has more than a passing interest in Clinton's campaign. He is working on his own Clinton book, aiming to expose "media complicity in Hillary's attempted makeover as a centrist."

Clinton intimates said she would also eventually rely on veterans of her husband's administration such as James Carville and Paul Begala to run interference on television, and on the street-fighter instincts of longtime political aide Harold M. Ickes for behind-the-scenes advice.

"We tend to think the blogs will drive a lot of the news," Ickes said recently.

"Even if you think it's completely false or outlandish, you ignore it at your peril."

While Reid Stays Out Of '08 Fray, Sen. Clinton Signs His Son (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) has pledged not to pick among his many friends running for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, choosing instead to focus his time and energy on making Nevada's new early caucus as successful as possible.

With Reid not committing, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) found the next-best thing -- signing his eldest son, Rory, as both the chair of her campaign in the Silver State and an adviser on Western issues.

Rory Reid currently serves as the chairman of the Clark County Commission -- that's Las Vegas's county -- and is a past chairman of the Nevada state party. He is the only one of Reid's four sons in elected office.

In landing him, Clinton strikes the first major blow of the Nevada caucus contest, newly added to the party's early nominating calendar by the Democratic National Committee last year. The caucus is set for Jan. 19, sandwiched between Iowa's Jan. 14 caucuses and New Hampshire's Jan. 22 primary.

So is it like father, like son? Not necessarily. Harry Reid's allies insist he is committed to staying neutral in the race, regardless of Rory's decision. Even so, The Fix bets that Reid -- Harry, that is -- will be fielding calls from Barack Obama (Ill.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joe Biden (Del.) in the very near future.

Democratic Candidate Tailors Message to Reflect a Connection to Civil Rights Struggles

ORANGEBURG, S.C., Feb. 17 -- Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) took his presidential campaign to the heart of the Deep South for the first time this weekend, tailoring his campaign message to associate himself with the civil rights movement.

With a Kenyan father who was not descended from African slaves, Obama is unlike Southern black candidates, steeped in the slavery and civil rights struggles that tore at the region for more than a century. Neither is he like the white politicians, whose skin color automatically disqualifies them from the black experience.

And so, on his maiden presidential visit to South Carolina and Virginia, Obama was greeted with not only enthusiasm but also a bit of curiosity.

"Not only people in the black community, but people in the white community are going to be looking at this man and trying to figure out: Is he one of us? Does he understand what we've come through? What we're still confronting now?" said Vivian A. Glover, an assistant vice president at Claflin University, a historically black school in Orangeburg. "He's not bringing that with him. He's going to need to present it in some form or fashion."

It was Orangeburg where three black college students were gunned down in 1968 as they pressed to integrate the small town's only bowling alley. Speaking Saturday at Claflin to residents of the town and a new generation of students, Obama brought the primarily black crowd of about 2,000 to its feet by evoking that era.

"At every juncture in our history, there's been somebody that's said we can't. There's been somebody's said you can't overcome slavery. There's been somebody who said you can't overcome Jim Crow," Obama told the South Carolina crowd. "If I have your support, if I have your energy and involvement and commitment and ideas, then I'm here to tell you, 'Yes we can in '08.' "

Later Saturday, Obama and his wife, Michelle, traveled to Richmond and accepted the endorsement of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D). Obama told reporters that his presidential campaign is a symbol for improving race relations in America.

"Here we are in the heart of what was the Confederacy," Obama said, looking out over the Virginia statehouse, which housed the Confederate Congress during the Civil War. "For me to be able to stand here as an African American reflects the enormous progress this country has made."

He then continued a busy day by addressing more than 4,000 Democratic activists at the state party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner.

A Democrat has not won Virginia's electoral votes in decades. But Kaine, in becoming the first sitting governor to make a 2008 endorsement, said that could change with Obama as the party's nominee. He called the Illinois senator "a proud American but also a citizen of the world."

In both states, audiences greeted Obama more like a celebrity than a politician looking for their vote. In Orangeburg, cellphone cameras snapped pictures the moment he entered the gymnasium and did not stop during his speech, which was cut short to a half-hour because of Saturday's Senate vote on a resolution on Iraq.

"I like his message of togetherness," said Frank Loadholt, 56, a social worker from Orangeburg who said he will "absolutely" vote for Obama. "I look at him as the best candidate out there with the best message."

South Carolina state Rep. Gilda Cobb-Hunter (D) said it is "totally ludicrous" to worry about Obama's lack of a history in the civil rights movement. "Look at the man's record," she said. "It shows he has an understanding of issues like that."

But many in the crowd seemed more hesitant and said they were not yet certain they will vote for Obama next year.

"I believe in listening to all of the candidates," said Wilhemina James, 58, from Florence. "This old gut hasn't failed me yet."

South Carolina has one of the nation's first presidential primaries, and African Americans make up about half of the state's Democratic electorate, so black support here is particularly critical.

Obama is vying with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former North Carolina senator John Edwards for that backing. All three camps are wooing prominent black politicians and courting black religious leaders, with varying degrees of success.

That push seemed reflected not only in Obama's Orangeburg speech but also in one he delivered to a more racially diverse crowd of almost 3,000 in Columbia on Friday.

"When folks were saying we're going to march for our freedom, somebody said, 'You can't do that.' And we did," Obama said Friday, sparking raucous applause. "And somebody said, 'Don't sit at the lunch counter.' . . . We did. When somebody said, 'Women belong in the kitchen, not in the boardroom,' they said we can't do that. Yes we did!"

Carol Singletary, 55, a retired social worker from Columbia, said that part of Obama's speech was important to her.

"I was raised in the civil rights era," said Singletary, who is black. "We came through a lot of ups and downs. South Carolina is one of those places that really did struggle. And still does struggle."

But she said Obama's background should not be a barrier to African Americans like her. "I don't hold that against him," she said after watching his speech. "I thought he was wonderful."

Edwards came to Charleston last week, and Clinton is scheduled to visit South Carolina on Monday.

Kaine Endorses Obama For '08 (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

RICHMOND -- Standing within eyeshot of the former Confederate capitol, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday endorsed Sen. Barack Obama for president.

"I am very happy to say it is a very simple decision for me in terms of what I think is important in my assessment of where the nation is to endorse Sen. Barack Obama as our nation's next president," Mr. Kaine said, standing outside the governor's mansion in Capitol Square.

Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, was joined by his wife, Michelle. He said he was "honored" to have Mr. Kaine's early public support.

"For Tim Kaine to step forward as the first governor outside of my home state of Illinois to endorse my candidacy is an extraordinary honor," he said. "I am absolutely determined that the confidence he has placed in me will be reflected in the hard work over the next several months ... to win the presidency."

Mr. Kaine, a Democrat, said his early endorsement was a sign of his enthusiasm for Mr. Obama. His endorsement of the first-term senator made Mr. Kaine the first governor to publicly endorse any presidential candidate.

Mr. Obama yesterday said it was "humbling" to stand in the heart of the Confederacy and receive the backing of the Virginia governor.

"Here we are in what was the heart of the Confederacy, and for me to be able to stand here as an African-American reflects the enormous progress that this country has made, and I think to some degree represents not the perfection of the union, but a whole lot of progress in perfecting this union," he said.

He said that he was "standing on the shoulders" on many black leaders who have paved the way for him.

"It is worth noting that the trajectory of America is to include more people and bring more people together," he said. "We have stumbled at times. It's been a rocky path and we still have a long way to go, but part of my campaign I hope is to remind people of the capacity for this nation to change and that has always been one of our strengths."

Mr. Kaine, standing next to his wife, Anne, said the two men shared similar life experiences.

Both graduated from Harvard Law School, married lawyers and practiced civil rights law before entering politics.

"The thing that cemented our relationship early on is when we found out that our [mothers] grew up in the very tiny town of El Dorado, Kansas, and there are just so few people that can claim that," Mr. Kaine said.

Mr. Obama was in Richmond last night to headline the Jefferson-Jackson dinner, the Virginia Democratic Party's annual fundraising event, which each year showcases key national Democratic figures and this year drew 4,000 people.

Mr. Obama, the son of a Kenyan immigrant, campaigned in Virginia last fall for Sen. James H. Webb Jr. and received a rock-star ovation alongside Mr. Webb and former Gov. Mark Warner at a rally in Richmond.

He also appeared at a fundraiser for Mr. Kaine in July 2005 and donated $10,000 to Mr. Kaine's gubernatorial bid.

Redefining "Black" (LAT)

By Louis Chude-Sokei

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

ALTHOUGH NOT quite able to pass for white, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has been able to pass for African American. He is biracial, but not white; black, but not African American; American but not African. What has entranced the country more than his somewhat vague policies is Obama's challenge to conventional racial and cultural categories.

Among African Americans, discussions about his racial identity typically vacillate between the ideologically charged options of "black" versus "not black enough" or between "black" and "black, but not like us."

But there is a third side to Obama — and also to the politics of racial passing in America.

The population of African immigrants in the United States is rapidly growing. Since 1990, about 50,000 Africans have come to the United States annually, more than in any of the peak years of the international slave trade, which was abolished in 1807. They add to the steady influx of black immigrants from other continents and the Caribbean, and those who have been in the United States for generations but who don't racially and culturally define themselves as African American.

These blacks feel cramped by the narrowness of American racial politics, in which "blackness" has not just defined one's skin color but has served as a code word for African American. To be heard and to be counted, these black immigrants must often pass as African American, sometimes against their will.

Obama is not the first prominent black to defy conventional American racial and cultural categories. People identified former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's Jamaican ancestry as the quality that made his blackness different. When in the mid-1990s it seemed possible that he would run for president, the pride of the Caribbean immigrant community was nearly palpable. He emboldened Caribbean immigrants to resist African American pressures to erase their own cultural and historical distinctiveness.

In such distinctions between black immigrants and African Americans lay buried a history of competitive intra-racial tensions and cultural differences that have never been resolved.

In addition to black immigrants' need to hold onto their own identities, many whites have historically tended to regard black immigrants as a model minority within a troublesome native-born black population. A good proportion of immigrants tend to be better educated than African Americans, don't have the "chip" of racial resentment on their shoulder and exhibit the classic immigrant optimism about assimilation into the mainstream culture. Many whites, however, exploit these differences to magnify the problems of African Americans while avoiding charges of racism. And because these differences often result in greater employment and more educational opportunities for immigrants and their descendants, they also feed tensions between native and immigrant blacks.

The complex history of black immigrant and African American interaction and distinction has been masked by a tendency in American politics to treat "black" and African American as interchangeable categories. It is further masked by an African American cultural politics that arrogates to itself the official word on racial matters. For black immigrants, African American culture can be as alien and as hostile as mainstream America.

Because Powell didn't run for president, the intra-racial differences and historical tensions between immigrant and native-born blacks that his candidacy might have brought to national attention remain largely unknown. "Black" effectively continued to mean African American.

But, from a black immigrant perspective, Obama's run for the presidency carries the promise of spotlighting this "category crisis" at long last. There is the possibility of a conversation in which Africans in the U.S., along with other black immigrant groups, may emerge distinctly from the all-consuming category of "black."

These issues have been present in scholarship and education for some time. Tensions between native and foreign-born blacks are rising in higher education because universities are reputedly using black immigrants, at the expense of the native-born, to diversify their student bodies. In this case, black immigrants are the primary beneficiaries of the blanket category of "black."

Add to this a shifting academic terrain in which traditional black studies are threatened by increasingly popular courses and programs that have a diaspora or Africana slant and do not put African American history or experiences center stage. It's now not uncommon to hear African American scholars and students complaining about the increasing presence of Caribbean and African blacks in black studies departments. Indeed, these kinds of tensions erupted at UC Berkeley two years ago and reflect the continuing struggle over the redefining of "black" in American life and thought.

As the numbers of black immigrants and their progeny grow to challenge the numerical supremacy of the native black minority, can a challenge to African Americans' cultural dominance, racial assumptions and politics be far behind? Especially because black immigrants generally and increasingly differ from native-born African Americans in their views on race, racism and political affiliations. They also are less responsive to American racial traumas, which helps explain why some civil rights leaders are unsure of Obama's loyalties to African American causes. Because his political "blackness" is independent of their sanction and emerges from outside their histories, it threatens their cultural and political authority.

So Obama does not transcend race, as some might dream. Instead, he represents a set of tensions that go beyond black and white. On one hand, there is America's complex and still unresolved relationship with African Americans and, on the other, an emergent black immigrant presence that is less willing to politically or socially pass for "black" and that has unresolved and unspoken issues of its own.

In Obama, we witness how one set of tensions works with and against the other. Immigrant status is deployed not against race but against the messy and unresolved tensions of domestic American racial relationships. And in this, whether he wins or loses, Obama is definitely a sign of the country's future.

Presidential Hopeful Edwards Discusses Health Plan In Las Vegas (AP)

By Ryan Nakashima

AP, February 17, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards took his plan for universal health care to union-strong Las Vegas on Saturday, visiting the local branch of the electrical workers labor group to which his brother belongs.

The stop was the ninth the former North Carolina senator has made to the Silver State since he lost as Democrat John Kerry's running mate in 2004, including five times last year before swinging by again in December to announce he was running for president.

Although no seeker of the Democratic nomination has strong roots in Nevada, Edwards told about 300 people at the local office of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers that his brother Blake, a journeyman electrician, benefited from their help.

"Thank you to IBEW and thank you for what the union has done for my brother and his family," Edwards said.

The Edwards campaign is hoping his ties to the labor movement will help him gain support in the state, which has taken on new importance in the Democratic nomination calendar having recently won the No. 2 spot between Iowa and New Hampshire.

"His support in Nevada is strong," said Edwards' spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield. "He has enjoyed an enormous amount of support every time he's visited."

Edwards's health care plan, which he unveiled two weeks ago, requires employers to cover their workers or pay into a fund to help them. It also mandates that health care providers decrease administrative costs, switch to using electronic records and would create a market for individuals and small businesses to shop for coverage providers.

"It creates market power for people who don't have it, competition that doesn't presently exist," Edwards said.

Judy Woolston, a 65-year-old housewife, said her daughter-in-law's uninsured mother required emergency $80,000 surgery last year for lung cancer. After her daughter-in-law and husband paid out of pocket for more than three months of care, luckily, the family found a medical grant which paid the rest.

"It was a wake up call to all of us. We do like Edwards and we like what he said" but it was too early to decide on a candidate, Woolston said.

The stop was one among many in Nevada by presidential hopefuls as the race for the Democratic nod heated up less than a year before the Jan. 19 presidential caucus in Nevada.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois is to visit Las Vegas on Sunday, while on Wednesday, seven other announced or expected Democratic candidates, including front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, are to participate in the first candidates forum of the 2008 campaign in Carson City.

Rick DeVoe, a Las Vegas insulation installer who volunteers for a local branch of Edwards' "One Corps" movement of community service, said Edwards' health care stance is one of the reasons he supports the candidate.

Clinton failed in her health care reforms as former President Bill Clinton's first lady, he said. "They didn't get it done," DeVoe said. "Instead of taking a firm stand on what they think is right, it got so watered down and complicated that it wound up completely falling apart."

Richardson, Clinton Continue Working The State (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 18, 2007

CONCORD – On his second day in office, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday he would shut down Guantanamo Bay detention camp for suspected terrorists.

"The first day I would get us out of Iraq," the New Mexico governor said, adding he would also close Abu Grab prison where Iraqi prisoners were tortured. Richardson told about 65 people at the Concord City Democrats' 3rd Annual Washington Birthday Social that Abu Grab is "one of the reasons this country has so many problems in the Muslim world."

The receptive Concord crowd was one of three that turned out yesterday to hear from Presidential candidates -- or in one case a spouse -- a year before Granite Staters caste their votes. In Dover, Hillary Clinton vowed to end the Iraqi War, while in Nashua, Cindy McCain, wife of Arizona Sen. John McCain, said her husband would make the best President.

In Concord at the IBEW hall, Richardson joked about his low profile compared to other Democratic hopefuls, but seriously called for all Democratic candidates to pledge not to attack each other.

He touted his experience both in foreign policy and at home as governor. Speaking of the current administration's foreign policy problems, Richardson said "We can't afford to have a President without foreign policy training."

Asked about the security fence Congress approved for the border between the United States and Mexico, Richardson said there is a problem with border infiltration that should be dealt with through the use of technology and additional border patrol agents, which the federal government is not now willing to pay for.

As governor, he said, he has dealt with the issue. "I did it, that's my point. I did it. I deal with these problems every day," Richardson said.

Eileen Keim of Concord said she was an Eisenhower Republican who worries that money going to the military shortchanges children. Richardson said there is a need to rebuild the military, but stressed greater efficiencies and eliminating out-dated systems.

"The military contracting system is totally out of control. Why is it Haliburton gets all the contracts?" he asked about the company Vice President Cheney headed before running for the nation's second highest office.

After Richardson's speech, Keim said she was satisfied with his answer, but has not yet ready to support him. "He's a very capable man, I wish him well," she said.

Tom St. Martin of Candia was encouraged by Richardson. "He's the first candidate I've seen that I want to support," he said, noting he saw both New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama last week.

In Dover, where her husband, then Presidential candidate Bill Clinton, promised supporters in 1992 "If you stick with me, I'll stick with you until the last dog dies," Hillary Clinton refused to apologize for her Senate vote authorizing the Iraqi War, but repeated her response that had she known then what she knows now, she would never have voted to authorize the war.

"I take responsibility for my vote," she said. "It was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances we had at the time."

Clinton spoke to about 500 at Dover High School yesterday morning before flying back to Washington to vote on the Senate resolution repudiating President Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq. The Portsmouth house party scheduled for yesterday afternoon was cancelled due to the vote.

At the Dover event, Clinton said the focus now should be on ending the War in Iraq. "If (Bush) does not end this war before he leaves office, when I am President, I will," she said.

She touted her proposed legislation to limit the number troops in Iraq as the best way to end the war. The small Democratic majorities in both the House and Senate make any major step, like ending funding for the war, impossible, Clinton told the crowd.

She criticized Bush for shutting out hostile nations, particularly recent negative overtures about Iran. "It would be a historic mistake if the President took action against Iran," Clinton said.

The former First Lady said she does not favor gay marriage, but added "It is clear to me that we should stand for equality and against discrimination." That part of her speech received only scattered applause, unlike her statements supporting education, affordable health care and lifting Americans out of poverty, which were better received.

In Nashua, Cindy McCain returned to the Crowne Plaza Hotel, where she and her husband stayed the night they won the 2000 Presidential primary, for an event hosted by the Nashua Republican City Committee and the Nashua Area Federated Republican Woman.

"I'm happy to be back. My husband is in Iowa doing three Town Hall meetings. I think I got the better deal," McCain said.

She asked voters to take another look at her husband, saying he is still a straight talker, although some may not always like what he says. "My husband is not only the best candidate, but will make the best President for many, many reasons," McCain said.

McCain also answered questions about immigration, trade relations, health care costs and pork-barrel spending.

Today the Presidential parade continues as Democratic candidate and Ohio Congressman Dennis Kucinich makes appearances in Barrington, Hanover, Concord and Laconia.

Dodd: "Give Me A Chance" (TSSC)

By Lisa Michals

The State, February 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133358

U.S. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., got a warm response Saturday morning from S.C. Democrats when he brought up the issues of predatory lending, the war in Iraq and public vs. private education.

"People are expressing that sense of urgency about what we need to do at home and abroad," Dodd said during a Columbia stop in his 2008 presidential campaign. "I wanted to get out and be part of this debate."

Dodd, chairman of the Senate's committee on banking, housing and urban affairs, spoke about the importance of curtailing predatory lending. He touted his commitment to helping public schools improve, rather than paving the way for more students to attend private schools.

"We aren't going to solve the problem of public education by financing two systems," Dodd said.

He also favors getting U.S. troops out of Iraq — a position that is among the qualities Paulette Gujer of Conway said are important to her.

"For me, it's Iraq, Iraq, Iraq," said Gujer, who attended the Dodd breakfast at Mac's on Main with her sister, Opal Brown, of Columbia after seeing presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., Friday night.

Dodd's rousing speech — as local Democrats drank coffee and dined on grits, eggs and bacon — often circled back to his 30 years of experience as a lawmaker. "We've done six years of on-the-job training" with President Bush, Dodd said.

Dodd's South Carolina trip was abbreviated by a rare Saturday vote in the Senate. More than 65 people attended the Dodd event, which doubled as the Richland County Democratic Party's monthly breakfast meeting.

The audience included former Gov. Jim Hodges, Richland County Councilman Paul Livingston and Richland 1 school board member Dwayne Smiling.

Carly Ingram, 16, will turn 18 in time to vote in the 2008 presidential election, and she's already throwing her heart into becoming an educated voter. The Blythewood High School student volunteered to work in Dodd's campaign.

"He's a family guy," Ingram said. "He really understands that the kids who are in high school now are the future."

Dodd acknowledged that his potential path to the presidency could be a long one, given the strong competition for the Democratic Party nomination.

"I want you to give me a chance," Dodd said. "I'm not as well known as some of the other candidates."

But, he said, he has more than a year to make his impact felt.

Political Markets In Action (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Two Democratic presidential candidates with national campaign experience are stumbling. A Republican candidate who has run only municipal campaigns is confounding expectations, calling into question some assumptions about Republican voters.

John Edwards has learned -- surely he did not know it when they were hired -- that two women employed by his campaign have Internet trails of vitriolic anti-Christian, and especially anti-Catholic, rants. One of them wrote a profane screed about God impregnating Mary and said the Catholic Church opposes the morning-after birth control pill in order to "force women to bear more tithing Catholics." The other woman, who sprinkles her commentary with a vulgar term for female genitalia, referred to George W. Bush's "wingnut Christofascist base."

When the women's works became known, it was reported that they had been, or were going to be, fired. Thirty-six hours later, after left-wing bloggers rallied to their defense, Edwards's campaign said they would be retained. Edwards explained that the women had assured him that "it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

He really does? The two women -- both of whom have resigned, pronouncing themselves, of course, victims of intolerance -- are what they are and are unimportant. But a prospective president being so pliable under pressure and so capable of smarmy insincerity -- what does he think were the women's intentions? -- is very important.

In New Hampshire recently, Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Now that we have a Democratic president . . ." Quickly correcting this slip, she said she meant "a Democratic Congress," but added: "If we had a Democratic president, we would end the war."

Well. She and others say they can "end the war." That phrase is a flinch from facts. They mean they can end U.S. involvement in the war. No one believes the United States has the power to prevent the war from raging on.

But if a Democratic president would implement withdrawal, the Democratic Congress could, by forbidding further spending to sustain forces in Iraq. So why is Clinton, who says that a Democratic president would properly withdraw U.S. forces, not voting for a policy she considers proper?

Congress has used denial of funds to express itself on, and influence, conflicts in Vietnam (1973) and Nicaragua (1982 and 1984). Also, on Nov. 2, 1983, two weeks after the bombing that killed 241 Americans in the Marine barracks at the Beirut airport, the House of Representatives voted on a measure to force the withdrawal of the Marines by March 1984 by cutting off funds for the Lebanon operation. The measure was defeated by a vote of 274 to 153, but the 153 included 18 Democrats who are still in the House, nine of whom are committee chairmen.

A question for the 18: If they believed defunding the Beirut operation was proper, why is it not proper to defund U.S. involvement in Iraq? One answer insistently suggests itself: They think that withdrawal would be too risky. Does Clinton agree?

Regarding the Republican race, for many months commentators have said that when the Republican base learns the facts about Rudy Giuliani's personal life (an annulled first marriage, a messy divorce, then a third marriage) and views on social issues (for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, in each case with limits), support for him will evaporate. But such commentary is becoming self-refuting. The insistent reiteration of it during Giuliani's coast-to-coast campaigning is telling activist Republicans -- the sort of people who read political commentary -- the facts about Giuliani. And so far those facts are not causing a recoil from him: According to the USA Today-Gallup poll, his lead over John McCain has grown from 31 percent to 27 percent in November to 40-24 today.

This does not mean that the social issues have lost their salience. People for whom opposition to abortion is very important might, however, think that in wartime it is not supremely important. Or they might reason, correctly, that presidents can change abortion policy only by changing the Supreme Court, so Giuliani's pledge to nominate justices like Antonin Scalia, Samuel Alito and John Roberts is sufficient.

Furthermore, California's primary is being moved up to Feb. 5, and New Jersey's and some other states' might be moved to that date, so Giuliani's views on social issues might become, on balance, advantages. And suppose Giuliani convinces Republicans that he can become the first Republican since George H.W. Bush in 1988 to be competitive for California's (now 55) electoral votes.

Markets are mechanisms that generate information. The political market is working: Americans are learning much about the candidates, and themselves.

Early Primary -- Too Much Too Soon? (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Tom Vilsack, a Democratic candidate for president, doesn't want to deliver bad news to Californians, but he said it's time for a reality check: A February 2008 presidential primary here would not substitute for the lunch counters in Iowa, the house parties in New Hampshire and the barbecues in South Carolina where presidential nominations are really decided.

"Retail politicking is essential in this process," said Vilsack, the first declared Democratic presidential candidate and former governor of Iowa. In his state, he joked, locals are so impassioned about the state's early caucuses that "you can't tell the reporters from the voters" at packed campaign events because of all the notebooks.

The intensive and personal vetting of candidates that has developed for generations in states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, Vilsack said, is one reason why mega-media states such as California, New Jersey and Illinois may not get the clout they hope for by moving up in the presidential primary schedule.

"If the goal is to lessen the impact of those early states," Vilsack said, "I don't think you're going to succeed."

Nevertheless, the state Senate handily passed legislation last week to move California's presidential primary from June 2008 to Feb. 5, 2008. The measure is expected to land soon on the desk of Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has been joined by Democratic leaders in showering praise on the measure because of the windfall in political clout -- in theory -- it would bring to the state.

But Phil Trounstine, who heads the San Jose State University Survey and Policy Research Institute, said an early California primary could deliver some unintended consequences to the 2008 presidential race.

"It may actually increase the importance of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada," said Trounstine of the four primaries and caucuses scheduled in January 2008 before California's primary, "because the person who has momentum coming out of those races will have a huge advantage coming into Super Duper Tuesday."

So "you give enormous advantage for the people who have huge amounts of money available to organize" in media-saturated states such as California, he said.

That's an exclusive crowd, he noted: on the Democratic side, front-runners New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. And on the GOP side, it's Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Right now, the presidential nominating schedule will start with Iowa, which holds the first caucuses on Jan. 14, followed in short order by Nevada's Democratic caucuses, the traditional first presidential primary in New Hampshire and South Carolina's primary. Already, those states have become a battleground among almost two-dozen candidates vying for attention -- a year before the first votes are cast.

It looks as if those contests will be followed by what pundits have labeled "Super Duper Tuesday" -- Feb. 5. Along with California, other states that have scheduled or are considering primaries and caucuses for that first Tuesday in February are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, New York, New Mexico, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota and Utah.

In addition to California, delegate-rich states such as New Jersey, New York and Illinois traditionally have fallen much later on the primary calendar, giving hope to challengers that there was time to overtake the front-runner for the nomination.

If the new super-sized primary goes through, Americans are looking at "the longest, day-in-and-day-out general election campaign in American history," in which "the party nominees might be determined in the blink of an eye, with no chance for buyer's remorse," according to Larry Sabato, a political science professor at the University of Virginia considered among the nation's top political analysts.

Sabato, in his "Crystal Ball" column last week, argued that the increasing drive by a whopping 30 states to squeeze their presidential primaries into January or February 2008 is nothing short of "courting disaster" by creating an oversized, speeded-up contest.

"If the job of scheduling the presidential nominating contests were assigned to an insane asylum, this is pretty much what the patients would come up with," he wrote.

Insanity or not, the speculation already has candidates swarming into California -- just in case.

As Giuliani recently ran from Sacramento to Silicon Valley to the Central Valley, he repeatedly endorsed an early California primary, saying it would put the presidential race more quickly onto a diverse, vibrant stage that represents America as a whole.

"It would be a very good thing if the California primary were moved up, because you are ... a microcosm of the United States," Giuliani said. "You're bigger than most countries; you do kind of represent a sort of cross section of America. You're Democrat, Republican, liberal, conservative, you're all different races, religions."

Presidential candidates, sooner or later, he said, are "all going to have to contest in a place that is kind of similar to what we're eventually going to have to do -- which is to run in the entire country," he said.

Rick Jacobs of the Courage Campaign agreed. His progressive nonprofit organization has pushed for an early state primary because, he argued, it would give California voters the kind of attention they deserve -- and could provide a boost to candidates who can't capture the attention in Iowa and New Hampshire.

But Trounstine said a "slingshot effect" is more likely.

"The danger with all these states moving forward is that the process itself may wind up limiting the field -- and an insurgent candidate who needs time to develop and grow may get squashed like a bug," Trounstine said.

He cited presidential candidates such as Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, as those who could be hurt by the front-loaded primary schedule.

Allan Hoffenblum, publisher of the California Target Book, a nonpartisan look at state election races, warns that all this talk about California's clout in the presidential nominating season masks the real issue at hand.

"It has everything to do with term limits -- and nothing to do with presidential politics," he said.

Legislators want the early primary so they can get voters to cast ballots for an initiative to extend legislative term limits -- just in time for the lawmaker to sign up to run for another term before the June state primary election for their offices.

As for the effect of an early California presidential primary, Hoffenblum pointed toward a previous time when the state moved its presidential primary to March with little noticeable effect on the outcome.

"No one really knows for sure what kind of clout California would have under Feb. 5 primary -- any more than they accurately assessed it the three times they had it in March."

While "it's fun to sit around and say what will happen (with an early primary), we have no historic data to fall back upon," Hoffenblum said.

No matter your opinion about the early primary, he added, "we're going to have one -- whether we like it or not."

Q&A: The Spat Over Presidential Primaries (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Every four years, Americans pick a president. And every election cycle, political insiders fight about the presidential nominating process.

DOJ_NMG_0133361

For decades, Iowa and New Hampshire have cast the first votes, giving their residents enormous influence — and greatly annoying people in much bigger places, including California.

This time, politicians in California, Florida, Illinois, New Jersey and Texas are taking action to push their primaries up to Feb. 5 to try to boost their clout. The heavy front-loading means the nominating fight could be over by Valentine's Day, giving the nation a nine-month general-election campaign.

How do the two main parties determine their presidential nominating calendars?

Last summer, Democrats set aside January for caucuses and primaries in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina. The rest of the states are supposed to wait to hold their contests between Feb. 5 and June 10, 2008. The GOP voted at its 2004 convention to give states a window between Feb. 5 and July 28 to hold their events.

Where do the 2008 calendars stand today?

For Democrats, the voting is supposed to start on Jan. 14, with the Iowa caucuses, followed by caucuses in Nevada on Jan. 19, the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22 and the South Carolina primary Jan. 29.

But New Hampshire officials are unhappy about Nevada's placement just three days ahead of their state's primary. The state is determined to preserve a week's distance between its vote and other contests to avoid diluting its impact, which means New Hampshire is likely to ignore the preference of the national party and schedule its primary earlier. That would probably lead Iowa to push at least a week ahead.

The Republican calendar is in flux, but the GOP contests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina are likely to fall on the same day the Democrats vote.

What happens if states disobey the rules established by the national parties?

Probably nothing. They could face sanctions, reducing the number of their delegates to the national nominating conventions or, in the case of Democrats, denying officials such as the governor and members of Congress their delegate status. But in reality, neither party seems likely to run the risk of alienating voters, much less the elected officials they would need to carry big states such as California and Florida in the fall.

Why do Iowa and New Hampshire always go first?

Tradition. New Hampshire has been first in the nation since 1920. For decades, few cared. Then a 1949 law passed, allowing citizens to vote directly for candidates, instead of delegates to the national nominating conventions. In 1952, all eyes turned to New Hampshire for an early gauge of voter sentiments. A political institution was born.

The Iowa caucuses took off 20 years later, when then-Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota used a strong showing to push past better-known rivals and win the Democratic nomination. Four years later, another Democratic dark horse, former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, won Iowa and, ultimately, the White House.

Given that history, few presidential candidates want to alienate voters in Iowa or New Hampshire by criticizing their privileged status.

What's the difference between a primary and a caucus?

In a primary, the polls are open throughout the day, and people can show up whenever they wish, step into a private voting booth, cast a ballot and be done.

A caucus is more akin to a town hall meeting. It starts at a set time and can last for hours. Participants must publicly state whom they support. Others might argue with them, or try to change their minds. If a candidate fails to achieve a certain threshold of support, he or she is eliminated from consideration, and backers must choose another candidate or go home.

Why does it matter which states go first?

The candidates invest enormous amounts of time, money and energy in the early states, hoping victory or a strong showing will provide momentum heading into the rapid-fire series of contests that follow.

With all that focus, home-state issues, such as ethanol in Iowa, receive enormous attention, as do home-state politicians, who have come to expect the intense courtship.

What's the difference between campaigning in places like Iowa and New Hampshire as opposed to larger states?

Iowa and New Hampshire have relatively small populations. The voters there demand a highly personal style of campaigning that is impossible to replicate in a state the size of California, where expensive TV ads are the only effective means of communication.

It is routine for presidential candidates to submit to hourlong grillings by voters who won't tolerate pretense or evasions.

If anything, they find sport in humbling the mighty, which presidents and vice presidents have learned the hard way.

"Voters want to see you; they want to hold you up to the light, tip you upside down. They want to get a very good, hard look before they make a decision," said New Hampshire Republican activist Fred Bramante.

How would it affect the race if states like California move forward?

Candidates would have to scramble to raise more money and cover extensive ground in what may effectively shape up as a national primary on Feb. 5.

Ironically, by moving ahead on the calendar and creating such a compacted schedule, bigger states could invest Iowa and New Hampshire with even greater import because candidates who stumble there would have little time to recover.

Are there any advantages or disadvantages to the parties' settling quickly on their nominees?

The advantage is the nominees would have plenty of time to bind any wounds suffered in the primary season.

The disadvantage is that voters, unaccustomed to an accelerated contest, may have barely paid attention by the time the nominees are selected.

Also, candidates would have to step up their fundraising to keep their campaigns afloat from the early end of the primary season until the vote on Nov. 4, 2008.

What's the most important thing to remember in all this?

No one really knows what will happen, even after the dates are set. The one inviolable rule of politics is the law of unintended consequences. Something surprising will happen in the 2008 campaign, guaranteed.

Nev., Candidates Taking Bold New Step With Forum (NHUL)

By Dan Tuohy

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 18, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. – Democrats running for President will be on unfamiliar political ground when they arrive here Wednesday for their first joint forum of the 2008 campaign.

For the first time, the state that popularized quickie marriages, built a global reputation for its casinos and gave free range to places like the Bunny Ranch plans a caucus between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire's leadoff Presidential primary.

Critics complain about calendar frontloading, but Nevada is making no apologies. People are proud, though some are still trying to make sense of it all, said Guy Louis Rocha, Nevada's state archivist and a member of the forum's sponsor, the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

"They're starting to see that Nevada is a player," Rocha said outside the silver-colored dome of the Nevada State House. "All roads now head through Nevada. The fact is, Nevada's always been a backwater."

Nevada Democrats are marketing their state as "second in the nation" to cast votes with their Jan. 19 caucus. New Hampshire has traditionally bristled at any perceived loss of clout, but Nevadans have a different take, said Clark Dumont, a long-time Granite State public relations executive and broadcast journalist who is now vice president of communications and public affairs for the Nevada Cancer Institute.

'New Hampshire should stop whining.' That's what I hear," he said.

Dumont said Democrats in the Silver State -- led by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid -- executed a brilliant move in scheduling an early caucus to focus Presidential debate on Western issues such as immigration, water resources and land management.

"Just as New Hampshire has seen it, it is a way to spotlight some of the issues important to the state," he said.

Though the DNC says the Granite State's primary will be Jan. 22, New Hampshire Secretary of State William Gardner will not set the date until late this year. State law requires the primary to be a week or more before a "similar election."

Is the Nevada caucus a similar election? State Rep. Jim Splaine, a Democrat from Portsmouth, does not think so. However, he has sponsored a bill to give the secretary of state the authority to interpret the term "similar election" as he sees fit. New Hampshire has held the first Presidential primary since 1920, and the first by state law since 1976. Splaine sponsored that law.

Obama's not at forum

Dumont, speaking from his office in Las Vegas, said it is difficult to compare the Nevada caucus to New Hampshire's role as a proving ground for Presidents and a place where all candidates can participate regardless of how much money they have. "New Hampshire has nothing to worry about," he said. "It's a caucus, not a primary."

The DNC and Nevada's Democratic Party sought the early caucus as a way to address regional issues and embrace diversity and union members. About a quarter of the state's population is Hispanic or Latino.

"You're talking about a very diverse electorate," said Jamal Simmons, president of New Future Communications, a firm the Nevada Democratic Party hired to help organize and prepare for the caucus.

Simmons, who worked in New Hampshire for Sen. Bob Graham and Gen. Wesley Clark during the 2004 election cycle, said the activist-organized nature of a caucus would make Nevada distinctly different from New Hampshire with its tradition of grassroots, retail politics. He said it would complement the leadoff primary.

"We really see this as a Western caucus," Simmons said. "People are really taking ownership of it."

Rocha said the New Hampshire primary is secure, but he expects the Nevada caucus to divert some attention. "For a little while the whole nation will be watching, and probably curious because we're the new kid on the block," he said.

Long a Republican stronghold, Nevada is increasingly a swing state. While Nevada Democrats hope the caucus gives them an edge, that remains to be seen in a state where population estimates -- 2.5 million people last year -- are readjusted on a monthly basis. It is one of the fastest growing states in the country, and the running joke is that everybody here is from someplace else.

"It's tough reading the tea leaves here because the tea leaves are constantly changing," said Rocha, who did grow up in Las Vegas.

In New Hampshire, candidates see bucolic towns. In Carson City this week, candidates will see dazzling casinos and ads for legal brothels, both of which are just down the road from the Presidential forum's venue.

But the states share some common ground. Dumont, who still has a house in New Hampshire, said he noticed the independent streak when he arrived in 2005 after serving as regional communications director for Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield based in Manchester. He found it oddly reminiscent of New Hampshire.

Rocha said most Nevadans, especially those in the northern part of the state, would be proud to have "Live Free Or Die" on their license plate. "If a Granite Stater met a Nevadan in a bar they would get along fine," he said. "They'd be buying each other drinks before long."

Wisconsin Primary Could Be A Spoiler (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 18, 2007

Washington - In exactly one year and one day, Wisconsin will hold its presidential primary.

Whether it turns out to be a big deal or an empty, anticlimactic ritual is anybody's guess.

But at this point either outcome seems plausible.

With several huge states poised to move up their own contests to early February, the fate of Wisconsin's Feb. 19 primary is threatened by the prospect of a massively "front-loaded" nominating calendar, a schedule that critics fear will further abbreviate the process of selecting the parties' standard-bearers.

In short, both nominations could be effectively wrapped up after only a few weeks of voting - and before the campaign even gets to Wisconsin.

"A year from today, there is a nominee. It's over. This is the fastest calendar we've ever had," former Democratic National Chairman Terry McAuliffe said the other day on National Public Radio.

But that's not the only possible scenario.

In the most wide-open presidential election in decades, with two or three politically robust, big-name contenders in each party backed up by a bevy of respectable long shots, a quick outcome is not guaranteed.

There is a minority view among insiders that envisions a slugfest rather than a first or second-round knockout.

"It's more likely to take more time than any race in modern memory to sort out the nominee, which may very well make Wisconsin relevant," said Paul Ryan, the GOP congressman from Janesville.

If the race doesn't peter out before Wisconsin, then a very different dynamic could come into play, one that might give the state a more meaningful role than it has had in many years. How it might matter

Under this scenario, Wisconsin once again has its mid-February date all to itself (as it did in 2004), meaning that for six or seven days it becomes the exclusive venue of the 2008 campaign. All the remaining candidates and the national political media descend on the state, whose primary is now strategically sandwiched between two multistate "Super Tuesdays," one on Feb. 5 and one on March 4. Wisconsin becomes a natural place for non-front-runners to make their stand, because it's inexpensive (candidates have to advertise in only one midsize state with five TV markets), "open" (any voter can vote in either party's primary), and has a reputation for giving underdogs and insurgents a shot.

"If one of the candidates just sweeps through California, Florida (both possible Feb. 5 states), then it's all over by then," said Gov. Jim Doyle, a Democrat. "But if you get a few split decisions, then Wisconsin could end up in the center of it."

One reason the outlook is murky, aside from the unpredictability of both races a year out, is that the calendar isn't set yet. Iowa and New Hampshire will kick off the GOP race in January 2008 (or possibly December 2007, if New Hampshire moves up its own primary). On the Democratic side, Nevada and South Carolina will join those two states in the critical opening phase, a change the party is making for the sake of political and ethnic diversity. Undetermined dates

But the next wave of primaries is unsettled.

California, New Jersey, Florida, Illinois and others are thinking of moving their primaries up to Feb. 5 to get a piece of the presidential action. They would be joining an already crowded group of states slated to vote that day, creating the biggest, earliest "Super Tuesday" in history.

That would have two potential effects. One is to accelerate the awarding of delegates needed to win the nomination. The other is to abruptly nationalize the nominating fight, forcing candidates to simultaneously compete in a giant cluster of expensive states, overwhelming contestants who have neither huge treasuries nor early momentum from victories in the smaller January states.

"That just shortcuts the debate and the process for really getting to know the candidates," said Linda Honold, the former Wisconsin Democratic chair, who in 2005 served on a national Democratic panel that studied the calendar.

But the calendar alone won't determine how long the race lasts. That also depends on the dynamics of the field, the performance of the candidates and whether the early states produce a series of split decisions or a juggernaut, as happened in 2004 with Democrat John Kerry.

"If one candidate has won both Iowa and New Hampshire, forget it," says Harold Ickes, a veteran of Democratic politics and a Hillary Clinton supporter.

But in both parties, there is a perceived "big three" of co-favorites: Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards on the Democratic side; John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney on the Republican side. If they turn out to have different strengths in different states and have the money to survive a few setbacks, that could prolong the competition.

Guiliani, for example, would appear to benefit if states such as New Jersey and California move up to Feb. 5, possibly making up for what might be weaker showings in Iowa or the South, where his liberal stands on social issues might hurt him.

"On the Republican side, because you have candidates with different strengths, it's going to be interesting to see," says GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio, who believes the front-loaded calendar doesn't automatically make the race shorter.

Wisconsin's party leaders are hopeful things work out that way.

"It's hard for me to imagine that in a field that appears to be as wide open as this one, both parties are going to have their nominations locked up by (Feb. 19)," said Mark Jefferson, executive director of the state GOP.

"Unless this becomes a Hillary juggernaut, I don't see this thing being over that fast," said state Democratic Chairman Joe Wineke.

Political scientist Larry Jacobs of the University of Minnesota said that while "the conventional wisdom right now is it will probably be over by early February," he is not entirely convinced, given the potential for leading contenders to draw from different support groups and prosper in different places.

"If there are two that do reasonably well that Super Tuesday," he said, "it may not be such a clear verdict."

Former Gov. Tommy Thompson would figure to play a large role in a GOP primary in Wisconsin, but to get that far he would have to beat the odds and achieve major breakthroughs in the preceding states.

While Wisconsin's primary was somewhat anticlimactic in 2004, that election suggested the kind of the role the state could play under different circumstances. John Kerry was the all-but-inevitable nominee by the time he got to Wisconsin in advance of its Feb. 17 primary. The first polls in the state showed Kerry with a 30-point lead. But because the candidates ended up focused on just one state for nearly a week (that hadn't happened since the New Hampshire primary) there was space and time for a small campaign to unfold. Edwards surged from behind and almost caught Kerry, losing the primary 40% to 34%. A more personal forum

At a Harvard symposium after the campaign, Edwards campaign manager Nick Baldick explained what it meant for Kerry's rivals to compete in a stand-alone primary, where the outcome wasn't reduced to simply TV spending and momentum, but where the candidates' messages and campaign skills came back into play.

"The difference between a one-week, one-primary race in Wisconsin, and a one-week, five-state primary (on) February 3 was immense for us, because we could plop John Edwards into a state and he was great," said Baldick.

Whether the 2008 Wisconsin primary will be more or less significant than it was in 2004 remains to be seen.

Matthew Dowd, who was a top Bush strategist in '04, said Friday that he views a quasi-national primary in early February as one of at least two fundamental changes in the nominating process this time around.

The other is the early intensity of the pre-election-year campaign, as candidates jockey for money, the support of local activists, the passions of the rank-and-file, and sustained media attention. Dowd believes that struggle will begin winnowing the field even before the actual voting starts in December or January.

The early caucuses and primaries, said Dowd, are "now the end of the process, rather than the beginning of the process."

Mayors Urge 2008 Hopefuls To Address Urban Issues (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0133365

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

The nation's mayors say they will press the 2008 Democratic presidential hopefuls to address the needs of cities by crafting urban agendas early in their campaigns, but some candidates could already have an edge based on their records.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has the strongest record working with urban black mayors -- both as a senator and as first lady when her husband, Bill, was president, said Douglas H. Palmer, mayor of Trenton, N.J.

"Hillary Clinton was pushing a domestic agenda and for the bulk of homeland security money to go to cities ... after September 11," said Mr. Palmer, president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

"The candidate who forges a relationship and partnership with the nation's mayors will be the one who sees a rise in their numbers," he said, adding that he is undecided about whom he will support in 2008.

Part of forging that relationship is addressing the group's 10 working priorities, including crime prevention, funding federally mandated programs for cities and restoring funding for Community Development Block Grant programs to 2003 levels.

Mr. Palmer and others said that crime has spiked since cuts to Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), a federal grant program that helps cities hire and retain police officers. The increase in crime has been coupled with an economic decline in many urban areas.

Democratic candidates will have to work hard to generate voting support, particularly among their most loyal voting bloc: blacks. Nearly 50 percent of those votes can be found in urban areas.

Black Democratic mayors such as Detroit Mayor Kwame M. Kilpatrick have said that crime and poverty are destroying America's cities.

Mr. Kilpatrick said he has met with three of the Democratic presidential candidates, including Mrs. Clinton, whom he also touted as a strong contender. He also met with Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who Mr. Kilpatrick said is a strong advocate for eradicating poverty, a major problem in urban centers.

"Some of what I have heard is a real focus on poverty and bringing the new emerging markets and finance to the cities," he said. "And it is not just the policies of welfare, not a handout but a hand up."

Mr. Kilpatrick credited the Clintons for the creation of new policies such as welfare-to-work, which he said helped cities get more residents off the poverty rolls.

But he said cities need flexibility to put money into job training and retraining for new high-tech jobs, more affordable-housing funds and more input on how No Child Left Behind policies are implemented.

"We need to have America's mayors sitting at the table when this discussion is being made and not allow it to become an insular, inside-the-Beltway sort of thing," Mr. Kilpatrick said.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, who officially announced his candidacy for president Feb. 10, has the thinnest political record among those in the Democratic field and lacks many of the personal relationships with mayors that others have in abundance.

He also did not attend the mayors' conference last month, missing an opportunity to make a first impression. But he has other experience that many mayors say could be useful in crafting policy that focuses on the urban agenda.

"I do like the fact that Barack has been on the ground and done social work and has a hands-on perspective in Illinois," said Michael B. Coleman, mayor of Columbus, Ohio.

"Frankly, I suspect he is able to deal with many of these issues from personal knowledge, not from a book, and that is essential in the development of a policy that is effective," Mr. Coleman said.

He said the candidates' records will be important, but how they address the 10-point plan in the campaigns will be a deciding factor.

"There has to be a scramble by these people about their agenda, and then you will likely see a lot of support from me and other mayors across the country," Mr. Coleman said.

Narrowing The Religion Gap? (NYT)

By Gary Rosen

The New York Times Magazine, February 18, 2007

Try a quick political thought experiment. First, form a mental picture of the Democratic front-runners for president — Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. Now do the same for the leading Republican contenders — John McCain and Rudy Giuliani. Next (and this is the key step), imagine each of them in church, sitting in a pew, head bowed, or better still, at the pulpit, delivering a homily or leading the congregation in worship.

Strange, no? It's not hard to envision Clinton and Obama among the faithful. She is a lifelong Methodist and self-described "praying person," and he belongs to a church where some years ago he found himself (in his own words) "kneeling beneath that cross" in submission "to His will." Both slip easily into the earnest, humble-of-the-earth mode of liberal God talk.

But McCain and Giuliani? You somehow imagine them fidgeting during the hymns and checking their watches. The senator is an Episcopalian, the former mayor a Catholic, but neither man, you have to think, would be caught dead in a Bible-study group or could possibly declare, à la George W. Bush, that his favorite philosopher is "Christ, because he changed my heart." In the piety primary, the Democrats win hands down.

None of this is likely to reverse the "religion gap" in our politics — that is, the fact that regular churchgoers identify by a wide margin with the G.O.P. Come election time, the personal religiosity of the Democratic candidates won't matter nearly as much as the positions they take in all the drearily familiar theaters of the culture war. What a matchup between churchgoing Democrats and secular-minded Republicans may supply, though, is welcome moderation in our debates over issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research. God knows, both sides of the ideological divide have fundamentalists in need of taming.

On the right, the culprits are familiar, having become stock characters in our politics. In his unsuccessful run for the Republican nomination in 2000, McCain called them "the agents of intolerance," singling out Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell. For a taste of their views, you can visit the Web site of Concerned Women for America (C.W.A.), which bills itself as the "nation's largest public-policy women's organization." Its mission is "to protect and promote biblical values among all citizens," the Bible being "the inerrant Word of God and the final authority on faith and practice." As for dissenters from C.W.A.'s stand on issues like the "sanctity of human life," a handy link to Bible passages explains "why you are a sinner and deserve punishment in Hell."

A number of observers on the right, including Jeffrey Hart of National Review, Heather Mac Donald of the Manhattan Institute and the blogger Andrew Sullivan, have performed a service lately by denouncing the G.O.P.'s pact with such authoritarian bullies. But the problem can be exaggerated. Whatever their private views, most of today's big-time social conservatives speak in public as faith-based policy wonks, not as preachers of fire and brimstone. Consider James C. Dobson, the controversial founder of Focus on the Family. In a recent article titled "Two Mommies Is One Too Many," he objected to the impending parenthood of Mary Cheney and her partner. The core of his argument? What he trumpets as "more than 30 years of social-science evidence" showing that children do best with a married mother and father.

Is Dobson persuasive about the supposed evils of gay parenthood? Not to me. But the case he makes is based on an asserted set of facts — facts that are open to challenge and dependent on neither revelation nor church writ. Yes, he also avers in passing that traditional marriage is "God's design for the family and is rooted in biblical truth," and this is probably what motivates him. But is there anything wrong with so frankly religious a premise? Does it somehow disqualify his arguments?

Here is where the dogmatists of the secular left come in. Looking to fend off Bible-toting conservatives, the philosopher Richard Rorty argued more than a decade ago that in a modern democracy, faith should be a strictly private matter and has no place in public discussion. Traditional religion, he wrote, is a "conversation stopper," a source of values before which nonbelievers can be only mum. The same rigid divide informs a recent manifesto "in defense of science and secularism" signed by such academic luminaries as Daniel C. Dennett, Steven Pinker, Peter Singer and Edward O. Wilson. They urge the country's political leaders "not to permit legislation or executive action to be influenced by religious beliefs."

So categorical a rejection of faith in the public square is impossible to reconcile with our political traditions, of course. It sweeps away not just today's social conservatives but also abolitionism, women's suffrage and the civil rights movement. Dr. King without the almighty? Unthinkable. Conceding the extremism of his earlier view, Rorty himself has backtracked. Citizens should feel free to speak as believers, he now suggests, so long as they don't simply "cite authority, scriptural or otherwise."

It's a reasonable standard. After all, very few of us, whether religious or secular, can easily articulate our views about fundamental things. On questions of human dignity and human ends, we tend to sputter and assert, setting out propositions that are difficult to justify to those who don't share them. Invoking secular values like "autonomy" or "self-realization" can be just as much of a "conversation stopper" as appealing to the Bible. What we owe one another are concrete explanations, grounded in terms we might hope to share.

Can the rising field of presidential hopefuls move beyond the collision of orthodoxies to which we have grown accustomed? Maybe in some small way, if only because of the peculiarities of the personalities involved, but even that would be progress. At our present cultural moment, it is hard to think of a more edifying prospect than a campaign that will feature a running debate between churchgoing Democrats and vaguely impious Republicans.

Who Are The Bundlers? (WP)

THE 2008 presidential field has already begun to sort itself into candidates willing to disclose the identities of their big financiers and those who balk at providing this critical information. On the side of real disclosure are three Democrats, Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, along with two Republicans, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and -- in the latest addition to the ranks of openness -- Mitt Romney. Officials of the former Massachusetts governor's campaign told us that Mr. Romney will report the names of his big bundlers, the fundraisers who collect donations from large numbers of people and who thereby help their candidate far beyond the maximum of $2,300 they are legally allowed to contribute directly. Declining to provide this information are Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani.

The refusal of these candidates to live up to the standards set by President Bush during his two campaigns, as well as by 2004 Democratic nominee John F. Kerry, speaks volumes about their commitment -- or lack thereof -- to openness in government. These candidates note, correctly, that they aren't obliged to reveal the names of their big bundlers. But in what could be the first presidential campaign since Watergate to be financed entirely with private funds, in an election cycle in which the two major-party nominees alone could raise and spend $1 billion, it's critical that the identities of those helping to underwrite these expensive enterprises be released. Candidates are as indebted to those who haul in big bundles of checks for them as they would be to those who write big checks. Since the latter practice is no longer allowed, big bundlers are the most important components of a successful financial operation.

Indeed, Ms. Clinton's campaign encourages "Hillraisers" to sign up on its Web site and set fundraising targets. For its biggest bundlers, the campaign has set the audacious goal of at least $1 million. Does the campaign really believe it's tenable to keep the identities of these financiers secret? What is its justification for doing so? We single out Ms. Clinton for a number of reasons, chief among them her front-runner status, her undoubted capacity for raising enormous sums and the unprecedented size of the bundles she is seeking.

But that does not excuse the refusal of her rivals in either party to be transparent about their own financial operations. Candidates who simultaneously hold elective office -- and who therefore have another claim on donors' attention -- ought to be especially conscious of this duty. Connecticut Democrat Dodd, whose chairmanship of the Senate Banking Committee offers him a handy fundraising platform, promises to do the right thing. We've had no luck getting answers from other elected officials, including New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), and Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.).

Mr. Edwards, alone among Democratic candidates in 2004 in refusing to disclose the names of his bundlers, is well aware of both the value and peril of bundlers; his campaign was fined $9,500 by the Federal Election Commission last year for accepting in-kind contributions and illegally reimbursed donations from one of its big 2004 bundlers. Mr. Giuliani, too, knows the benefits of bundling: A 1996 report by the New York City campaign finance board, "Bundles of Trouble?" detailed how Mr. Giuliani had 205 "intermediaries" bring in more than $1 million to his 1993 mayoral campaign. "Like direct contributions, bundled contributions can be a means for buying access, influence and political power," the report noted. That is exactly why the names of bundlers should be a matter of public record.

Human Nature Redux (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

Sometimes a big idea fades so imperceptibly from public consciousness you don't even notice until it has almost disappeared. Such is the fate of the belief in natural human goodness.

This belief, most often associated with Jean-Jacques Rousseau, begins with the notion that "everything is good as it leaves the hands of the Author of things; everything degenerates in the hands of man." Human beings are virtuous and free in their natural state. It is only corrupt institutions that make them venal. They are happy in their simplicity, but social conventions make them unwell.

This belief had gigantic ramifications over the years. It led, first of all, to the belief that bourgeois social conventions are repressive and soul-destroying. It contributed to romantic revolts against tradition and etiquette. Whether it was 19th-century Parisian bohemians or 20th-century beatniks and hippies, Western culture has seen a string of antiestablishment rebellions led by people who wanted to shuck off convention and reawaken more natural modes of awareness.

It led people to hit the road, do drugs, form communes and explore free love in order to unleash their authentic selves.

In education, it led to progressive reforms, in which children were liberated to follow their natural instincts. Politically, it led to radical social engineering efforts, because if institutions were the source of sin, then all you had to do was reshape institutions in order to create a New Man.

Therapeutically, it led to an emphasis of feelings over reason, self-esteem over self-discipline. In the realm of foreign policy, it led to a sort of global doctrine of the noble savage — the belief that societies in the colonial world were fundamentally innocent, and once the chains of their oppression were lifted something wonderful would flower.

Over the past 30 years or so, however, this belief in natural goodness has been discarded. It began to lose favor because of the failure of just about every social program that was inspired by it, from the communes to progressive education on up. But the big blow came at the hands of science.

From the content of our genes, the nature of our neurons and the lessons of evolutionary biology, it has become clear that nature is filled with competition and conflicts of interest. Humanity did not come before status contests. Status contests came before humanity, and are embedded deep in human relations. People in hunter-gatherer societies were deadly warriors, not sexually liberated pacifists. As Steven Pinker has put it, Hobbes was more right than Rousseau.

Moreover, human beings are not as pliable as the social engineers imagined. Human beings operate according to preset epigenetic rules, which dispose people to act in certain ways. We strive for dominance and undermine radical egalitarian dreams. We're tribal and divide the world into in-groups and out-groups.

This darker if more realistic view of human nature has led to a rediscovery of different moral codes and different political assumptions. Most people today share what Thomas Sowell calls the Constrained Vision, what Pinker calls the Tragic Vision and what E. O. Wilson calls Existential Conservatism. This is based on the idea that there is a universal human nature; that it has nasty, competitive elements; that we don't understand much about it; and that the conventions and institutions that have evolved to keep us from slitting each other's throats are valuable and are altered at great peril.

Today, parents don't seek to liberate their children; they supervise, coach and instruct every element of their lives. Today, there really is no antinomian counterculture — even the artists and rock stars are bourgeois strivers. Today, communes and utopian schemes are out of favor. People are mostly skeptical of social engineering efforts and jaundiced about revolutionaries who promise to herald a new dawn. Iraq has revealed what human beings do without a strong order-imposing state.

This is a big pivot in intellectual history. The thinkers most associated with the Tragic Vision are Isaiah Berlin, Adam Smith, Edmund Burke, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Friedrich Hayek and Hobbes. Many of them are conservative.

And here's another perversity of human nature. Many conservatives resist the theory of evolution even though it confirms many of conservatism's deepest truths.

Rice Finds Huge Gaps Between Israel, Palestinians (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 18, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas as she presses forward with a new initiative to revive the moribund peace process.

She is to meet with Abbas in the West Bank political capital of Ramallah and with Olmert separately in Jerusalem.

Rice flew in to Israel Saturday vowing to press ahead with a risky summit with the two leaders, who are embroiled in a bitter feud over the presence of Islamist radicals in a soon-to-be-formed Palestinian government.

Rice, arriving from an unannounced visit to Iraq, went straight into talks with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni in Jerusalem.

The highlight of her mission is to be her first three-way meeting with Abbas and Olmert on Monday. She has billed that as the kick-off of a long-awaited US initiative to revive negotiations on a peace deal and the creation of a Palestinian state.

But the Rice plan has been overshadowed by controversy over a power-sharing deal reached last week between Abbas' Fatah party and the ruling Islamist group Hamas, which the US and Israel consider a terrorist group.

Speaking alongside Rice, Livni insisted Israel will not deal with the new government until its Hamas members recognise the Jewish state's right to exist, renounce violence and accept past peace agreements.

Those principles are supported by Washington and its Western partners but have so far been consistently rejected by Hamas.

"These requirements are not obstacles for peace but they are the basic conditions and foundations for any kind of vision of a two-state solution," Livni said.

"I think that the moderates in the Palestinian side need to understand that a path towards a Palestinian state needs to go though renunciation of violence and terrorism and not by compromising with terror," Livni said.

Abbas, whom Rice and President George W. Bush have long hailed as the key "partner for peace" in the Arab-Israeli standoff, insists the power-sharing understanding meets the international conditions.

Earlier Saturday, Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said "we will say to the Americans and to the Israelis that they must give a chance to this government." "The world must work with this agreement," Abu Rudeina added, speaking after a meeting between Abbas and Rice's top Middle East aide, Assistant Secretary David Welch.

While Israeli media reported that Bush backed the hardline Israeli stance in a telephone conversation with Olmert on Friday, Rice declined to publicly take sides.

She insisted that the three conditions "remain the foundational principles for a two-state solution and in fact for the formation of a leadership that can lead to that two-state solution".

But she added that Washington "will await the formation of a (Palestinian) government before making any decisions about it," as Livni watched on.

"If one waited for the perfect time to come to the Middle East, you would never get on an airplane," she said.

The West and Israel have refused critical financial aid to the Palestinian government since Hamas took control of the administration after unexpectedly trouncing Fatah in legislative elections a year ago.

Abbas was elected separately and has significant executive powers under the Palestinian constitution.

The aid embargo has exacerbated an economic crisis in the Palestinian areas and fueled tensions that erupted into deadly violence between Fatah and Hamas supporters in recent weeks.

Abbas says the understandings reached with Hamas meet the West's principles by stating that the new government will respect "Arab and international" agreements and past accords signed with Israel by the Fatah-led PLO -- steps that imply recognition of Israel according to this view.

Regardless of the outcome of her meetings here, Rice could come under pressure to ease the boycott from Washington's partners in the so-called Quartet of mediators who first laid down the principles -- the European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Following her visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories, she is to meet her Quartet counterparts in Berlin on Wednesday.

3 Parties Jostle Before Meeting In Jerusalem (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 17 — A much anticipated meeting of Israelis, Palestinians and Americans here on Monday — seen as a possible first step to rejuvenating Middle East peace talks — seems likely to be overtaken by battles over a new Palestinian unity government.

On Saturday, representatives of all three groups were jostling for position before the meeting, with the Americans and Israelis saying that the new government must recognize Israel, and the Palestinian Authority president saying that the world would have to live with the coalition.

But it was unclear whether those statements sounded a death knell for restarting talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to represent the United States at the meeting.

Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, and his political movement, Fatah, recently agreed to form a unity government with the militant group Hamas to try to end deadly fighting between the groups. But Hamas, which won last year's legislative elections, has not yet agreed to recognize Israel and renounce violence, as the Israelis, Americans and many Europeans have demanded.

On Saturday, Bush administration officials informed Mr. Abbas that the United States would continue its boycott of the Palestinian government if the unity government did not meet its demands, according to Arab and American officials. Those officials would not speak for attribution before the meeting on Monday.

Mr. Abbas responded with what amounted to "take it or leave it," his spokesman, Nabil Abu Rdeneh, told reporters.

Ms. Rice stopped short of calling off the long-term peace effort, saying she wanted to wait until the unity government was formed to give it a chance to meet American conditions.

Tzipi Livni, Israeli's foreign minister, said that the Israelis would attend the meeting on Monday but that they would not proceed further with peace negotiations unless the new Palestinian government recognized Israel and renounced violence.

Abbas Tells U.S. He's Done His Best (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

The world will have to deal with a new Hamas-Fatah coalition even if its platform falls short of international demands such as recognition of Israel, Mahmoud Abbas told a U.S. envoy Saturday, according to an aide to the Palestinian president.

DOJ_NMG_0133370

Abbas told State Department official David Welch he will deliver the same message _ that he has done his best to moderate the Islamic militants _ at an upcoming summit with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the aide.

However, Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni suggested later Saturday that there would be no room for compromise. Speaking at the start of a meeting in Jerusalem, they said any Palestinian government would have to meet the three conditions of international acceptance _ recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace deals with Israel.

"The moderates on the Palestinian side need to understand that the path toward a Palestinian state goes through the renunciation of violence and terrorism and not by compromising with terror," Livni said, in an apparent reference to Abbas.

At Abbas' headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah, the president told Welch that he had no choice but to cut a deal with Hamas, which won parliamentary elections last year. Abbas was elected separately in 2005 and also wields considerable power.

"President Abbas told David Welch that the Mecca agreement was the only possible agreement and the world must deal with it," Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said. The U.S. side did not comment on the meeting.

"In the three-way meeting with Olmert and Rice, President Abbas is going to say that this government should be given a chance." Abu Rdeneh said.

The platform of the coalition between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement falls short of the international demands, containing only a vague promise to "respect" previous peace deals, which could be seen as implied recognition of Israel.

Rice said Saturday she would withhold judgment until the government is formed.

The U.S. secretary of state said the Palestinian coalition talks were complicating the summit, which was to have been a step toward restarting Israeli-Palestinian peace talks after more than six years of fighting.

"Despite the complications it's an important time to have these discussions ... about the principles of two states for two peoples," she said.

The Hamas government, which resigned Thursday to make way for the new coalition, was hit by an international aid boycott that nearly bankrupted it.

Despite that warning, Abbas went ahead with the new coalition, based on a power-sharing deal reached last week in the Muslim holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia.

On Thursday, Abbas asked Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to start forming the new coalition. Haniyeh has five weeks to do so.

The Palestinians fear a return to deadly factional fighting if the fragile power-sharing arrangement fails. In recent months, dozens of people have been killed in violence between Hamas and Fatah.

In the West Bank, gunmen opened fire early Saturday on the home of a Hamas Cabinet member, Planning Minister Samir Abu Eisha, breaking some windows, but causing no injuries.

Abbas: "World Must Deal" With Hamas (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

JERUSALEM - Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, speaking hours before the arrival of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a mission to revive peace talks, delivered a blunt message: "The world must deal" with Hamas.

He made his comments in a meeting with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David Welch in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

"President Abbas told David Welch that the Mecca agreement was the only possible agreement, and the world must deal with it," Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said after the meeting.

He was referring to a Saudi-brokered deal between the militant Islamist group Hamas and Mr. Abbas' secular Fatah party to share power in a new Palestinian government.

Miss Rice, who arrived in Jerusalem last night after a surprise visit to Iraq, acknowledged that her visit was taking place at a "complicated time."

Immediately after her arrival, Miss Rice met with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. She is to meet with Mr. Abbas today.

The climax of her visit is expected tomorrow, when Miss Rice hosts a summit between Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

The summit has been clouded by Hamas' continued refusal to meet three conditions recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace agreements.

DOJ_NMG_0133371

Hamas is labeled a terrorist group by the United States and Europe, which have imposed a crippling economic embargo since the militant group won a majority of seats in the Palestinian government early last year.

"In the three-way meeting with Olmert and Rice, President Abbas is going to say that this government should be given a chance," Mr. Abu Rdeneh said.

Miss Rice said the United States had decided it would wait until the installation of the new government before deciding whether to cooperate with it.

"It only makes sense that you have to renounce violence. It only makes sense that you have to recognize the right of your partner to exist and to respect international agreements," Miss Rice said.

"Those principles remain the foundational principles for the formation of two states and the formation of a leadership that can lead to that two-state solution," she said.

With the Palestinian government dependent on international aid, the previous Hamas government had been subject to an economic embargo by the United States and Europe.

Limited international aid has been channeled through Mr. Abbas, who was elected president in 2005. Power within the Palestinian government is split between the president and a Cabinet, which is lead by a prime minister.

The Cabinet posts of the new coalition government and its policy guidelines have yet to be agreed on.

The United States hopes the meeting tomorrow with the Palestinian and Israeli leaders will establish a set of principles to begin negotiations on a final Israel-Palestinian agreement.

Success would mark the first peace negotiations in six years, since Israeli and Palestinian diplomats failed to reach a deal in the waning hours of the Clinton administration and the first months of the Palestinian uprising.

But instead, Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert and Miss Rice appear likely to be detoured by the Mecca agreement and how it will affect relations with the Palestinian Authority and the flow of international aid.

"This is a very sensitive point in time after the agreements between the Fatah and Hamas. The understandings don't meet the requirements of the international community," Mrs. Livni said before her meeting with Miss Rice.

"These requirements are not an obstacle for peace, but they are the basic conditions and foundation for any kind of for the vision of a two-state solution."

Israelis Are Gone, But Gaza Rebuilding Is Slow (NYT)

By Greg Myre

RAFAH, Gaza Strip, Feb. 16 — In a place were most everyone has a hard-luck story, Ibrahim Abu Shatat could write an entire book. Two of his homes have been destroyed by Israeli troops, he has been out of work for six years and his family of nine has lived in the storage room under Rafah's soccer stadium for three years.

Yet Mr. Shatat may be one of the few Gazans who see a ray of hope. Partly through his persistence, construction has begun on 300 homes in the sand dunes next to the former Jewish settlement of Rafiah Yam. Along with a neighboring school, they are the first major construction projects in or near a settlement since Israeli soldiers and settlers pulled out of the Gaza Strip in summer 2005. And one of those homes will be his, possibly by fall, Mr. Shatat said.

The Israeli withdrawal raised Palestinian hopes for new homes, schools and businesses, and an easing of the overcrowding in the Gaza Strip, an impoverished coastal territory where about 1.5 million Palestinians live.

"When the Israelis left, we demanded that the Palestinian government give us a piece of land," said Mr. Shatat, 47. But internal Palestinian turmoil, the conflict with Israel and a lack of money have kept the abandoned settlements looking almost exactly as they were the day the Israelis left. Israel, in agreement with the Palestinians, flattened the roughly 1,600 settler homes, and so far, the rubble is being removed from only 3 of the 21 settlements.

But there is progress on the barren patch that was a no man's land just outside Rafiah Yam, in southwest Gaza near the border with Egypt.

Mr. Shatat took his wife, Maha, to the construction site for the first time on Friday to see the cinder-block foundations of about 20 homes. The plans call for modest, detached houses of two or three stories, with one family living on each floor. "I'm so excited," Mrs. Shatat said. "Now I finally believe it is happening."

Since the Palestinian uprising began in 2000, at least 1,500 families in Rafah have lost their homes, according to the Palestinians. Israeli military bulldozers made repeated forays to destroy houses that Israel said were being used by weapons smugglers and gunmen firing on Israeli forces along the border with Egypt.

The Israeli departure raised the prospect of land-hungry Palestinians flooding into the former settlements. But while many Palestinians are impatient for new housing, security guards have kept out would-be squatters in most, but not all, cases. The settlements also came with greenhouses that offered the prospect of thousands of agricultural jobs. Yet the greenhouses sit idle.

The Palestinians invested millions of dollars to repair the greenhouses shortly after the Israelis left, and had an excellent crop in the winter of 2005 and 2006. But they were unable to export their produce to Europe, the main market, because Israel kept Gaza's main crossing for goods closed for weeks at a time, citing security concerns.

Short of money and fearing a similar fate this year, the Palestinians did not plant a winter crop in the greenhouses. But the goods crossing has been mostly open in recent weeks, when the crops would have been ready for export.

The Palestinian Agriculture Ministry says it will soon start renting the greenhouses to private farmers and will encourage them to grow for the local market, since there are no guarantees that fruits, vegetables and flowers can be exported in a timely manner.

Ahmed Yousef, an adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said the government had been allocating former settlement land for universities, hospitals, recreation facilities and housing. The projects have been slow in developing for several reasons. The Palestinian government has never been known for its efficiency, and several months after the Israelis left Gaza, Hamas, the radical Islamic movement, came to power, which prompted Western countries to cut direct financial assistance. "We had to find countries to finance these projects," Mr. Yousef said. Saudi Arabia is providing $11.5 million for the 300 homes in southern Gaza, and the United Nations development program is overseeing the project.

Mr. Shatat was a welder in Israel for 14 years and built a large, three-story home in Rafah, just 50 yards from Gaza's border with Egypt. But the Palestinian uprising that began in 2000 dealt his personal fortunes a double blow.

Mr. Shatat was among the thousands of Palestinians who lost their jobs as Israel restricted the number of Palestinian workers allowed in. Then, five years ago, with Palestinian militants in Rafah battling Israeli troops, Mr. Shatat's home was rendered uninhabitable when Israeli forces demolished his neighbor's home. The Shatats rented a home nearby; that was destroyed in January 2004 when Israel tore down more homes. The only shelter Mr. Shatat could find for his wife and eight children, now ages 3 to 20, was the storage room under the Rafah stadium.

As soon as he moved his family in, Mr. Shatat began lobbying the Palestinian Authority to build replacement homes for those destroyed in the fighting, but received little help, he said. He set up a committee for the homeless in Rafah, and made himself a nuisance at government offices in Gaza City, particularly at the Land Authority. "I told them that if they did not give us land, we would start living in their offices," he said.

About a year ago, the Palestinian government allocated land for 300 homes, though this will provide shelter for fewer than half those who lost homes in fighting along the border, according to Mr. Shatat.

Several miles up the Mediterranean coast, the former settlement of Tel Katifa offers a more typical example of the state of the former settlements. At its northwest corner, armed members of Fatah stand guard, maintaining positions they have held since shortly after the Israeli departure. Along the southern side, Hamas forces hold an outpost established a month ago, in a bid to replace the Fatah men.

At the southwest corner, unarmed guards from the Agriculture Ministry hope their presence, marked by a torn Palestinian flag flapping overhead, will discourage the factions from shooting at each other. So far, Fatah and Hamas have exchanged only sporadic gunfire during the factional fighting in Gaza.

Meanwhile, a family affiliated with Fatah is living in Tel Katifa's former kindergarten, the one building left standing when the Israelis pulled out. Fawzi Abu Abed said his family moved in after receiving permission from a Palestinian family that claimed it owned the land before the Israelis arrived. Mr. Abed said his home was destroyed by the Israelis in 2002, and government subsidies to rent a home ran out last year. "The government is broke, so we had to find our own solution," Mr. Abed said.

Egyptian Charged With Spying For Israel In Turkey; Israel Denies It (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 17 — An Egyptian student who fled the country six years ago is now sitting in jail, arrested upon his return to Cairo on charges of spying for Israel.

According to his former lawyer, the man, Mohamed Essam Ghoneim el-Attar, has confessed and is "regretting everything he has done." Mr. Attar, who has dual citizenship in Egypt and Canada, is facing a likely sentence of 15 to 25 years, the lawyer said.

"His personal circumstances — divorced parents, needs a job — are no excuse," said the lawyer, Ragab el-Assal, who met with the defendant last week. "He is someone who sold himself for the sake of money and ambition, the destructive kind."

Mr. Attar, who originally fled Egypt to avoid a prison sentence for what the lawyer said was his failure to pay a car repair bill, has been allowed only limited access to legal counsel since he was arrested on Jan. 1, Mr. Assal said before seeing him. In fact, at the time Mr. Assal was not even sure where Mr. Attar, 31, had been incarcerated.

"All they said to me is, 'We do not have him,' even though I have an official permit to see him," said Mr. Assal, after he had spent an entire day visiting Egyptian authorities and prisons in search of his client.

But after finally seeing his client and examining the investigation files, Mr. Assal relinquished the case, adding that he thought Mr. Attar was guilty as charged and would be convicted accordingly.

"I wish the confessions were a result of torture and the case a fabrication; I wish he was innocent," Mr. Assal said. "But there are confessions, witnesses and evidence. It is a lost case."

Egyptian law enforcement authorities have not disclosed the details of the arrest, which they announced more than one month later. But an account of the case was reported by Al Ahram, a newspaper with close ties to the government.

According to the newspaper, Mr. Attar left Egypt in August 2001 on a tourist visa to Turkey, where he offered his services at the Israeli Embassy and was recruited by an agent of the Mossad, Israel's intelligence service, to gather information about Egyptians and Arabs living there.

The newspaper also said he was asked to select other potential recruits by luring them with "money and women," and that he later moved to Canada where he converted to Christianity, changed his name to Joseph, obtained Canadian citizenship and got a job at a bank in Toronto with the help of two other Mossad agents.

Mr. Assal said witnesses included people who said they were approached by Mr. Attar in Turkey. According to the news report, the three Israelis have been charged with espionage and will be tried by Egyptian courts in absentia.

Israeli officials denied the allegations, saying they learned about the case from news reports.

"I would summarize it in one word: nonsense," said the Israeli minister of Internal Security, Avi Dichter, while speaking to reporters last week in Ottawa.

Israeli intelligence services have been accused of using Canadian identities to shield agents before. In 1997, Mossad agents, using fabricated Canadian passports, tried to assassinate a leader of Hamas in Jordan, causing the Canadian government to file a protest. At the time, the Israeli government said it would not use false Canadian passports again, a pledge Mr. Dichter repeated last week.

"Those days are over and that's why I say it is a fabrication," he told reporters.

Deciding On The Enemy Worth Talking To (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WHEN it comes to finding a way to disarm your enemies, here is a puzzle: How do you decide which dictatorial, nuke-building regimes to negotiate with, and which to freeze out, sanction or intimidate with a couple of aircraft carriers?

That, in a nutshell, is a looming question raised by last week's long-delayed deal with North Korea. Even while hardliners and conservatives were assailing the administration last week for "selling out" to Kim Jong Il, some in the administration were wondering whether there are lessons here for dealing with Iran.

The deal Mr. Bush approved requires North Korea to stop producing plutonium, seal its giant nuclear facility at Yongbyon and — after a negotiation yet to happen — take apart the nuclear complex. Over the next 60 days, the North also has to invite back the inspectors it threw out of the country four years ago — and declare where it has hidden the rest of its nuclear materials and facilities.

That would seem hard enough for the hermit nation, but the next part could be even harder: In return for concessions no one is yet talking about, the North would give up its nuclear arsenal.

Many hardened North Korea watchers say it will never happen. After all, that arsenal, estimated by American intelligence agencies at six to a dozen weapons or the fuel for them, is the only source of power for the isolated, bankrupt Hermit Kingdom.

But here's the curious part: Mr. Bush's aides worked out this "first step" in one-on-one talks in Berlin of the kind the White House refused to hold a few years back, while North Korea was still busily producing nuclear fuel to make its next generation of weapons. Those are exactly the steps Mr. Bush refuses to take with Tehran.

On Wednesday, even while celebrating the North Korean deal, Mr. Bush repeated his bottom line on opening talks with Tehran: They must stop enriching uranium first.

So what explains the difference? Why talk to one brutal regime that imprisons its dissidents in gulags, while refusing all kinds of advice — from Republicans, the Iraq Study Group, and others — to start talking to Iran?

Inside the White House, the logic goes this way: North Korea's nuclear program is already "mature," a delicate way of saying that, thanks to years of failed efforts of administrations that go back three decades, the country has joined the eight other nations known to have nuclear weapons. Insisting on suspending fuel production, one senior administration official said recently, would not gain the United States any leverage.

Iran, they argue, is different. It has no weapons — at least not yet. The Americans' objective is to prevent the Iranians from following the North Korean model, and to avoid waking up some day to news of the Iranian equivalent of North Korea's nuclear detonation, which took place last October.

But President Bush worries, his aides say, that to negotiate with Iran while it is still enriching uranium would be to open up Washington to blackmail. "Think about it," said one senior administration official. "While we're talking, the clock ticks. The Iranians can drag this out for years. But while the talks are on, no one is willing to invoke real sanctions" — or threaten, even vaguely, that if the issue isn't settled soon Mr. Bush or the Israelis might consider "disabling" Iran's facilities from the air.

This results in the American conundrum, made worse by Iran's ability to cause trouble in Iraq, a problem the administration has been loudly declaring is getting worse. "When you can't bomb, and you won't negotiate, you end up in a third box — acquiescing to bad things happening," said Robert Gallucci, the dean of the Georgetown School of Foreign Service, who was the main American interlocutor with North Korea in the Clinton administration.

"Many will say, 'What about sanctions?' " Mr. Gallucci added. But that "often turns out to be acquiescing," especially if countries like Russia, one of Iran's biggest trading partners, decline to turn the screws.

Of course, what Mr. Bush is facing now is the worst of all those bad choices. With no negotiations underway with Iran, the country has defied the United Nations and is continuing to enrich uranium (though it appears to have run into technical troubles that have slowed its progress). While the Security Council has imposed some mild sanctions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concedes that trying to escalate those punishments by passing more Security Council resolutions is probably ineffective. The Russians and the Chinese have made clear they simply won't go along much farther.

That leaves Mr. Bush with the choice of hinting at military action — an option his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, has all but dismissed. "For the umpteenth time we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran," he declared the other day, out of exasperation.

So, instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to exert more financial pressure against European banks and others who do business with Iran, in hopes of squeezing the country so hard that it decides its leaders have to go.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, argued in a speech in Washington on Wednesday that the squeeze is working — in ways it could not in North Korea — because Iran is "not a monolithic system, there are many voices, many different points of view." Mr. Bush mused happily the other day about the troubles that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the Holocaust-questioning president of Iran, is facing from elements of Iranian society that want jobs and visas.

What may really be going on here, says Robert S. Litwak, the author of "Regime Change," is that, "Iran is seen as the more dynamic threat" than North Korea. "That means the administration felt it could defer the core issue of disarmament" in the case of the North; it does not feel that it has that luxury with the Iranians, even if they are years from an actual weapon.

But the ultimate lesson of the North Korea case may be that even after sanctions, even after mutual threats, at some point both sides have to take the leap toward negotiations.

The Iranians keep sending hints they are ready to do so; on Friday evening, in response to questions, a senior administration official who is at the center of Iran policymaking (but would not agree to be quoted on the record) insisted that "it is not us refusing to talk to the Iranians, but they are refusing to come back" under the conditions the United States and Europe established.

North Korea is also a reminder that those conditions can change. Just a year or two ago the deal reached last week would have been rejected by administration hardliners as rewarding bad behavior — and perpetuating one of the world's most repressive governments. That is still the view of many of the advisers Mr. Bush once relied on.

In the last two years of his administration, he has confronted reality in the coldest corner of East Asia. The question now is whether that foreshadows a similar shift as he confronts the dangers of the hottest corner of the Middle East.

No Cold War, Perhaps, But Surely A Lukewarm Peace (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

PRESIDENT VLADIMIR PUTIN'S acerbic assault on American unilateralism last weekend in Munich might not have heralded a return to the bad old days of global ideological confrontation — of blocs and proxy wars, dissidents and spies, arms races and mutually assured destruction — even if some were quick to say it did.

The problem is, Cold War II could in its own way be just as messy and unpredictable. For all the talk of strategic partnership and even personal friendship between Mr. Putin and President Bush, the relationship between Russia and the United States has reached what is probably its lowest point since the Soviet Union collapsed a decade and a half ago.

This is now "the world of one master, one sovereign," Mr. Putin said in Munich, and he was in no way pleased. "The United States," he said, "has overstepped its national borders, and in every area."

The countries seem headed into a period of tensions when every step is met with distrust and some counterstep, putting them on opposite sides of hotspots around the world, from Iran to Georgia to Kosovo.

And with presidential elections in both countries coming in 2008, it is unlikely to get better, since candidates rarely score points at home by being conciliatory abroad.

The countries are now openly competing for influence in Europe, in the Caucasus and in Central Asia, where access to natural resources and military bases has become paramount for both. The Bush administration's plan to build ballistic missile defenses in Poland and the Czech Republic is viewed with outright hostility here. So is NATO's flirtation with Georgia and Ukraine, both former Soviet republics that Russia considers part of its historic sphere of influence.

Equally hostile is the American view of Russia's arms sales to Syria, Venezuela and, most worrisome of all, Iran. Russia last month provided Iran with $700 million worth of TOR-M1 antiaircraft batteries whose likely target in the event of conflict would be American fighters and bombers, just as Russian anti-tank weapons, originally sold to Syria, were used against Israeli forces fighting Hezbollah in Lebanon last year, prompting diplomatic protests from Israel.

The areas in which Mr. Putin and Mr. Bush have cooperated closely — against terrorism and the spread of nuclear weapons — suddenly seem like sources of confrontation as much as collaboration. Last week's deal with North Korea to suspend its nuclear programs offers hope of collaboration, but a declaration by Russia's top general that Russia could withdraw from the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, negotiated by Ronald Reagan and Mikhail Gorbachev in 1987, portends the opposite.

"There was an equilibrium and a fear of mutual destruction," Mr. Putin said in his Munich speech, delivered at an annual trans-Atlantic security conference. "And in those days one party was afraid to make an extra step without consulting the other. And this was certainly a fragile peace and a frightening one, but as we see today, it was reliable enough. Today it seems that the peace is not so reliable."

Russia and the United States are no more likely to go to war than before, when their nuclear arsenals assured a perpetual standoff, as they still do. But potential flashpoints abound. And, as in the cold war, it would not take much for simmering tensions to become a grave breach, even a violent one.

Last September, for example, someone in South Ossetia, the Russian-supported enclave in Georgia, fired on a helicopter carrying the Georgian defense minister on the same day that a Senate delegation including John McCain was flying around the region.

"Can you imagine," said Andrew Kuchins of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, "if they had shot down John McCain's helicopter?"

Mr. Putin's speech, which was interpreted at least by some in Russia as a defining moment akin to Winston Churchill's in 1946 that gave the world the phrase "Iron Curtain," almost certainly reflected Russia's rediscovered swagger on the world stage. It certainly could become a historical marker. Buoyed by soaring energy prices, Mr. Putin's Kremlin is more assertive about its role in the Middle East, in Asia, in Europe — and inevitably that means tripping over American interests in those places.

Mr. Putin was also airing long-simmering grievances about the heavy-handedness of American foreign policy that began under President Bill Clinton and continued under Mr. Bush. The complaint is of the United States' disregard for Russia's feelings on issue after issue since the 1990s, from the expansion of NATO to the alliance's war against Serbia, when Russia was simply too weak and chaotic to do anything about it.

"The West has not reckoned with the quick revival of Russia," said Alexander Rahr, a Russia expert at the German Council on Foreign Relations. He stopped short of predicting Cold War II but, "We can surely speak of the emergence of a cold peace."

After reaching out to Mr. Bush in the first hours after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Putin and others here have expressed dismay at what they see as a string of broken promises: an unfinished war in Afghanistan, with a growth of heroin production that inevitably reaches Russia; and, even worse, the seeming permanence of an airfield in Kyrgyzstan once billed as temporary. Then there is the war in Iraq, which Russians vehemently opposed and Mr. Putin warned would be catastrophic for regional peace.

American officials have expressed equal dismay with Mr. Putin's unmet promises on democratization and an "energy dialogue" that was supposed to expand opportunities for American oil and gas companies but died with the Kremlin's campaign to impose state control over natural resources. Mr. Putin spent last week in the Middle East, including Qatar, another major producer of natural gas, expressing interest in a “gas OPEC” that could coordinate policy and prices for Europe and the United States.

“That is what worries me about a new cold war: both sides feel betrayed,” said Sergei M. Rogov, director of the Institute for the Study of the United States and Canada in Moscow.

Mr. Rogov said the two countries now disagreed on economics, politics, military matters and, most important, values. The latter includes distinct worldviews, he said: Russia’s desire for multinational solutions that give it a voice versus American unilateralism that, especially under Mr. Bush, disdains the constraints of international treaties and obligations. Increasingly they seem to be talking past each other.

The most ominous development, Mr. Rogov said, would be a breakdown in cooperation on nuclear nonproliferation. To turn the tide of nationalistic ambitions to acquire nuclear weapons will require the countries to agree, as they did with North Korea but have yet to do with Iran.

“If we fight, politically not militarily,” he said, “who will be minding the store?”

American officials were clearly shocked by the tone of Mr. Putin’s speech but sought to emphasize the areas of agreement. And Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates went so far as to retort, “One cold war was enough.”

Talking Tough To Stay In Power (WP)

By Anders Aslund

Vladimir Putin spoke his mind when he launched into an anti-American tirade in Munich recently, accusing the United States of having "overstepped its national borders in every way: in the economy, in politics, and in the humanitarian sphere it imposes its policies on other states. Well, who likes this?" Given the United States' Iraq troubles, it is natural that the Russian president would thrive on American weakness. But his speech was as notable for what it said about his domestic politics.

Putin obviously thinks he is riding high. The Russian economy is booming. Incredibly, in the past seven years, Russia's gross domestic product has grown by 500 percent, measured in current dollars (from $200 billion in 1999 to $1 trillion last year). The world is desperate for Russia's oil and gas, and Putin remains astoundingly popular at home. His successor is certain to be handpicked by him. One can only marvel at how adeptly he handles a 3 1/2 -hour televised news conference, with detailed answers, alternating charm and combativeness.

Despite all that, Putin has painted himself into a corner as he faces the end of the two terms in office that the Russian constitution allows him. This is a man who speaks the language of a modern leader trying to rebuild his country, when in fact he and his cronies have really just wanted to enrich themselves. Having spent his time as president undermining democracy, property rights, the free press and the rule of law by taking over Yukos oil (and throwing its owner into a Siberian prison) and then other big companies, now he and his coterie must cling to power somehow -- or risk losing it all if they cannot stage-manage a transition to the proper person.

The tolerance of corruption in the Putin regime is astounding. Recently, for instance, a Swiss court established that Minister of Communications Leonid Reiman, a close personal friend of Putin's, was the owner of telecommunications assets in Russia worth more than a billion dollars. But this has not been reported in major media in Russia, and Reiman remains at his post without having offered any explanation or apology, only an implausible blanket denial.

How can Putin and his cronies give this up?

It seems clear that Putin has these worries in mind when he fulminates on the world stage against the United States. Such words have the effect of increasing his popularity and therefore his grip on the country, which has been suffocated by his near-total control of television stations, newspapers, nominations of candidates, political parties and even public meetings. The evidence of a growing Russian authoritarianism is clear: Russia is one of the few countries that has declined since 2000 from "partly free" to "not free," according to Freedom House's meticulous ratings.

Russia's foreign policy in these seven years has changed accordingly, showing how brazen national political values do affect a country's behavior outside its borders. Recently, for instance, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov boasted: "Not one single significant international problem can be resolved without Russia or against Russia." Rather than acting as a problem-solver -- as Putin did in his first term when, for instance, he cooperated with the U.S. effort against the Taliban in Afghanistan -- he is now positioning himself as a spoiler on the world stage when it comes to the United States and its allies.

Nevertheless, Putin has managed to charm some Western leaders -- former German chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, former Italian prime minister Silvio Berlusconi, outgoing French President Jacques Chirac and, most notably, President Bush. Just this month, Bush told the Wall Street Journal: "Vladimir Putin has kept his word on everything he's said to me." Well, then he cannot have said much. Putin reciprocated in his anti-American Munich speech: "I consider the president of the United States my friend. He is a decent person." He could as well have said: "He is a useful fool."

Putin has divided the European Union by pampering its southern members -- France, Greece, Italy and Spain -- while antagonizing Poland and the three Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, which have tied themselves closely to the United States. In Moscow, the four latter states are called the "aggressive new minority" in the E.U.

Russia has shown itself to be most aggressive in foreign policy in its own neighborhood of former Soviet republics. It has antagonized these countries so badly with its bullying -- oil cutoffs, transportation blockades, trade shutdowns, immigration crackdowns -- that they are all rushing for the exits and seeking closer cooperation with NATO and the E.U. or working to develop new energy pipelines that skirt Russia. Russia's role in the region is dwindling despite its growing oil- and gas-fueled national wealth. As nationalist intellectual Stanislav Belkovsky, director of the National Strategy Institute in Moscow, recently put it: "In 2006, Russia ceased to be a regional power."

Likewise, even as it declares itself an energy superpower, Russia has tripped itself up. In the past year, it has bombarded its neighbors with rude surprises: oil taxes and higher gas prices; spigots closed to force a political point. No amount of reassurance at this point can erase concerns in Europe about Russia as a reliable energy supplier. In the post-Soviet space, both friends and foes of Russia are repelled, finding Putin's regime too unreliable and abrasive. They all now are trying to reduce their dependence on Russia.

The ultimate question is how the Putin regime will end. For the first time in Russian history, the secret police are fully in charge, right to the top. A tightly knit circle of Putin's friends from his St. Petersburg KGB days rules in the Kremlin. Led by Igor Sechin, Putin's closest colleague, they control virtually all security organs. There is much speculation about whether they can even be overruled by Putin himself. The closest parallel to the Sechin group in the past is the group controlled by Joseph Stalin's secret police chief Lavrentii Beria, though there is one great difference: Unlike Putin, Stalin was not a creature of the security apparatus; he manipulated it for his own needs. There is another big difference: This group is interested only in amassing great wealth, not in controlling the lives of its countrymen. Which is why it is alarmed by the prospect of the 2008 presidential election and why Moscow is awash with rumors that Putin will find a way to stay on.

Given what is at stake, the United States can no longer be a mere bystander in this drama. Six years of soft policy on Russia have done nothing but encourage the Kremlin's anti-Western stand. Bush could learn a lesson from Mikheil Saakashvili, president of Georgia, to carry a big stick when dealing with Putin. When Bush compliments Putin, he evokes only contempt in the Kremlin. President Ronald Reagan knew how important it was to speak the truth loudly and clearly. Vice President Cheney's speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, last May was a welcome departure, which enraged the Kremlin. It's the time for the White House to follow through.

The West persuaded Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev to ratify the Helsinki conventions on human rights and free and fair elections in 1975. The Helsinki conventions played an important role in undermining the Soviet dictatorship. The United States should invoke them again as Russia approaches a new round of parliamentary and presidential elections, in which it now appears that every rule in the book is set to be violated.

Indeed, in Munich Putin saved his rudest abuse for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which was founded on the Helsinki conventions and is the international organization for monitoring elections. Like Brezhnev, Putin accused the OSCE of "interfering in the internal affairs of other countries," but the Helsinki conventions made democracy an international concern. Putin and his cronies may not like that, but given the link between Russia's domestic policies and its foreign behavior, it's important for the West to insist.

The Good Old Days Of The Cold War (LAT)

By Paul Kennedy

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Don't wax too nostalgic -- the world was once a much more dangerous place.

IT WAS FUNNY, in a grim sort of way. Last week, Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates responded to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's polemical attack on the United States by remembering the 50-year Cold War as a "less complex time" and saying he was "almost nostalgic" for its return.

Gates should know. He himself is the quintessential Cold Warrior, having served nearly 27 years in the Central Intelligence Agency (facing off against the likes of Putin, who was for 17 years an agent in the foreign intelligence branch of the Soviet KGB).

So we should take him seriously when he suggests that the problems of 20 or 30 years ago were in some ways more manageable than our current global predicament.

Nor is he alone. There is a palpable sense of nostalgia these days for the familiar contours of that bygone conflict, which has been replaced by a much more murky, elusive and confusing age.

The argument goes as follows: The Cold War, although unpleasant, was inherently stable. It was a bipolar world — centered on Washington and Moscow — and, as UC Berkeley political scientist Kenneth Waltz argued, it was much more predictable than, say, the shifting, multipolar world of the 1910s or 1930s, decades that were followed by calamitous wars. Yes, it's true that the two sides possessed masses of nuclear weapons aimed at each other's biggest cities, but the reality is that they were constrained by a mutual balance of terror.

They had divided Europe and divided Asia, and no one, except in the Korean War, crossed those lines. Even that conflict confirmed the essential stasis. Of course, they carried out surrogate wars — in Asia, Africa and Central America, in Vietnam and Afghanistan — but they never came into direct conflict. Hot lines, summit conferences and SALT treaties kept things under control. Polish and Czech dissidents might get tossed into prison but, hey, that was not a cause for an international crisis. Those were indeed the good old days. East was East and West was West.

Today's world is far less stable and indeed much less favorable to the comfortable Western democracies. It is not just that we face an almost-impossible-to-manage "war on terrorism," with all of its capacities for asymmetrical damage to ourselves, our allies and everyone else, even as we swat the occasional terrorist group. It is not just that we are deeply mired in Iraq and Afghanistan and that the whole Middle East may totter because of the failure (one hopes not, but let's not blink) to win on the ground. It is not just that we haven't a clue how to deal with the present, disturbing Iranian regime. It is not just that we haven't the energy to block Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez from his arrogant anti-American policies across Latin America.

It is not just that Putin is advertising his anger against the United States in speeches and continuing his manipulation of global oil and gas prices, his support of Iran, his intrusions into the Middle East. It is not just that the Chinese leadership is openly staking a new place in the world order, in its Africa diplomacy, its missile tests and its move into hitherto Western-dominated international institutions. And it is not just that a dozen or more fragile states, chiefly in Africa, are collapsing into chaos, while various other societies, chiefly in South America, are unraveling. It is the unnerving fact that all of this is happening at the same time, though at different speeds and different levels of intensity.

So is it true? Was the Cold War era, on the whole, a safer era? Ponder the following counterarguments:

First, however tricky our relationships with Putin's Russia and President Hu Jintao's China are nowadays, the prospect of our entering a massive and mutually cataclysmic conflict with either nation are vastly reduced.

We seem to have forgotten that our right-wing hawks argued passionately for "nuking" communist China during the Korean War and again during the Taiwan Straits crisis of 1954. We also have apparently forgotten — although newly released archival evidence overwhelmingly confirms this — how close we came to a nuclear Armageddon during the Cuban Missile Crisis.

Likewise, we've forgotten the shock of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, which prompted then-German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to ask, "Is this the new Sarajevo?" a reference to the outbreak of World War I. And who still remembers 1984-85, when we were riveted by Jonathan Schell's argument in the New Yorker that even a few nuclear explosions would trigger such dust storms as to produce a "nuclear winter"?

Those were really scary times, and much more dangerous than our present circumstance because the potential damage that could be inflicted during an East-West conflagration was far, far greater than anything that Al Qaeda can do to us now. No one has the exact totals, but we probably had 20,000 missiles pointed at each other, often on high alert. And the threat of an accidental discharge was high.

None of today's college-age students were born in 1945, 1979 or maybe even 1984. None lived with those triangular signs proclaiming their schools to be nuclear bomb shelters.

To recapture those frightening atmospherics these days, university professors must resort to showing Cold War movies: "The Manchurian Candidate," "Fail Safe," "Dr. Strangelove," "The Hunt for Red October," "Five Days in May," "The Spy Who Came in from the Cold." Students look rather dumbfounded when told that we came close, on several occasions, to World War III.

Yet what if, for example, Josef Stalin had prevented American and British supply aircraft from flying into Berlin in 1948-49? Phew! The years 1945 to, say, 1990 were horrible on other accounts. China's Mao Tse-tung's ghastly Great Leap Forward led to as many as 30 million deaths, the greatest loss of life since the Black Death. The Soviet Union was incarcerating tens of thousands of its citizens in the gulags, as were most of the other members of the Warsaw Pact. The Indo-Pakistan wars, and the repeated conflicts between Israel and its neighbors, produced enormous casualties, but nothing like the numbers that were being slaughtered in Angola, Nigeria, the Congo, Vietnam and Cambodia. Most of the nations of the world were "un-free."

It is hard to explain to a younger generation that such delightful countries as Greece, Spain, Portugal, Chile, Brazil, South Africa, Poland and Czechoslovakia (to name only a few) were run in those days by fascist generals, avowed racists or one-party totalitarian regimes. I am ancient enough to remember the long list of countries I would not visit for summer holidays; old enough to recall how creepy it was to enter Walter Ulbricht's East German prison house of a state via Checkpoint Charlie in the late 1960s. Ugh.

Let us not, then, wax too nostalgic about the good old days of the Cold War. Today's global challenges, from Iraq to Darfur to climate change, are indeed grave and cry out for solutions.

But humankind as a whole is a lot more prosperous, a great deal more free and democratic and a considerable way further from nuclear obliteration than we were in Dwight Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy's time. We should drink to that.

Protesters Oppose Plan To Expand American Base In Northern Italy (NYT)

By Peter Kiefer

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

VICENZA, Italy, Feb. 17 — Tens of thousands of people converged Saturday on this small city in the Veneto region of northern Italy for a peaceful protest against the planned expansion of an American military base here.

The expansion would essentially double the base's size so it could house the full 173rd Airborne Brigade. The number of military personnel here would grow to about 4,500 from 2,750.

Residents of the area, saying they are concerned over the possibility of terrorist attacks, military traffic congestion and environmental damage, have staged a series of protests, and the widely publicized demonstration on Saturday was billed as a chance for Italians to express their anger over American foreign policy. Fears grew of a repeat of the violence that overtook antiglobalization protests in Genoa in 2001.

Italian authorities and law enforcement officials were on high alert, and the United States Embassy warned Americans to steer clear of Vicenza.

On Saturday, the airspace over Vicenza was temporarily closed, and most stores in its historic center were closed all day, some even boarded up. Several helicopters circled overhead, and 1,300 local and military police patrolled the streets, but the marchers, of all ages, made their way through the city peacefully.

Some marchers were at least as angry at their own government for failing to stop the expansion as they were at the United States.

"I don't like that they are building a military base here and that it is not even my country that is building it," said Andre Torlai, 21, a journalism student who arrived earlier in the day from Parma, his hometown. "There people here that don't like America for a lot of reasons, but I am here more to protest against my own government."

Last week, Prime Minister Romano Prodi infuriated members within his ruling coalition, especially Communists and radical leftists, when he decided not to reverse the plan set in motion by his predecessor, Silvio Berlusconi, to allow the expansion of the base. The center-right opposition seized on the dissent as a sign of its weakness.

"Today, Prodi has been given a vote of no confidence by his own majority," Isabella Bertolini of the center-right opposition Forza Italia party told [a news organization]. "He should step down."

Fueling the tensions in advance of the march, an Italian judge indicted 26 Americans on Friday, most of them C.I.A. officers, in connection with the 2003 kidnapping in Milan of a radical Egyptian cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar.

This month, an Italian court ordered an American soldier to stand trial in the death of Nicola Calipari, an Italian secret service agent killed by American soldiers in Iraq in 2005 while driving a kidnapped Italian journalist he had helped free to the airport.

Italians Protest U.S. Base Expansion (AP)

By Colleen Barry, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 18, 2007

Tens of thousands of people marched through the northeastern Italian city of Vicenza under heavy police guard on Saturday to protest a planned U.S. military base expansion.

Despite fears that violent demonstrators would be drawn to the protest, the march took place without incident, finishing outside the main train station where it started, as hundred of police officers stood guard and helicopters hovered overhead. The route did not pass the airfield where the expanded base is to be built, where critics keep a permanent picket.

"The government majority — whether they agree with the protest or, like me, do not — welcomes that the demonstration in Vicenza finished in an orderly fashion," said Premier Romano Prodi, who had urged protesters to be peaceful. "This must be stressed."

Police estimated the crowd at 50,000 to 80,000, while organizers put the numbers at 120,000.

"To build a military base is not the gesture of a peaceful government," said 24-year-old city resident Simone Pasin, draped in a rainbow peace flag. "I think it's time to dismantle military bases and put up structures of peace."

Trains and buses brought in leftist activists and anti-globalization protesters from across Italy to support residents concerned that the expansion would increase traffic and noise and air pollution, deplete local resources and raise the risk of terrorist attacks.

Prodi's government has approved the project, angering his far-left allies. The Communist and Green parties, members of the governing coalition, have backed the protest, though no one from the government showed up after Prodi banned ministers from attending.

Prodi has said his government had no reason to halt the expansion, which also has been approved by local authorities.

The Ederle base has about 2,900 active duty military personnel. The expansion at the Dal Molin airport, on the other side of town, would allow the U.S. military to move four battalions now based in Germany, raising the number to 5,000.

The move is part of the U.S. Army's overall transformation into a lighter, more mobile force — reducing its numbers in Europe from a Cold War high of 480,000 to 88,000 by 2012. Under the plans, elements of the U.S. 173rd Airborne Brigade, a rapid reaction unit now spread between Italy and Germany, would be united.

"I think it is a done deal. I don't think there is any turning back. This is what Prodi has said and what the local authorities have said," said David Bustamente, a spokesman at the U.S. Consulate in Milan. "This demonstration is about process."

Construction is scheduled to begin later this year and to be completed by 2011 at a total cost of $576 million. Before construction begins, a task force run by Italians has been set up to hear community concerns and make adjustments to the plans where possible.

"We're trying to show sensitivity, because we know people are concerned," Bustamente said.

The 173d Airborne Brigade, Europe's quick response force, is scheduled to redeploy soon for Afghanistan.

Some in Italy's ruling coalition feared the demonstration might suggest anti-U.S. sentiment in the country, but despite the presence of some "Yankees Out!" T-shirts, the mood was more anti-military than anti-American.

"The problems is not that Americans are in Vicenza," said Pasin. "The problem is that there is a military base."

A group of Americans ignored a warning by the U.S. Embassy to avoid Vicenza and joined the protest behind a banner reading "Not in our name," cheered by passing Italians who shook their hands and snapped their photos.

"The U.S. should not build military bases, the U.S. should think of its domestic problems," said John Gilbert, an American living in Italy for the past 25 years who was in a group of about 20 Americans who had traveled from Rome and Florence.

Spain's Peace Process In Tatters After Basque Separatist Bombing (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

SAN SEBASTIAN, Spain -- Call it prophetic or defeatist or just plain cynical. But when the Basque separatist group known as ETA shattered its so-called "permanent cease-fire" in December with a massive bombing at Madrid's airport that killed two people, former ETA leader and convicted killer Eduardo Uriarte was not surprised.

What had stunned him, he said, was that nine months earlier, Socialist Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero had bothered to reach out to ETA, which seemed close to final defeat after a nearly 40-year campaign of terror and assassinations that has left more than 800 people dead.

"ETA had almost disappeared, and the decision to have a dialogue with them brought ETA back to life," said Uriarte, 61, who spent eight years in prison for his part in the first ETA killing, in 1968. He was released in a general amnesty in 1977 and is now a peace activist.

"A government cannot give a terrorist group credibility and dignity like the Spanish government did," Uriarte said. "ETA is not looking for negotiation. They're looking for victory."

The Dec. 30 bombing at Madrid's Barajas airport, which leveled a five-story parking lot and killed two Ecuadoran immigrants, may not have surprised Uriarte, but it shocked Zapatero's government and many Spaniards who had dared to hope that peace talks with ETA, formally known as Basque Homeland and Liberty, would finally settle one of Europe's last and longest violent campaigns for independence.

Now, the peace process is in tatters, with no clear way forward. The bombing destroyed ETA's credibility, eroded confidence in Zapatero's government and emboldened the opposition Popular Party, which has adopted an increasingly strident tone against any compromise with Zapatero on his drive to resolve the issue.

"The problem is that the president of the government said first peace, then politics, telling ETA for the first time in 40 years that there was the possibility of paying a political price for peace," said Gustavo de Aristegui, the Popular Party's chief foreign policy spokesman in parliament. "In between, the government sent clear signals of appeasement" with Zapatero's "willingness to do almost anything" to win ETA's acquiescence at the peace table, he said.

Joseba Alvarez, a spokesman for the Batasuna organization, an outlawed political group that is considered ETA's political wing, said ETA had offered the March 2006 cease-fire to facilitate talks, but the government never followed through on compromises. Those included moving some of the 700 Basque prisoners scattered in prisons across Spain closer to their homes in the north, releasing sick prisoners and starting the process of legalizing Batasuna, he said.

Although Batasuna issued a statement expressing "profound sorrow" for the two deaths, the group did not condemn the bombing. "We will never condemn or criticize violence while there is no path to a political resolution" for an independent Basque state, Alvarez said.

"The bomb attack in December could have been averted if the Spanish government had done what it agreed to," Alvarez said. "On Aug. 18, ETA publicly said the path [to peace] was being blocked, and if there was no new movement, something could happen."

Many Spaniards say ETA's warnings smacked of extortion and indicated that ETA never intended to compromise on its drive for full independence from Spain. Polls show that a majority of the Basque country's 2.1 million residents are satisfied with the wide-ranging autonomy they already enjoy, but Batasuna has about 120,000 supporters, based on election support for its sympathizers -- a small but significant core that fuels ETA's violence, analysts said.

Mikel Buesa, head of Foro de Ermua, a group that opposes Basque nationalism, said that between the March cease-fire announcement and the December bombing, ETA continued to steal weapons and explosives and wage a concerted campaign of street violence. ETA will never lay down arms in favor of political dialogue, he said.

"ETA's capacity to negotiate depends on its capacity to commit violent acts," said Buesa, whose brother Fernando was killed in an ETA car bombing in February 2000 after the group had declared, then abandoned an earlier cease-fire agreement.

For his part, Zapatero acknowledged in a speech before Congress that his optimism about the peace process was a "clear mistake."

A former high-ranking official in the Interior Ministry, who would discuss domestic terrorism only on condition of anonymity, said that many top Interior officials opposed Zapatero's peace dialogue with ETA because the group was on the verge of being eradicated. A fundamental flaw in the process, he said, was that ETA never renounced violence, nor did it discontinue it, even after announcing the cease-fire.

"None of our reports provided support for the what the president wanted to do," he said. "We found leading counterterrorism offices around Spain saying ETA would be dead by spring, the group was so weak, and Batasuna was not able to mobilize anything" in the way of public support.

But even as reports of robberies, trafficking in explosives and experimental bombings poured in, Zapatero "was empowering the group and creating expectations" for compromise that he could not fulfill because of Popular Party opposition, which "proved to be a fatal article of the process."

Diego Lopez Garrido, a Socialist party spokesman in Congress, said the government had every reason to believe it was following a legitimate and promising peace negotiation that had deep public backing.

"It was logical to think that ETA was prepared to abandon weapons and violence," he said, noting that in addition to ETA's cease-fire declaration, the group had not killed anyone since May 2003. But after the December bombing, "We had a new fact. After that, the government said that's the end of dialogue and the peace process."

The bombing "not only destroyed the peace process, it destroyed any credibility ETA had," said Miren Azkarate, spokeswoman for the Basque regional government, which had led a broad political dialogue with Basque groups including Batasuna, in parallel with the federal government's talks.

"Now we all agree that the only way for ETA to recover this credibility is not by declaring another permanent cease-fire, but going for decommission of its arms, usually the last step taken by a terrorist organization, or otherwise there can be no trust and no possibility to sit with ETA again," she said.

Alvarez, the Batasuna spokesman, said without ETA there would be no peace process and any decommission of arms would come "when the process reaches the end."

In a Jan. 9 statement asserting responsibility for the blast, ETA said it considered the March 2006 cease-fire still active, although it reserved the right to "respond" again if the government continued attacks against the group.

While President Bush and others "try to make-believe that all violence is terrorism and there's only one kind of terror, here everyone understand that's not so," Alvarez said. "In Basque society, the majority were never in favor of an armed struggle, but they obviously distinguish between al-Qaeda and ETA attacks. What fuels ETA is society itself."

Expanding Power Puts Family Of Venezuelan President Under Increasing Scrutiny (NYT)

By Simon Romero

SABANETA, Venezuela, Feb. 13 — At the entrance to this dusty town where Hugo Chávez was born in 1954, a billboard welcomes visitors with a gleaming image of Mr. Chávez, the president, and the words, "Cradle of the Revolution."

Other billboards and posters throughout Sabaneta show Mr. Chávez embracing his younger brother Aníbal, Sabaneta's mayor, and his father, Hugo de los Reyes Chávez, the governor of Barinas, the surrounding state. Such reminders of the power amassed by Mr. Chávez's family have been ubiquitous here since he ascended to the presidency eight years ago.

From a humble start in a dirt-floored adobe home that was bulldozed to make way for a hamburger stand, the family's widening political clout has been increasingly scrutinized as critics call attention to abuses of power and corruption charges throughout the institutions now controlled by Mr. Chávez, including the National Assembly, the Supreme Court and the federal bureaucracy. Revelations of corruption under his family's watch in Barinas and accusations of nepotism have dogged Mr. Chávez even as he makes combating such irregularities one of the priorities of his government.

"We call them the royal family of Barinas," said Antonio Bastidas, 46, an opposition politician in Barinas who grew up playing baseball and catching catfish with Mr. Chávez and his brothers. "They started out with nothing and now call themselves revolutionaries, though they are revolutionaries with all the best trappings of power."

Mr. Bastidas and others in the political opposition in Barinas have filed numerous complaints of corruption and mismanagement against the administration of Mr. Chávez's father, a retired primary-school teacher universally known in Barinas as "maestro," or professor. Many of the accusations have languished in Venezuela's byzantine bureaucracy, while Mr. Chávez's family and its supporters in Barinas have repeatedly won strong victories in elections.

"I'm here because the people put me here," Mayor Aníbal Chávez, 50, said in an interview at his office, seated under portraits of the president, the Caracas-born liberation hero Simón Bolívar and Jesus. "We are recuperating our love of the fatherland, contrary to the policy of the empire, which is to enslave us," he said, referring to the United States.

"Sabaneta is booming," he said, listing state-financed projects here like asphalt and tomato-processing plants and a huge sugarcane-growing venture carried out with the assistance of dozens of advisers flown in from Cuba. "I'm a dreamer, but I believe we are transforming this municipality into something greater."

One effort intended to lift Sabaneta from obscurity, the Venezuelan-Cuban sugarcane project, has been particularly embarrassing for President Chávez. He became enraged last year after investigators uncovered a $1.5 million embezzlement scheme at the sugar-processing complex, which is named in honor of Ezequiel Zamora, a general who fought in one of Venezuela's bloody 19th-century internal wars.

Investigators have not implicated any of Mr. Chávez's five brothers or his father in the scandal, though it unfolded shortly after Aníbal was elected mayor and seven years into the administration of his father, who has fended off corruption accusations almost since his first election victory in 1998.

"May God forgive me for what I'm about to say, but in cases like this, I swear to you, if I could order someone to be executed, I would order him executed," President Chávez said last year when the scandal surfaced.

Mr. Chávez, who is twice divorced, vigilantly guards the privacy of his children and former wives. A court fined an opposition newspaper, Tal Cual, and an editorial writer this week for publishing an editorial imagining a dialogue about political subjects between Mr. Chávez and his youngest daughter, Rosinés. But his father and siblings, all public figures in Barinas, have been open to scrutiny.

The family boasts not only a mayor and a governor, but also the secretary of state for Barinas, a post created for the president's brother Argenis, who carries out many day-to-day functions at the governor's palace. Another brother, Adelis, is a senior banker at Banco Sofitasa, which does brisk business with the state government. Adelis also supervises the government's construction of a new soccer stadium in Barinas.

His brother Narciso, an English teacher who lived in Ohio for several years, was accused of influence peddling in the state government after he ran unsuccessfully for mayor of Bolívar, a municipality near Sabaneta. He was later placed in important posts at Venezuela's embassies in Canada and Cuba, where he was put in charge of overseeing the various bilateral agreements reached between Fidel Castro and Mr. Chávez.

Adán, the eldest brother of Mr. Chávez, who was the second-born son, is perhaps the most influential of the president's brothers, serving as ambassador to Cuba, private secretary to the president and, most recently, minister of education.

Adán, the president and Aníbal, the three oldest sons, are in their 50s; the younger sons are in their 40s.

Residents of Barinas, a state of cattle ranches, palm trees and pickup trucks that resembles stretches of South Texas, are treated almost monthly to tales of largess within Mr. Chávez's family, some substantiated, and some not.

They point to the frequent trips to Cuba of their governor, Hugo de los Reyes Chávez, for medical treatment, a luxury out of reach for many Venezuelans. Through a spokesman, the governor declined repeated requests for an interview.

The governor, who is in his 70s, has long been a fixture in state politics in Barinas, where for decades he was a loyal organizer for Copei, a conservative political party. From his schoolteacher origins, he rose to become director of education programs for Barinas during the early 1980s. Now he travels throughout Barinas in a caravan of sport-utility vehicles led by a police escort, a rarity in provincial Venezuela.

Opposition politicians here say that Mr. Chávez's mother, Elena, who also started as a teacher, exemplifies the family's rise to the nouveau riche class. She now appears in newspaper photographs carrying her poodle, Coqui, and dressed in designer outfits and gold jewelry. Her plastic surgeon, Bruno Pacillo, went to the National Assembly in 2004 to complain that he was barred from an elite Caracas social club, presumably because of his connection to Mr. Chávez's family.

Some claims that the family lives large off the state seem surreal. For instance, the newspaper La Razón published a column last month saying that Argenis, the secretary of state, had come into possession of a gray bulletproof Hummer, one of several such vehicles that can be seen roaming the streets of Sabaneta, the state capital, these days.

The column said that the president, during a visit over the Christmas holiday to the family's ranch in Barinas, tried teaching Argenis a lesson in revolutionary values by ramming the vehicle with a tractor. An official in the Barinas state government who was with the Chávez family over the holidays said the entire story was "a lie."

The family ranch near Sabaneta, called La Chavera, has been a frequent source of scrutiny for the political opposition, which contends that the family's landholdings there and elsewhere in Barinas have grown from a small area to more than 7,000 acres in the past eight years, according to "Hugo Chávez Without His Uniform," a biography of the president by Cristina Marcano and Alberto Barrera Tyszka.

The governor, who has a salary of about $2,000 a month, has emphatically denied any misappropriation of funds during his administration. Investigations of corruption allegations in the state Legislature were suspended after the president's supporters won all of the seats in the most recent election. The governor appears to be tiring of the persistent criticism of his administration in the local news media.

"Prepare yourselves," the governor warned his critics in the media and the political opposition in December after his son won a re-election bid for president by a wide margin, "for what is coming is going to be ugly."

While a vocal opposition to the president and his family persists, it is clear that many people in his hometown still adore him.

"Hugo was always a serious type of guy, but I never imagined he'd go so far," said Miguel Torres González, 55, a rancher and board member of the state sugar complex in Sabaneta who grew up with Mr. Chávez and his brothers.

"He always expressed his political philosophy as if he were writing poetry," said Mr. Torres, pointing to an flowery inscription in a book given to him by Mr. Chávez in 1986 about Maisanta, a rebel in Venezuela's backlands whom the president says was his great-grandfather. "We are extremely proud of him."

Similarly, Pilar Becerra, 50, the owner of a store selling sewing supplies near the spot where Mr. Chávez was born, rejected claims that his family had grown too powerful, pointing to the example set by the president of donating part of his salary to a scholarship fund for poor students.

His supporters here, along with Aníbal, questioned Mr. Chávez's refusal to allow a museum to be built in his honor on the trash-strewn lot where the family's adobe house once stood.

"The love of the people for my brother is so strong," Aníbal said over cups of the sweet coffee that is a staple of almost any visit here. "We'd like to honor him with this project, but he still doesn't want it."

Argentina's First Lady May Have Eye On Husband's Job (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133384

BUENOS AIRES — She is a senator and the chief advisor to her husband, who is no less than the president of Argentina. Some call her the real power in the presidential palace.

She is certainly more stylish than he is, sporting a Jackie Kennedy-like designer collection and a shoe closet rivaling that of Imelda Marcos.

And the heated rumor mill here suggests she wants his job.

"This is the century of the woman," Sen. Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, Argentina's first lady, commented in a much-celebrated encounter in Paris this month with Segolene Royal, the French Socialist vying to become France's first female president.

The first lady's French soiree has ignited a sizzling new round of speculation about Fernandez's long-presumed presidential aspirations.

The "new Evita" label appears destined to stick, even if comparisons seem to be a stretch in the case of this lawyer from a middle-class background and the up-from-the-streets Eva Peron, who died seven months before Fernandez was born. Both are first ladies and both nominally "Peronists," though what Argentina's dominant political movement even means today is a matter of debate.

Her husband, President Nestor Kirchner, has not officially decided whether to seek reelection this fall. He has played it coy, saying his party's candidate would be a male or female pinguino — a reference to the chilly Patagonian expanses, and penguin habitat, where the couple launched their political careers.

"This isn't the time to talk about the candidacy," Kirchner said recently, even though the election is less than nine months away and at least three opposition candidates, including Kirchner's former economy minister, Roberto Lavagna, have declared their intentions.

Kirchner, known for his left-wing, tough-guy talk, has been variously reported to be ailing or tiring of the nation's top job, and perhaps eager to yield to his strong-willed wife and avoid the pitfalls of a second term.

He would step down in good standing — Kirchner is widely credited with guiding Argentina's steady recovery from the economic collapse of 2001-02 — and perhaps even be in a position to run again in 2011. Some foresee a scenario in which he and his wife, who turns 54 on Monday, could alternate in power for the next 12 years, or at least try to.

"He would be the first president to leave office with a positive image since the return of democracy" in 1983, noted Carlos Fara, a political analyst here. "If the electoral calculus doesn't change drastically, there is a great probability that Cristina will be the candidate."

Comparisons have arisen to another power couple who met in law school and burst from the boondocks to national prominence: Bill and Hillary Clinton.

Fernandez, dubbed Reina (Queen) Cristina in a recent, fawning biography, is known to admire Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. But the parallel may be unfair to Fernandez, who enjoyed a reputation as an outspoken lawmaker in the capital for years while her husband, the former governor of southern Santa Cruz province, was a virtual unknown here.

'Awful candidate'

In Congress, Fernandez's televised lectures against corruption and other perceived shortcomings earned her a mixed reputation: maverick lawmaker to her supporters, publicity-grabbing harridan to her detractors.

"She comes off as very strident and bossy," said James Neilson, columnist for the Noticias newsweekly, citing traits often attributed to her husband as well. "She'd be an awful candidate."

Early polling indicates she would garner 10 fewer percentage points in a general presidential election than her husband, probably ensuring a runoff against an opposition contender — a dicey proposition.

Others dispute Fernandez's supposed electoral vulnerability, noting her sweeping defeat of a rival Peronist to win a Senate seat from Buenos Aires province in 2005.

Her admirers portray Fernandez — with her flowing hair, infectious smile and rousing speaking style, complete with Evita cadences — as something special: a magnetic force ready to scale the final ramparts of macho governance here.

Fernandez would bring style to the job, her advocates say. "Cristina will win by 30 points," Kirchner's interior minister, Anibal Fernandez, gushed to the daily Clarin newspaper.

She will decide

Well, will she or won't she? She's not saying, but she is making one thing clear: She will make the call, not her husband. (Though no one really believes this.) "I decide about myself," she told reporters in Paris.

Fernandez was ostensibly in the City of Light to represent Argentina at the signing of a new international treaty banning the sinister "disappearances" that plagued her homeland under the 1976-83 military dictatorship. Critics assailed the Paris trip as a campaign junket and a cynical device to burnish Fernandez's thin international credentials at the taxpayers' expense.

But the first lady, who, like her husband, has a prickly relationship with the media, didn't take kindly to suggestions that her Parisian sojourn was a campaign jaunt. She compared her presence to Eleanor Roosevelt's trip to Paris in 1948 to push for U.N. passage of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, an initiative regarded as a landmark document.

"That I am here is important to Argentina because I take the opportunity to speak with people of the first level and explain to them what is happening in Argentina," she told Argentine reporters at her Paris hotel.

"There is something narcissistic in looking oneself in the mirror and saying: 'I want to be president,' " Fernandez said in a 2005 interview with the Spanish daily El Pais. "I would prefer to look at myself in the mirror and say … 'I am part of a project that once wanted to change the world and now has more humble aims — to take part in the change in my country.' "

Political handicappers here are waging that humility will take a back seat and Argentina's first lady will soon go for the big prize.

Ground Shifting Under U.S. Isolation Of Cuba (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

MIAMI — Opposition to restrictive U.S. policies on Cuba has been mounting for more than a decade, but it may have reached critical mass with recent power shifts in Havana and Washington.

With Democrats in control of Congress and 80-year-old Fidel Castro having transferred power to his brother Raul while he recovers from a grave illness, a course change may be ahead.

Polls suggest most Americans want better relations with the island. Farm and energy interests would like to trade and invest in Cuba. A raft of legislation to change trade and travel restrictions has been introduced in Congress this session. Even many who have fled Cuba say it's time to end the standoff.

"The majority of the Cuban community in Miami supports the betterment of relations with Cuba, especially with regard to ending travel restrictions," said Andres Gomez, a Miami free-speech activist. "There is a will to be able to help relatives, even if we oppose certain aspects of life on the island."

The committee aims to mobilize the hundreds of thousands of Cubans who have arrived since 1980 and who reject the isolation strategy adopted by exiles who fled after the 1959 revolution that brought Fidel Castro to power.

Antonio Zamora, a Bay of Pigs veteran who has parted ways with anti-Castro militants, has formed a group that is pursuing normalized relations. "That we are not engaging with Cuba is very damaging to our future and to the possible influence we can have in Cuba," Zamora said.

Raul Castro has said Cuba would be open to talks on improving relations, but the White House has spurned the offers.

"It's an ongoing missed opportunity," says Glenn Baker, Cuba policy director at the World Security Institute think tank in Washington. "If they're available for dialogue, getting together and talking, even if they talk past each other for some of that time, I still think it's a useful exercise."

President Bush would probably veto any measure to engage with Cuba, but lawmakers and lobbyists believe there is sufficient support to override a veto or attach policy changes to legislation Bush must sign.

"Congress is energized. I think the various constituent groups are energized," said Kirby Jones, a consultant on trade and business with Cuba. Farmers want to sell more produce, oil companies want to explore Cuba's gulf deposits, and the travel industry anticipates a million U.S. visitors to Cuba the first year it is legal.

"What has changed is that we are in the majority — and by 'we,' it's important to underscore that it's not Democrats or Republicans or liberals or conservatives, but 'we' meaning those who would like to see a change in policy," Jones said, noting that much of the legislation proposed since Congress convened last month enjoyed bipartisan support and could sidestep a veto.

The Cuba Reconciliation Act sponsored by Rep. Jose E. Serrano (D-N.Y.) proposes to lift the 45-year-old trade embargo. Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) has submitted a bill to rescind restrictions on Cuban Americans' visits to family on the island, now limited to once every three years.

Also on the table are moves to allow any U.S. citizen to travel to Cuba, to remove tight limits on money and goods Cuban Americans can send to their families, and to ease the payment process for agricultural sales to Cuba.

The barrier most likely to fall first, say Cuba-watchers, is the limit on visits to parents, siblings and children. "It's a policy that's reduced American influence on the island to almost nothing as dramatic changes are occurring," Delahunt said.

"The crazies in Miami overplayed their hand when they put in that once-every-three-years restriction. Nobody supports that," said Albert Fox, a Tampa businessman who heads the Alliance for Responsible Cuba Policy.

Though few see even the slightest flinch in the administration's posture, Fox says Cuba policy has "dropped down a few notches" in importance to a White House beset with bigger foreign policy headaches. He predicts the U.S. Treasury Department, which licenses travel to Cuba, will begin approving more applications.

Recent actions, though, confirm a status quo. The Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control denied permission for a U.S. cycling team to compete in Cuba this month. It refused to license a humanitarian and educational mission planned for June. The State Department recently nixed visas for Cuban academics to take part in a University of Connecticut symposium on the post-Soviet era.

The Miami Herald editorial page, long a voice for militant anti-Castro exiles, published an editorial that stated: "The U.S. government is blowing its best chance to encourage a peaceful transition in Cuba by holding fast to counterproductive restrictions on travel to the island."

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is working to get the travel ban lifted. He says that more contact between Cubans and Americans will erode misconceptions about U.S. life that the communist regime has fostered.

U.S. citizens apparently want change too. In a recent Associated Press-Ipsos survey, 62% wanted diplomatic relations restored with Cuba; 40% said they would like to vacation there. A December Gallup poll found similar sentiments.

Opportunities to get into Cuba's booming tourism and natural resource markets are also driving the push for change. A bill exempting U.S. oil exploration in Cuba from the embargo was submitted last year by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), and is expected to be brought before the new Congress. The measure has bipartisan support and the backing of the oil lobby.

A bill submitted by Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) aims to ease the payment regimen for agricultural sales to Cuba, which have been legal since 2000, but have been stifled by bureaucracy. USA Rice Federation spokesman David Coia says there is potential for U.S. rice producers to triple last year's $40 million in sales to Cuba if trade and travel barriers are lifted.

Daniel P. Erikson, Caribbean analyst for the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington, says the exiles and the White House are digging in because the scenario they planned for hasn't happened. "The administration has spent all its time planning for the collapse of communism. There's no Plan B," he said.

The five Cuban American members of Congress steering U.S. policy on Cuba do not see a need to shift tactics. "The Castro brothers have done nothing to merit better treatment by the generous spirit of the American people," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.).

The State Department's Cuba transition coordinator, Caleb McCarry, adds: "This is the time to maintain our policy and to continue to press for genuine changes in Cuba."

KARACHI, Pakistan, Feb. 17 — In the sixth suicide bombing in a month, a man blew himself up in a small district courtroom in the border town of Quetta on Saturday, killing 15 people, including a senior judge, and wounding 35, officials said.

No group claimed responsibility, but the chief elected official of the province connected it to the string of suicide attacks that have now killed some 40 people and put security forces on alert across the country.

The Quetta blast could be linked to earlier suicide attacks in Islamabad and Peshawar, said Jam Mohammad Yousaf, the chief minister of Baluchistan Province.

Baluchistan has often been the scene of bombings, linked to Sunni and Shiite sectarian groups and, to a lesser extent, Baluch nationalists who are fighting an insurgency against the government. But Mr. Yousaf said local groups lacked the expertise for suicide bombing.

The recent string of bombings began after the military carried out an airstrike against suspected militants in the tribal area of South Waziristan on Jan. 16.

A militant leader, Baitullah Mehsud, vowed to use suicide bombers to take revenge. Pakistani officials have not directly implicated Mr. Mehsud in the bombings while the investigations are under way, and he has denied any involvement, saying that his threat was an emotional outburst.

Mr. Mehsud is believed to have trained suicide bombers and sent them into Afghanistan, where there were 127 suicide attacks last year.

Militants based in the tribal areas, who are sympathetic to the Afghan Taliban and Al Qaeda, are widely believed to be behind suicide bombings in Afghanistan, and have in the past been implicated in the more rare attacks in Pakistan.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and an Army Corps commander have all come under attack in the last few years, as have foreign targets like the United States Consulate in Karachi and a busload of French engineers.

Officials say the attacks are prompted by Pakistan's pro-American policy since Sept. 11, 2001. Recent attacks have focused on softer targets, with bombers often on foot and often killing civilians.

The trend is a shock for Pakistan and a stark warning for the government, which has largely ignored Afghan pleas to go after militants in the tribal areas.

The target the bomber chose in Quetta was a small district court in the center of the city, where there was little security. The bomber pushed his way in at the court's busiest time, about 11 a.m., saying that he was due at a hearing. He blew himself up at the door of the first room he came to.

Judge Abdul Waheed Durrani, who was hearing a case involving a property dispute, was killed, along with six lawyers and relatives of the defendants. Bodies and debris littered the room afterward, and shrapnel scarred the walls.

Prime Minister Aziz condemned the attack. "That is why we are against terrorism, because it kills innocent lives," he told journalists during a visit to Peshawar. "It is against our religion and against humanity."

A suicide attack in Peshawar, the capital of the North-West Frontier Province, which also shares a border with Afghanistan, killed 15 people on Jan. 27. A day earlier, a bomber at a hotel in Islamabad killed a guard.

Another bomber killed a policeman in the town of Dera Ismail Khan on Jan. 29. And a car bomber killed two soldiers in the town of Tank, near the tribal areas this month.

Blast In Courtroom Kills 15 In Pakistan (WP/AP)

QUETTA, Pakistan, Feb. 17 -- A suicide bomber attacked a courthouse in western Pakistan on Saturday, killing 15 people in the deadliest in a series of attacks that have struck the country in recent weeks.

Many Pakistanis suspect that pro-Taliban fighters are targeting sensitive sites to undermine the country's support of the United States, and an official in the region where Saturday's attack took place hinted at Afghan involvement.

The explosion wounded 24 people and left bloodied clothes and body parts scattered next to wrecked furniture and shattered glass in Quetta District Court. Police tightened security nationwide.

"Afghans have been involved in previous such attacks here. I cannot rule out their involvement in today's attack, but we don't have any evidence to prove it," Jam Mohammed Yousaf, the top elected official in Baluchistan province, told reporters in Quetta.

Relations between the neighboring countries have soured over Afghan allegations that Pakistan is supporting the Taliban, which has escalated its insurgency in Afghanistan over the past year. Pakistan denies aiding the insurgency but acknowledges that some members of the Taliban may operate from its soil.

Increasingly, Pakistan has also become a battleground. About 10 bombings have been reported in the past month, most of them in the tribal northwest. The capital, Islamabad, has been targeted in suicide attacks at its international airport and the Marriott Hotel.

Saturday's blast in Quetta was by far the deadliest.

The suicide bomber "entered the courtroom on foot, and he immediately exploded himself," Yousaf said.

The blast killed Judge Abdul Wahid, five lawyers and some relatives of prisoners who were on trial, Yousaf said. He was unable to give details about the prisoners' identities or the cases being heard.

Shortly after the attack, a crowd angered by the lapse in security gathered outside the court complex and chanted anti-government slogans. Hundreds of people later crowded a government hospital where the dead and wounded were taken to find out the fate of relatives.

The Quetta attack came a day after police near Islamabad and the southern city of Karachi said that they had arrested five people who were allegedly planning suicide attacks on foreigners and minority Shiite Muslims. Also, police in the southern city of Sukkur said Saturday that they had arrested three people who were planning suicide attacks at upcoming Shiite gatherings.

In the land of Mao, getting rich is finally glorious. It's also complicated.

A COUPLE OF YEARS AGO, SHI XIAOYAN SOLD 17 OF HER 20 CARS. That left her with just the Porsches -- a Boxster and the 911 Turbo -- in the garage downstairs. Shi, who also goes by Celia, is the founder and chief executive of Illinois, the Beijing-based home furniture chain, and No. 21 on a list of the richest women in China, with a reported total wealth, along with her husband, Ye Mingqin, of $125 million. These days, she drives a $38,000 convertible Mini Cooper.

"I drive an economic car -- saves gas," she explains. "You know, you have to save something for your next generation; you shouldn't spend everything."

The next generation, of course, includes Shi's son Jason, 11. Three years ago, for his eighth birthday, Jason got a Subaru Impreza, which he had customized and regularly drives at his father's racetrack.

That kind of conspicuous consumption might not be quite so conspicuous in Beverly Hills or even Great Falls. But this is China, where, until fairly recently, being rich was not only rare but virtually criminal.

After the 1949 Communist revolution, private wealth became a huge social liability. Much of it was confiscated by officials or voluntarily handed over by owners who feared persecution otherwise. Villas and large homes were seized and transformed in the interests of the state: housing for municipal workers, medical schools, government offices and the like.

Treasures in the form of antique paintings, calligraphy, Ming and Ching dynasty vases and jade sculptures were burned or smashed, often by their owners. With the Great Leap Forward and various other anti-capitalist campaigns in the late 1950s, Red Guards came and took whatever trappings of wealth remained.

If, at the beginning, Communist officials were close to the people -- farmers and peasants who were reacting to the corruption of the overthrown Kuomintang government -- eventually, they became enamored of and kept many of the confiscated goodies. Jiang Qing, leader Mao Zedong's wife, was notoriously extravagant -- reportedly having her swimming pool filled with mineral water, riding horses in parks closed to the public and watching foreign movies -- all while urging her countrymen to embrace poverty. After the Cultural Revolution (1966 to 1976), many people petitioned the government to get their possessions back: A few things were reportedly returned, but not many.

Well-known Communist slogans at the time included: "The poorer you are, the more glorious you get" and "To cut off the tail of capitalism." Free enterprise became so thoroughly reviled that even peasants selling fresh eggs were criticized as capitalists. During the Cultural Revolution, capitalists and rich landlords joined "rightists" and other "bad elements" as targets of persecution. People who spoke English or had Western training or education were fired, denounced or paraded through the streets.

Essentially, the rhetoric for three decades made it seem to be a crime to get rich.

China's "opening and reform" period began in 1978, thanks to Deng Xiaoping, the pragmatic son of a well-off landowner. After Mao's death in 1976, which ended the brutality and chaos of the Cultural Revolution, Deng marshaled reform-minded colleagues to restructure China's shattered economic system. Though Deng continued to elevate socialism over capitalism, he believed in market forces and pushed for stronger economic ties with the outside world. In 1979, he allowed parts of the southern province of Guangzhou to become a special economic zone -- Western-style management of business was permitted, and foreigners were encouraged to invest in and run factories there. He also visited the United States that year, which bolstered his desire to modernize China by turning from heavy to light industry and acquiring more technology.

The earliest Communist-era entrepreneurs, from about 1978 to the mid-1980s, were mostly people on the margins of society, members of the lower classes and sometimes criminals, people who knew little about the market but had nothing to lose by risking denunciation or the scorn of their neighbors, not to mention what little money they had. They often had to smuggle everything in -- from clothing to radios to watches -- just to build an inventory. But after making money was sanctioned by the government, many of the people who decided to xia hai, or jump into the commercial sea, and start their own businesses were either government officials or people with close connections to officials.

Any early belief that increasingly free enterprise would lead to political liberalization was crushed in the 1989 massacre of pro-democracy demonstrators by government troops in Tiananmen Square. Many entrepreneurs joined the students, calling not just for democracy but also for an end to government corruption. Much, but not all, business came to a standstill, until 1992 when Deng took a now-famous tour of the south, a trip that generated hundreds of newspaper articles and at least 20 books. Though 88 and already ailing, and with many of his pronouncements issued by a daughter, Deng promoted a package of economic reforms. He thought fair competition would stimulate business and allow some people to get rich, which would slowly spur others to follow suit. On his southern tour, he repeated a phrase he first used in October 1985 when meeting with a U.S. business group in Beijing: "Rang Yi Bu Fen Ren Xian Fu Qi Lai" (Let Some People Get Rich First). This call for economic exemplars was erroneously translated by Western media into the much more black-and-white "To Get Rich is Glorious," which became a catchphrase in the West for another burst of entrepreneurial activity in China. Though Deng continued to praise socialism, his push for economic reform became enshrined in the constitution and in Communist Party literature.

Since then, the booming Chinese economy has been one of the biggest stories in the world. Wealth and conspicuous consumption are climbing in a country where the average per-capita income has only just jumped to $145 a month (in Beijing, it's $209 a month). On the mainland, about 175 million, or 13.5 percent, of consumers have become what many Chinese scholars consider to be middle class, earning as much as $30,000 a year, the China Association of Branding Strategy reported recently. These consumers have managed to accumulate significant savings, yet often spend an entire month's salary on a single luxury item: a wallet, a watch or jewelry.

That group is expected to grow within 10 years to nearly 260 million, or 20 percent of the population, said Lu Xueyi, a Chinese Academy of Social Sciences professor. By then, China could be the world's biggest luxury market, analysts predict.

Another 320,000 to 500,000 people report enough income -- about $60,000 a year -- to put them into an upper-middle class. And because most Chinese do not disclose their exact wealth, experts say there are likely to be many more. Many of these Chinese live in gated communities. They pay $385 covers to entertain clients at karaoke clubs such as Shanghai's L.A. Disco. They spend $3,650 to mingle on a yacht at a "diamond bachelor" matchmaking party.

A far smaller, but more visible, group are the super rich. No. 1 on the 2006 Forbes China Rich List is 37-year-old Huang Guangyu, worth $2.3 billion and the owner of a chain of discount electronics stores. Of the top 40 on the list, more than a quarter are younger than 40. Their combined net worth was $38 billion, up 46 percent from $26 billion in 2005. There seems to be no real cutoff, but the minimum asset levels used by a rival rich list, Rupert Hoogewerf's Hurun Report, are telling. In 1999, people on his list had at least 50 million RMB (about $6.4 million) but this year, the lower cutoff had soared 1,600 percent, to 800 million RMB (about $100 million).

Recently, President Hu Jintao has responded to the growing gap between rich and poor by demanding that more attention be paid to a "harmonious society." Authorities have imposed luxury taxes on boats, golf clubs and diamond watches. But this has only encouraged the wealthy to fly to Hong Kong and buy such items there, where the luxury tax is lower. When not shopping, many mainlanders visit a famous 24-karat gold toilet and $3.5 million bathroom, owned by a local jeweler and displayed in a tourist exhibition hall.

The urge to flaunt economic success competes with the desire to keep a low profile. While many Chinese are flattered by the prestige of landing on various "rich lists," they also fear the publicity and the extra scrutiny from tax collectors, who seem to follow no known assessment standards.

Even so, wealth is beginning to bring other privileges. In Jiangsu province, just north of Shanghai, authorities announced last year that "large taxpayer" entrepreneurs who pay the government more than $375,000 a year get to help decide whether an official is dismissed or promoted.

Elsewhere, wealthy entrepreneurs have joined rural peasants, ethnic minorities and parents who were only children in exemption from mandatory one-child-only laws. In some cases, the children of wealthy entrepreneurs are given more points on their senior high school exams.

The rich are envied and resented -- and valued by the government. In the early days of "opening and reform," top officials had hoped that the rich would serve as a model to the poor, inspiring and encouraging them. But with high-profile corruption cases each year, leaders are increasingly worried about being caught in a scandal. They are encouraging "clean wealth" through television programs such as "Win in China," the new reality show based on "The Apprentice," even though corruption and the pursuit of money seem to be rife at every level of society.

In theory, a rising entrepreneurial class, which would mostly benefit from clean government and transparency, could act as a force for reform. But it is hard for those who have attained success to push back against official corruption, since many entrepreneurs broke the rules to get rich in the first place. It is what Chan Kin Man, a sociology professor at the Chinese University of Hong Kong who has studied the emerging upper class, calls "original sin." Some bribed bank officials to obtain loans. In other cases, their "original sin" is more serious -- a developer who plotted with officials to take the homes of poor residents, for example, or a food and grain company chief who cheats customers with poor-quality feed to get his business started.

"They feel insecure because of this original sin," Chan says. "They want to draw a line, pardon all the errors committed in the past. They understand it's too costly to ask for any political change."

It is difficult to separate wealth from power in China. A recent report in the Hong Kong-based Sing Tao Daily said research from China's State Council, the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences and the research office of the Central Party School showed that 90 percent of China's RMB billionaires (people with more than $128.2 million) are the children of senior officials. The rich get nowhere without official connections -- a commodity as valuable as capital and known as guanxi. Top officials themselves are wealthy, though some are more discreet about displaying their wealth than others. Nevertheless, their children study abroad, and they make shopping trips to Hong Kong or own expensive real estate.

The need for guanxi does not stop with the rich. The broader middle class is also dependent on its personal relationship to power. You need connections when the landlord of your luxury apartment decides to charge you extra maintenance payments, or glues your front door shut after you refuse.

Those who can afford their own planes and yachts or 20 luxury cars probably do not get their doors glued shut, or balk at fines for having too many pedigreed dogs, but Chan, the Hong Kong professor who has surveyed hundreds of entrepreneurs, said the rich told him they were exhausted from all the wining and dining of officials they had to do.

That is just the beginning of their anxiety. As these Chinese get richer, they ignore their health and struggle to cope with stress and success, according to surveys published in the state-run media. They have told pollsters of their insecurity and inability to find suitable marriage partners. Some complain of the possibility of losing their wealth overnight because of official corruption, while others said they fear criminals and jealous neighbors.

But mostly what they fear is having their new success snatched away. They are anxious about whether they have made the right connections, just in case their position of privilege turns out to be built on boggy ground.

"The only thing they think about is guanxi," Shi Xiaoyan says. "They use all their money, all their knowledge. They waste their sleeping time and their family's happy time . . . Rich people in China, they're just rich, but they know nothing."

A Clue To Washington's Cluelessness (LAT)

By Michael May

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

BOTH PROPONENTS and foes of the "surge" in Iraq made firm, confident predictions about what would certainly happen if their preferred course of action were not followed.

"If the U.S. walks away now, extremist elements will take over Iraq," said one group of government officials and pundits. "No, no — the proposed surge is too little, too late," said another. Some insisted that "the surge will only inflame anti-American sentiment."

But here's the only thing we know for sure: When the collection of politicians and pundits we call "Washington" makes predictions about countries in which the U.S. has "vital interests" (and especially about countries with which we have had bad relations), the predictions — even when they contradict one another! — are almost always wrong.

Consider the record. Washington didn't predict the fall of the shah in Iran, or the end of the Cold War, or the disintegration of the Soviet Union. Nor did our pundits (whether left, right or center) predict the war between Vietnam and China after the U.S. lost more than 50,000 service members in the region to prevent the spread of monolithic communism, or, for that matter, China's turn toward becoming a capitalistic and trading giant. There are innumerable other examples in Latin America, Africa and the Middle East.

Everything is fine as long as nothing much is happening. But when something happens, especially if it's sudden or revolutionary, we usually don't see it coming. Since World War II at least, Washington's success rate at predicting change in countries with which we have a hostile relationship is close to zero.

Why this failure when most of the events mentioned were years in the making? In part, it's that we don't look at the right things. Our intelligence apparatus is better at counting missiles than at following the intricate politics of a central committee or overhearing the street talk in Tehran — or Baghdad. But even good intelligence on those matters would have had a hard time making it into the Washington debate.

That's because Washington debates tend to be narrow; they fall within a range of acceptable conventional wisdom and close out anything that seems to go out on a limb. We wonder: Is the Soviet Union trying to build a first-strike capability or not? Is Vietnam a tool of Red Chinese expansion? Does Saddam Hussein have nukes? Intelligence is asked to cast light on just those acceptable questions. The assumptions underlying those debates are seldom challenged. They are based on politically acceptable views of the other state and, career-wise, it doesn't pay to challenge them. Indeed, movers and doers in Washington often do not even have time to challenge them. There is little or no intelligence outside the axis of debate.

As a result, any analyst who forecast that, say, the Soviet Union would for its own purposes peaceably release its European satellites, or that the heirs of Mao would turn to capitalism before his body was cold in the grave, would have been quickly marginalized.

When researchers test predictions about, for instance, investments or the effectiveness of a new drug, they begin with the assumption, for testing purposes, that the theory or the advice leads to no better result than what could be attained by chance, or that the drug is no more effective than a placebo. It's up to the data to prove that the advice or the drug is effective, not the other way around. That's called starting with the "null hypothesis."

The null hypothesis means that there is no ground to believe or disbelieve any prediction. It's a way of guarding against bias.

The record of official Washington predictions gives us no reason to depart from the null hypothesis. Whatever the prediction, we should consider it just as likely that something entirely different will happen.

If the U.S. withdraws from Iraq, for instance, the civil war could grind on for years, or, conversely, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki could bring order to Baghdad within a year, probably by ethnic cleansing. The surge could lead to more needless deaths, or Gen. David Petraeus could bring a better kind of order out of chaos, at least for a while. If President Bush attacks Iran, it could help cool the situation, or we might have to hunker down for a longer, bigger war. Or perhaps the situation may be resolved not by actions from the U.S. but by initiatives from within the area, as were the earlier Soviet and Chinese situations.

Whatever we do, the situation a few years from now is likely to be different from what's currently predicted by any party to the Washington debate.

Realizing that we are still stuck with the null hypothesis should lead to a better-focused inquiry. It's a bit late for Iraq, where we disregarded what we knew and could have learned, and where the options have tragically narrowed. With Iran, North Korea and other difficult places, we have more time and freedom of action. What sorties into these places Americans and others have made bring back a different, more complex picture than the one presented by officials and discussed in the media. But we need to know still more.

The U.S. foolishly isolates hostile countries when it should pressure them to open up to our visitors, executives, students and diplomats. Congress should pressure the administration to open embassies in Tehran, Pyongyang and Havana and staff them in part with native speakers. David Kay, the former head of the Iraq Survey Group, which searched for weapons of mass destruction in that country after the U.S. invasion, found that Iraqi officials had been lying to Hussein and had not been carrying out his decisions in many cases. Perhaps if we'd been more engaged in that country, rather than keeping our distance, we would've been able to find that out before the invasion rather than after.

To get better intelligence, however, gathering information is not enough, as Iraq has tragically shown. Someone in intelligence has to put himself in the enemy's shoes.

That requires considering "the enemy" not solely as an enemy but as an organization staffed by humans with all their attending complexities — often not a politic point of view. Someone in power has to ask the right questions — and question fundamental assumptions. To date, the record says that, at key times in our history, our government, because of the blinders it put on, has had no clue about the direction of major events in the lands of our enemies. Perhaps only a better-informed public, acting through Congress, can change that.

Torture By Worms (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

JIMMA, Ethiopia

Presidents are supposed to be strong, and on his latest visit to Africa Jimmy Carter proved himself strong enough to weep.

The first stop of Mr. Carter's four-nation African trip was Ghana, where he visited his projects to wipe out the Guinea worm, a horrendous two-foot-long parasite that lives inside the body and finally pops out, causing excruciating pain.

Mr. Carter was shaken by the victims he met, including a 57-year-old woman with a Guinea worm coming out of her nipple.

"She and her medical attendants said she had another coming out her genitals between her legs, and one each coming out of both feet," Mr. Carter added. "And so she had four Guinea worms emerging simultaneously."

"Little 3-, 4- and 5-year-old children were screaming uncontrollably with pain" because of the worms emerging from their flesh, Mr. Carter said. "I cried, along with the children."

We tend to think of human rights in terms of a right to vote, a right to free speech, a right to assembly. But a child should also have a right not to suffer agony because of a worm that is easily preventable, as well as a right not to go blind because of a lack of medication that costs a dollar or two, even a right not to die for lack of a $5 mosquito net.

As president, Mr. Carter put the issue of human rights squarely on the national agenda. Now Mr. Carter argues — and he's dead right — that we conceive of human rights too narrowly as political and civil rights, and that we also need to fight for the human right of children to live healthy lives.

He has led the way in waging that battle. Because of Mr. Carter's two-decade battle against Guinea worm disease, it is expected to be eradicated worldwide within the next five years. It will be the first ailment to be eliminated since smallpox in 1977, and it has become a race between the worm and the ex-president to see who outlasts the other.

"I'm determined to live long enough to see no cases of Guinea worm anywhere in the world," Mr. Carter said as he walked in blue jeans through a couple of villages in a remote corner of southwestern Ethiopia, the third country of his African tour.

After leaving the White House, Mr. Carter ended up "adopting" diseases like Guinea worm disease, river blindness, elephantiasis, trachoma and schistosomiasis that afflict the world's most voiceless people. These are horrific diseases that cause unimaginable suffering, yet they rarely get attention, treatment or research funding because their victims are impoverished and invisible.

When Mr. Carter met with Mohammad Zia ul-Haq, then Pakistan's president, President Zia had never heard of Guinea worm and didn't know it existed in Pakistan. Nor did his health minister. But after Mr. Carter put the issue on the agenda, Pakistan worked energetically with the Carter Center to eliminate the parasite in that country.

The villages here in Ethiopia that Mr. Carter visited cradle a fast-moving creek, making a lovely image of thatch huts and bubbling water. But the creek is home to the black flies whose bites spread the parasite that causes river blindness, leading to unbearable itching and often eventually to blindness.

"It's almost impossible to imagine the suffering of people with river blindness," Mr. Carter said as he traipsed through the village beside his wife, Rosalynn.

Already, Mr. Carter's campaign is making huge progress against the disease.

Kemeru Befita, a woman washing her clothes in the creek near Mr. Carter, told me that two of her children had caught river blindness in the last couple of months. After a visit to the witch doctor didn't help, she took them to a clinic where — thanks to Mr. Carter's program — they received medicine that killed the baby worms. They are two of the nearly 10 million people to whom the Carter Center gave medication last year alone, who won't go blind.

At the end of the day, this one-term president who left office a pariah in his own party will transform the lives of more people in more places over a longer period of time than any other recent president. And I hope that he can also transform our conception of human rights, so that we show an interest not only in the human rights of people suffering from the oppression of dictators, but also from the even more brutal tyranny of blindness, malaria and worms.

A Reality Check On Our Fears (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

NEW YORK -- Global business is burbling while global politics croaks messages of dread, frustration and hatred. It is supersized Dickens: The best of times by many economic measures is also the worst of times when we listen to the pollsters and the politicians.

Why this disjunction of spirits? Or to put it another way: Why not? Selling fear is the oldest tool of politics. Selling hope and confidence is the mother's milk of business. The more we get, the more we have to fear having it taken away by "others" as defined by race, religion, class or rivalrous sameness.

But there is a different, fragile feel to this particular "golden moment," a term George Shultz used in a recent Washington talk. As a former secretary of both Treasury and state, Shultz is credible in warning that the current public fury with leaders, liberal trade policies and the conduct of nations does not match -- and eventually can threaten -- the economic openings that bring billions of new workers into global labor markets and generate huge profits for the happy few of highest finance. Protectionism is the danger Shultz has in mind.

The jarring contrast is easy to spot. I went recently from listening in Washington to a hopeful Eric Schmidt, the chief executive of Google, describe a world of growing individual empowerment and prosperity as Chinese and Indian peasants join the Internet era to listening to politicians at the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy darkly emphasize the threats of terrorism, failed states, and, yes, American unilateralism and lawlessness.

That point was put most pungently by Russian President Vladimir Putin in a widely misunderstood presentation. Putin's speech was an intensely personal mocking of President Bush rather than a policy declaration of hostility toward the United States. Moreover, it was laboriously calculated for domestic political effect to bolster the other important Russian in Munich, Sergei Ivanov.

It was bad cop, good cop. Ivanov talked reassuringly about U.S.-Russian cooperation. Also a former KGB officer, Ivanov is moving forward now to succeed Putin. He was portrayed on Moscow television as a statesmanlike figure -- especially on one program filmed before either spoke in Munich but shown afterward, one knowledgeable Russian told me. Putin promoted Ivanov to become first deputy prime minister five days after the president's speech in Germany.

Putin's political intentions and the mood of his audience reflect how the national security imperative has displaced pocketbook issues that should dominate political discourse today. A relatively strong global growth cycle is continuing longer than experience and experts say is normal. You can argue economic policies round or flat if you pick your own numbers. In this confusion, foreign policy and national security issues become more salient and decisive in campaigns around the world.

Putin's audience included Sen. John McCain, a leading Republican presidential contender, who took the high road by characterizing Putin's jabs as "aggressive" but quickly adding that Americans still must work with Russia. But it did not include Sen. Hillary Clinton, the leading Democratic contender. Clinton decided to stay away from a meeting she dazzled two years ago. This time she did not want to be put in the position of criticizing the Bush administration or Democratic rivals on Iraq from a foreign forum.

Instead she went to New Hampshire to criticize the Bush administration on Iraq and to eclipse her Democratic rivals. Republican strategists hope she will now "chase John Edwards to the left" to counter his populist economic programs and thereby muddy her strong appeal to the electoral center on national security.

The dynamic is similar in other democracies. French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin gets little to no political credit for announcing that unemployment has declined steadily through his tattered term. Segolene Royal, the Socialist presidential candidate, has tumbled from front-runner to second place with foreign policy blunders that make her seem inexperienced and duplicitous. (The second the French may forgive, but not the first.) German Chancellor Angela Merkel presides over a stalemated coalition and a surprisingly robust economy. No need to dwell on Tony Blair's politically poisoned golden economic chalice in Britain.

Abundant financing in global markets and broad confidence in the ability of today's central banks to control inflation have created a buoyant international financial system in which risk premiums scrape historic lows. Oil price volatility creates enormous psychological strain on Western consumers -- but has not derailed growth to this point.

There is always cause for concern about markets overshooting, especially when risk premiums evaporate. But the merchants of political despair are overdoing it as they manipulate the new instruments of intrusive round-the-clock communications. Breathe deep, look around at what is really happening, and spend more time in life than online or in other forms of virtual reality.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guys In Suits: On A Mission (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 18, 2007

OK, they may look like accountants, but this team of government lawyers is a key cog in the war on terror

Just a few weeks ago, Kenneth Wainstein, the Justice Department's new national security chief, received a book in the mail, a memoir titled Secrets. Its author, Daniel Ellsberg-the former Defense Department analyst who was prosecuted for leaking the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times 36 years ago-sent the book to Wainstein after a spirited exchange with him during a recent panel discussion about prosecuting leakers. "Dear Ken," Ellsberg inscribed in the book, "I shared your revulsion against all leaks until some years ago."

Prosecuting those who leak classified information is just a small part of Wainstein's controversial portfolio. As the assistant attorney general for the National Security Division, created last summer, Wainstein has been handed most of the department's hot-potato issues and has at his disposal some of the government's most secret, powerful, and criticized investigative tools. Just recently, President Bush decided not to reauthorize the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless electronic surveillance program but to place it under a special court-the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court-that oversees government surveillance in intelligence investigations. The revamped program will now be under Wainstein's purview. Look for civil-liberties groups and the new Democratic majority in Congress to keep a close eye on his every move.

The career federal prosecutor seems unfazed by the prospect of such scrutiny. In an interview, Wainstein, 45, said that he is used to making difficult decisions based on the facts and the law. "But with national security being a hot political issue, it's natural for people to scrutinize our big prosecution decisions through the prism of politics," says Wainstein. "Because it's important that we maintain public confidence, we're careful to both make and to announce our decisions in an apolitical way."

Sounds good. But in coming months, Wainstein, a Senate-confirmed presidential appointee, will have to contend with a host of lingering perception problems. "This administration has politicized almost every part of the Justice Department," says Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies, a civil-liberties group. "We need congressional oversight to prevent this key division from being similarly politicized."

If anyone can serve as an apolitical gatekeeper for the department's professional ranks, friends and colleagues say, it's Wainstein. He was exposed to the trapdoor world of national security issues early in life, thanks to his parents, who both spent their careers in military intelligence. His dad, Leonard, worked for a nonprofit group that advised the Joint Chiefs of Staff. His mother, Eleanor, who died last December, wrote a number of prescient studies for the Rand Corp. in the 1970s on terrorism, Islamic fundamentalism, and corporate kidnappings. "There was a lot of talk about terrorism back then," says Wainstein. "It's just different predators [today]."

Gorilla. A former U.S. attorney for Washington, D.C., Wainstein spent most of his career putting drug dealers, murderers, and crooked politicians behind bars. He later picked up his national security credentials at the FBI, where he served as general counsel and chief of staff to Director Robert Mueller. "You need somebody who can balance the intelligence imperatives with the law-enforcement imperatives," says Chuck Rosenberg, a U.S. attorney in Virginia. "Sometimes they are in conflict, and you need someone to sort that out."

Pilots Traced To CIA Renditions (LAT)

By Bob Drogin And John Goetz, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

The Times identifies three fliers facing kidnapping charges in Germany related to a 2003 counter-terrorism mission.

CLAYTON, N.C. — The forecast called for heavy snow on the route home, so the three pilots who had just flown a covert CIA-sponsored "extraordinary rendition" flight were forced to stay an extra night at the Gran Melia Victoria, a luxury hotel overlooking the marina on the island of Majorca.

Up in Room 552, the pilot who called himself Capt. James Fairing picked up the phone at 2:28 in the afternoon and dialed his tree-shaded home in a subdivision carved out of pine forests here in Clayton, about 15 miles southeast of Raleigh. He also called his employer, a North Carolina-based air charter service that long has worked for the CIA.

Fairing's copilot, who registered as Eric Matthew Fain, reached for the phone in his room and called a woman back home with whom he owns a 22-foot speedboat and who also flies missions for the CIA. The third pilot from the stranded flight carried a U.S. passport issued to Kirk James Bird. The passport photo shows a balding, middle-age man with a broad smile.

The names they used were all aliases, but The Times confirmed their real identities from government databases and visited their homes this month after a German court in January ordered the arrest of the three "ghost pilots" and 10 other alleged members of the CIA's special renditions unit on charges of kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm to Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, three years ago.

Charged under aliases

None of the pilots responded to repeated requests for comment left with family members and on their home telephones. The Times is not publishing their real names because they have been charged only under their aliases.

Relying on the operatives' passport numbers, hotel records, credit card bills and aviation records, German prosecutors are seeking to properly identify the 13 Americans in a high-profile case that has upset relations between Washington and Berlin and caused a political scandal in Germany over whether government officials sanctioned the CIA operation.

Elsewhere in Europe, legal and parliamentary investigations have focused a harsh spotlight on the CIA's program to abduct suspected terrorists and ferry them to secret sites for interrogation, operations known variously as "black renditions" or "extraordinary renditions."

On Friday, an Italian judge issued arrest warrants for 26 suspected CIA operatives for allegedly abducting a radical Muslim cleric outside his mosque in Milan in February 2003 and delivering him to Egypt, where his lawyer says he was tortured. The trial is set for June 8 in Milan.

All the Americans charged, including the top two CIA officers in Italy at the time, have departed the country, but Italian law allows defendants to be tried in absentia.

None of the aliases used in Italy match those in the German case, although one of the pilots may have been involved in both incidents.

One former CIA operation officer who was involved in the Italian case at CIA headquarters, speaking on condition of anonymity because the case is classified, said he and his colleagues were increasingly nervous about traveling in Europe for fear of getting swept up in the investigations. He said he checked with a contact at the Italian intelligence service for reassurance that he would not be arrested.

Seized in error

According to Masri's account, he was detained by local authorities while crossing from Serbia into Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003. Three weeks later, seven or eight men in masks stripped him naked, put him in a diaper and jumpsuit, drugged him and then chained him, spread-eagle and blindfolded, to the floor of a Boeing 737 that flew to Afghanistan on Jan. 24, 2004. German prosecutors say the men in masks were with the CIA rendition team.

At the time, U.S. intelligence authorities believed Masri was involved with radical Islamic groups in Ulm, a city in southern Germany. Masri was released five months later after undergoing what he described as repeated beatings and other physical abuse in a now-closed CIA-run prison called the Salt Pit in Kabul, the Afghan capital. U.S. officials have told German authorities that Masri was seized and imprisoned in error because his name is similar to that of a suspected terrorist linked to Al Qaeda.

Flight records show that Aero Contractors, based in Smithfield, N.C., operated the plane that carried Masri from Macedonia to Afghanistan. The charter aircraft company has flown scores of sensitive missions for the CIA and has played a key support role in counter-terrorism operations since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to former agency officials.

The three pilots in the Masri rendition case live within a 30-minute drive of the guarded Aero hangar and offices at the rural Johnston County airport. Reached by telephone Saturday, Aero official Freddy Pearce declined to discuss any aspect of the company's business.

The chief pilot in the Masri case, who used the alias Fairing, called Pearce at his Clayton home during his layover in Spain.

In real life, the chief pilot is 52, drives a Toyota Previa minivan and keeps a collection of model trains in a glass display case near a large bubbling aquarium in his living room. Federal aviation records show he is rated to fly seven kinds of aircraft as long as he wears his glasses.

His wife, reached by phone at her office, said her husband had done no wrong. "He's just a pilot," she said.

His copilot, who used the alias Fain, is a bearded man of 35 who lives with his father and two dogs in a separate subdivision. He called home during a subsequent mission from the Royal Plaza Hotel on the Spanish resort island of Ibiza, according to records collected by Spanish investigators from the Guardia Civil.

The third pilot, who used the alias Bird, is 46, drives a Ford Explorer and has a 17-foot aluminum fishing boat. Certified as a flight instructor, he keeps plastic models of his favorite planes mounted by the fireplace in his living room in a house that backs onto a private golf course here. His wife declined to comment.

On the flight back to Washington, after the snow had cleared, the rendition team celebrated by ordering 17 shrimp cocktails and three bottles of fine Spanish wine, according to catering invoices obtained by the prosecutors.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Vote In Senate Blocked By GOP (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

7 Republicans Join Democratic Push

Senate Republicans for a second time blocked a symbolic attempt by Democrats to reject President Bush's troop increase yesterday, but GOP defections were higher than before, suggesting Republican cracks as the Iraq war dominates Congress's agenda.

With the 56 to 34 vote, Democrats fell shy of the 60 votes required to kick off debate on a nonbinding resolution passed by the House last week that expresses support for the troops but criticizes Bush's decision to expand combat ranks by more than 20,000 troops. Senate Democrats picked up five new Republican allies in their effort to advance the resolution, bringing the GOP total to seven.

But the fate of the resolution is now very much in doubt. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced after the vote that he would not bring up the resolution again. Both sides instead are girding for the next phase, a confrontation over war funding, with some Democrats determined to exercise the power of the purse to influence Iraq strategy.

As Congress struggled to find its voice in the Iraq debate, the administration intensified its own campaign to convince the American public that the conflict remains winnable. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice paid a surprise visit to Baghdad yesterday, announcing that the increase in troops was bringing "new hope and a new optimism" to the besieged city. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki assured Bush on Friday that the buildup had already achieved "fabulous success."

Those optimistic pronouncements appeared to have little impact on the Senate floor yesterday, where a rare Saturday session made for a dramatic political tableau. Presidential candidates jetted in from various primary states, having canceled visits to popular diners and town-hall meetings to cast their vote. They did not all show. One of the 10 absentees was Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a supporter of the Bush plan, who was campaigning in Iowa.

Most Democrats were already seated at their desks when the roll call began shortly before 2 p.m. The only Democrat who missed the vote was Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.), who is recovering from brain surgery. Democratic Sens. Robert P. Casey Jr. (Pa.) and Max Baucus (Mont.) canceled plans to visit Iraq this weekend and were present on the floor. Their traveling companions, GOP Sens. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) and Bob Corker (Tenn.), went ahead with the trip and missed the Senate action.

The resolution was identical to a measure that passed the House on Friday, with modest Republican support. "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq," the resolution states. And it adds, "Congress disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush announced on January 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

Reid said he would not try a third time to put the Senate on record against the troop increase. But he said the Iraq debate would continue when the Senate returns Feb. 26 from a week-long recess and turns to legislation to enact homeland security recommendations from the Sept. 11 commission.

Reid promised that both sides would be allowed to offer Iraq-related amendments to that bill. And Congress will soon debate Bush's request for $100 billion in additional funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the current fiscal year. In the House, Democrats are moving to fully fund the president's war request, under the condition that the administration follow strict standards for training and equipping troops.

During separate conversations with U.S. and Iraqi officials in Baghdad yesterday, Rice referred to the looming skirmishes in Washington over the troop buildup and funding request.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that the American people have about the prospects of success if Iraqi leadership doesn't do what it needs to do," Rice told reporters during a roundtable discussion at the house of the U.S. ambassador to Iraq yesterday afternoon.

"I think there's a new spirit here to try to do those things," she said. "The input appears to be there. The political support appears to be there."

But Democrats believe they are playing a strong hand in the Iraq debate. Polls show that most voters oppose a troop increase, and the GOP's heavy losses in the November elections were widely interpreted as a call for more aggressive vetting of Bush's Iraq strategy.

As soon as Bush announced the military buildup early last month, Democratic leaders considered ways to officially register an objection. Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) agreed to begin work on a nonbinding resolution, believing it was the easiest vote politically, including for Republicans who are disaffected by Bush's leadership on Iraq.

But in the Senate, Republicans decided to offer their own nonbinding measure, asserting that Congress would not cut off troop funding. Some Democrats opposed to the Iraq war want to target Pentagon spending as a way to force a withdrawal of troops.

Reid refused to allow a vote on the GOP measure, explaining that he wanted to keep the debate focused on the troop increase. Republicans now have twice voted this month to block a nonbinding resolution, on grounds that Reid was not playing fair. In spirited floor speeches in recent days, Democrats taunted their GOP colleagues for throwing up procedural hurdles to protect Bush from a potentially embarrassing repudiation.

"They are trying to divert attention from the issue at hand," Reid said of Republicans yesterday. "They'd like to turn the Senate into a procedural quagmire. They want to hide behind weak and misleading arguments about the Senate's rules or a senator's right to offer amendments. These arguments are diversions."

But Republicans accused Democrats of hiding behind the Senate rulebook to avoid the funding question.

"The reason we're here on a Saturday playing stupid political games while people are off in Iraq trying to win this war is because our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are afraid to take a vote on cutting off funding," blasted Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), in a speech before the vote.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said he would not relent. "I think the majority of Senate Republicans have made it clear again today, and are highly likely to do that again in the future, that when we turn to this issue, we're going to insist on voting on funding the troops," the Kentucky Republican said.

The White House issued a statement saying "this week's voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy's vigor," but it also welcomed the funding showdown.

"The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success, supporting the cause of democracy, and stopping terrorist forces in their ultimate aim of bringing their violence to our shores," the White House said.

Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats to allow the debate to proceed, including Sens. John W. Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Gordon Smith (Ore.), Norm Coleman (Minn.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Olympia J. Snowe (Maine) and Susan M. Collins (Maine). When Republicans voted to block a similar, albeit lengthier, resolution earlier this month, only Collins and Coleman broke ranks. Among these Republicans, all but Specter and Snowe are up for reelection in 2008.

The Republican senators aside from McCain, Kyl and Corker who were absent yesterday were Robert F. Bennett (Utah), Christopher S. Bond (Mo.), Thad Cochran (Miss.), John Ensign (Nev.), Orrin G. Hatch (Utah) and Lisa Murkowski (Alaska). Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) voted with Republicans.

The seven Republican defectors are all on record opposing the Bush plan. Several other GOP senators, including Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Voinovich (Ohio), have expressed concerns, but they voted with their party yesterday. Warner was the chief author of the earlier nonbinding resolution on Iraq to come before the Senate. That version was shelved last week for the simpler House text.

"I feel that the Senate, the Senate of the United States of America, an institution revered throughout the world, should have the right to go forward and debate this critical issue before America today, before the whole world," Warner said. "I think we've come to the point in time where we must move forward."

Senate Rejects Renewed Effort To Debate Iraq (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — The Senate on Saturday narrowly rejected an effort to force debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, but Republican defections emboldened Democrats to promise new attempts to influence the administration's war policy.

The 56-to-34 vote in a rare Saturday session was the second time Republicans were able to deny opponents of the troop increase a debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush, and it came just a day after the House formally opposed his plan to increase the military presence in Iraq.

But the outcome, four votes short of the 60 needed to break a procedural stalemate, suggested that Democrats were slowly drawing support from Senate Republicans for what was shaping up to be a drawn-out fight between the Democrat-controlled Congress and Mr. Bush over his execution of the war.

Seven Republicans split from their party and joined 48 Democrats and one Independent in calling for a debate — five more Republicans than during a similar showdown earlier this month. All but two of the seven face re-election next year.

The Republicans who broke ranks were Senators John W. Warner of Virginia, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine.

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the majority leader, said the result showed that Senate sentiment was running against the president.

"A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," Mr. Reid said as he withdrew the resolution. He and other party leaders said they intended to introduce quickly more substantive proposals on Iraq when the Senate returns from a weeklong break and begins considering legislation to enact recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

"We will be relentless," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the third-ranking Democrat. "There will be resolution after resolution, amendment after amendment, all forcing this body to do what it has not done in the previous three years: debate and discuss Iraq."

Democrats would not divulge the details of their next step, but one official said it would focus on the mission of American troops in Iraq and try to skirt the more politically difficult question of federal money for the military.

Republicans derided Saturday's vote as political theater and said stark divisions among Democrats on the question of military spending would complicate the party's efforts to advance legislation designed to stop the war.

"We want a debate about Iraq that includes funding for the troops," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader. "They've denounced the surge. The question is, are they going to fund the troops?"

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said on Saturday that Mr. Bush urged Congress to approve his pending request for $93 billion through Sept. 30 for military operations and played down the importance of the House and Senate votes.

"This week's voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy's vigor," Mr. Snow said in a statement. "The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success."

But Democrats said the votes in Congress — the first major clashes over the war — reflected widespread public unease with the idea of deepening involvement in Iraq.

"It may be called a surge, but I believe it is a plunge," said Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "A plunge into the sectarian cauldron, a plunge into the unknown."

Republicans continued to try to make the case that Democrats were shutting down a full-fledged Senate review of Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy by refusing the Republicans a chance to offer an alternative that would place the Senate on record against cutting off money for armed forces in the field.

"The majority cannot tell the minority what we are going to have one vote on, take it or leave it," said Senator Jim Bunning, Republican of Kentucky, defending his party's stance as senators squared off at noon. Democrats were leery of the Republican plan, written by Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, because of its potential to attract the most Senate votes and to overshadow Senate action criticizing the troop increase. Some lawmakers also believed that Congress might be asked to restrict military spending, and they did not want their hands tied by an earlier vote on a more symbolic resolution.

A vote to open debate would have allowed the Senate to begin considering the identical language that was approved on Friday by the House. The resolution states, in part, that "Congress disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush announced on Jan. 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

Without 60 votes for the procedural motion, the Senate was unable to start debate. It was an outcome that left Democrats accusing Republicans of ducking a vote directly opposing Mr. Bush's policy, even though many of the Republicans had significant reservations about the conduct of the war and concerns for the political repercussions.

"The American people can see what is happening here," said Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska. "They know that some want to prevent a vote at all costs."

Mr. Nelson and Mr. Warner co-wrote an earlier, more detailed bipartisan resolution disagreeing with the troop buildup. But that proposal stalled on Feb. 5, when the Republican leadership held its ranks together against the Democratic plan to allow a vote on that plan but not on the Gregg alternative. Mr. Warner sided with Republicans in that initial vote but broke from his party on Saturday.

"We have the right to respectfully disagree," Mr. Warner said. "Mr. President, do you need 21,500 additional men and women in this conflict to go into the streets and alleys of Baghdad?"

Some Republicans accused Democrats of political posturing in advance of the 2008 presidential and Congressional elections and of undermining military forces and the administration. They said opponents of Mr. Bush were trying to have it both ways, by criticizing his policy but not taking the more politically risky step of curtailing spending on the war.

"If you think we are in the middle of civil war, cut off funding," Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said to his colleagues.

The Saturday session drew a throng of spectators who lined up outside the Capitol hoping to get a glimpse of the debate. The Senate has met on Saturday only 14 times in the past decade and conducted votes on only five of those occasions, records show.

Nine Republican senators were not present for the vote, including Senator John McCain of Arizona, a presidential candidate, who was campaigning in Iowa. Two other Republicans, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Bob Corker of Tennessee, had left for Baghdad.

But with the burden of reaching 60 votes on their side, Democrats, particularly the party's presidential candidates, did not miss the showdown. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York campaigned in New Hampshire in the morning and came back for the vote; Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who had been in South Carolina, also came back. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware flew from Iowa to Washington before a scheduled return to Iowa on Saturday night.

GOP Senators Defuse Dems' War Resolution (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans on Saturday killed a Democratic effort to pass a symbolic resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq.

Democrats, who hold a narrow majority in the Senate, fell four votes shy of the 60 needed on a procedural vote to consider the nonbinding resolution. The 56-34 vote came a day after the Democratic-controlled House, in a largely party-line vote, rebuked Bush's war strategy after four days of often heated debate.

The rare Saturday session of the Senate lasted only about 3 1/2 hours, but was no less intense.

"The United States Senate, the greatest deliberative body in the whole world, is probably the only place (in America not debating the war)," said Robert Byrd, D-W.Va.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accused Republicans of trying to protect the president from an embarrassing vote. He said that he would no longer push for a vote on the nonbinding resolution but that war would remain center stage in the Senate.

"This war is too important to permit Senate Republicans to brush it aside," he said. "The Senate will keep fighting to force President Bush to change course."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., accused Democrats of playing "stupid political games."

"This is a low point in my time in the Senate," he said.

The Senate was scheduled to begin a week-long recess Saturday, but Reid kept the chamber in session, saying it was important to get senators on the record on the issue. Nine Republican senators skipped the vote.

Republicans said they were prepared to debate the war but only if Democrats would allow consideration of an alternative resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

A Reid spokesman said the Democratic leader didn't want to include the resolution opposing a cut in funding because it would be a distraction from a "yes or no vote on the escalation." The spokesman said that Reid offered to permit Republicans to bring their resolution at another time.

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said: "We will not be forced to vote for a resolution that says we support the troops but does not ask us to seal that pledge with a promise to help them carry out that mission in the only way they can -- funding their mission."

Republicans have contended that the nonbinding resolution is a prelude to Democratic efforts to withhold funding for the war. "The Senate was created to block that kind of dealing, and today it stops at the doors of this chamber," McConnell said.

With Democrats threatening to attach strings to the president's request for additional war funding, the White House issued a statement Saturday saying that the next votes in Congress should "provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success (in the war on terror)."

The resolution the Senate was considering taking up is the same one the House passed on Friday. It consists of two short sentences, the first stating that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect (U.S. forces serving in Iraq)," a phrase Democrats hoped would undercut attacks that they are undermining the troops.

Part of the second sentence says Congress "disapproves of the decision" Bush announced in a nationally televised speech Jan. 10 to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus in Iraq.

Although the Senate's resolution died, Democrats picked up the support of seven Republicans, five more than from an earlier vote on a similar measure. Five of the seven are up for re-election in 2008.

"This is the most pressing issue facing our nation, and it is important for the Senate to go on record on the president's plan," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, an opponent of the troop buildup who voted with the Democrats.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut who usually caucuses with Democrats, joined the 33 Republicans who voted no.

Democratic senators running for president canceled campaign appearances and flew back to Washington, D.C., from Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

The nine Republican no shows included Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who was campaigning for president in Iowa. They said their vote wouldn't have affected the outcome because they would have voted against limiting the debate to the anti-surge resolution. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., recovering from brain surgery, also was absent.

Several senators were none too happy about having to rearrange their travel plans for a vote whose outcome surprised nobody. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, assailed Democratic leaders for calling a rare Saturday session in order to try to "embarrass the 21 of us who are up for re-election (in 2008) on a nonbinding resolution that wouldn't accomplishing anything . . . just to see whether we'd come back to vote."

But Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, one of the Republicans who joined Democrats in voting to debate the anti-surge resolution, objected to the Senate taking a weeklong recess without debating the war.

After the Senate returns from its weeklong recess, both parties are expected to try to attach war-related amendments to legislation -- including a GOP effort to press for a vote on their resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., on Saturday introduced a resolution setting Dec. 31, 2007 as the expiration date for the 2002 congressional resolution that authorized the U.S.-led invasion against Iraq and requiring the president to return to Congress if he wants to extend it.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., on Friday introduced legislation that she said would cap the level of U.S. troops in Iraq at the number before the president's buildup and begin a phased redeployment of U.S. troops out of Iraq in 90 days. Her proposal also would prohibit the use of funds to send troops to Iraq, it said, "unless they have the proper equipment and training."

Tom Matzzie, Washington, D.C., director of the liberal MoveOn.org Political Action, said Saturday that Republican senators had given Bush "a green light to escalate (the war)."

Freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., lamented, "The Senate can't seem to do anything but debate about whether or not to debate.

War Rebuke Halted In Senate (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

Senate Democrats yesterday failed in their bid to move forward with a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

The 56-34 roll-call vote was four short of the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture, or to limit debate before a vote. Seven Republicans crossed party lines to vote with Democrats to advance the resolution.

"A majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," said Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "As for the Republicans who chose once again to block further debate and protect President Bush, the American people now know they support the escalation" in the number of troops.

It was Mr. Reid's second attempt in less than two weeks to push for a vote on the resolution.

Republicans said they had rebuffed an "unfair" attempt by Mr. Reid to prevent a vote on an alternative resolution that would protect funding for the troops in Iraq.

"There is no place for chicanery at a time of war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "Even some of the president's most strident opponents know that. They know that the only vote that truly matters is a vote on whether to fund the troops."

The White House yesterday agreed that funding the troops should be a top priority.

"Both houses of Congress within a matter of weeks will conduct binding votes on a matter of cardinal importance for America's future security and global credibility: whether to fund the president's supplemental-funding request for our military," a statement from the White House said. "The president urges both houses to approve his request."

Mr. Reid said the Senate is "moving on" from trying to pass the nonbinding resolution, which cleared the House on Friday by a vote of 246-182.

DOJ_NMG_0133403

He said Democrats will push for further debate on the war by attaching amendments to legislation adopting recommendations from the September 11 commission. That issue will be taken up when the Senate returns Feb. 27 from a weeklong recess.

But Senate Democrats offered no details on how they would try to block Mr. Bush's troop-surge plan.

House Democratic leaders have outlined a strategy to limit military options by restricting the use of money in a military-appropriations bill they will take up next month.

Republicans call that a "slow-bleed" approach that will cut off funds for the war, and Mr. Reid gave no indication of whether he will pursue the same strategy in the Senate.

Nine Republicans and one Democrat did not vote yesterday. One of those who didn't vote was Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, a 2008 presidential hopeful.

Mr. McCain, while campaigning in Iowa, told his audience that nonbinding measures are "insulting to the public and the soldiers," according to the Associated Press.

Democrats gained crossover votes yesterday from seven Republicans, up from just two in an identical vote nearly two weeks ago.

The seven Republicans who voted yesterday to advance the measure were Sens. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John W. Warner of Virginia. Sen. Bernard Sanders, Vermont independent, also voted with the Democrats.

But most Republicans insisted yesterday they will stand their ground.

"Harry Reid is not going to be able to stuff us on this one," Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said after the vote. "Every leader thinks he can be a dictator," said Mr. Lott, who was Senate majority leader from 1996 to 2001. "He cannot."

Republicans were determined not to be portrayed as "blocking debate," as they had been after the previous vote.

"Republicans in the Senate have not prevented any debate over the war in Iraq," said Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, at the beginning of the nearly two-hour debate preceding yesterday's vote. "What we have prevented is the majority leader dictating to the minority exactly which resolutions we will vote on."

Still, Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, vowed that Democrats would "be relentless" in their campaign to end the war in Iraq.

"There will be resolution after resolution, amendment after amendment, all forcing this body to do what is has not done for three years: discuss and debate Iraq," Mr. Schumer said. "Just like in the days of Vietnam, the pressure will mount ... and the vast majority of our troops will have to be taken out of harm's way."

A gallery full of spectators watched yesterday's debate preceding the vote, and more than 100 people stood in line outside the Capitol, waiting to enter.

While Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, was speaking, a lone protester, wearing an American flag bandanna on her head, rose and shouted, according to some in the chamber: "Three-thousand American lives lost. The American people voted bring the troops home."

As Capitol Police officers took the woman out, she shouted, "I yield back the balance of my time," mocking the phrase senators use after finishing their speeches.

No Decision On Iraq Resolution (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, February 18, 2007

The Senate expressed strong, bipartisan disapproval of President Bush's policy on Iraq in a rare Saturday session, but lawmakers nevertheless failed to end their debate and pass a non-binding resolution.

One day after the House issued its stinging rebuke to Bush's plan to boost the number of troops in Iraq, the Senate was unable to muster the 60 votes necessary to end a Republican filibuster and pass what has become an important symbol of resistance to the war.

It was the second time in recent days that the Senate was stymied by parliamentary rules requiring the consent of a supermajority before any action could be taken on the anti-war resolution.

The vote was 56-34, with 7 Republicans joining 49 Democrats. Both Illinois senators, Dick Durbin and Barack Obama, voted to cut off debate and proceed to a vote on the resolution.

Frustrated Democrats vowed to continue to press the Iraq issue in the coming weeks on a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. But they conceded that the resolution itself is dead. Meanwhile, the administration has already begun shoring up combat troops in Baghdad by 21,500 regardless of congressional action.

"The Senate is not done with this issue," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared after the vote. "It's too important to be brushed aside."

Angry Republicans insisted that the language in question would demoralize American soldiers fighting in Iraq. And they rejected assertions that their filibuster was preventing the Senate from debating the merits of the war strategy.

"Here is the truth that the American people need to know: Republicans in the Senate have not prevented any debate over the war in Iraq," said Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.). "We are debating the war again today. We have debated the war in the past and we will continue to debate the war in the future."

The fact that Congress was debating the war issue at all stemmed from the voters' decision in November to throw Republicans out of office and hand control of the legislative branch to the Democrats.

Sitting solemnly as the roll was called, senators stood one at a time and answered aye or nay as their name was called. A number of Republicans decided to skip the vote altogether, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who was campaigning for president in Iowa.

But other presidential candidates hastily returned from campaign swings in New Hampshire and South Carolina to cast their vote, including Obama, Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Christopher Dodd (D-Ct.).

Many senators expressed disgust that they had been dragged into work on the weekend, accusing Democrats of gamesmanship.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) complained that the Senate was "playing stupid political games" as Reid refused to allow debate on multiple resolutions. And he challenged those that oppose the war to vote to cut off funding, rather than supporting a message of disapproval.

"This is a very, very sad Saturday for the U.S. Senate on the heels of a disaster in the U.S. House, where a majority, a bare majority, of the House wants to send a political message at a time of war that doesn't keep one person from being shot at," Graham said.

The House vote rebuking Bush's war plan was 246-182, with 17 Republicans voting in the majority.

Nevertheless, prominent Senate Republicans such as John Warner of Virginia, a former Secretary of the Navy, argued it was time to move forward, end debate and vote on the resolution.

"We do so because we only wish to express a measure of disagreement on one basic point, an important one, with our president," said Warner, the ranking member of the Armed Services Committee. "We're a co-equal part of our government -- we have the right to respectfully disagree."

Altogether, five Republicans changed their votes Saturday from the one they cast days earlier to prevent the Senate from voting on the resolution.

"In my view, it is most important that the Senate speak out on Iraq. If we continue to debate whether there should be a debate while the House of Representatives acts, the Senate will become irrelevant," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of the switchers. "To paraphrase the Roman adage: `The Senate should not fiddle while Iraq burns.' "

With the shadow of Vietnam hanging over the debate, lawmakers said they felt a special duty to take a public stand on the war, nearly four years after it began.

"Just like in the days of Vietnam, the pressure will mount, the president will find he has no strategy, he will have to change his strategy, and the vast majority of troops will be taken out of harm's way and come home," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who accused the GOP of "tying itself into a pretzel" to avoid a vote.

Many senators said Congress never authorized the president to use force to quell a civil war, calling the conflict between the Sunnis and the Shias untenable and unwinnable.

"It may be called a surge, but I believe it is a plunge -- a plunge into a sectarian cauldron, a plunge into the unknown and perhaps the unknowable," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Reid Claims Symbolic Victory Even As GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, February 17, 2007

Despite falling four votes short of breaking a GOP filibuster, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) claimed a symbolic victory in the fight over the Iraq War today as Democrats mustered a bipartisan majority of 56 lawmakers to support taking up a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in the war-torn country.

Following the failed cloture vote, Reid withdrew the resolution, essentially ending the chances that it will again come before the Senate this year. In a brief statement following the vote, Reid said that "a majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq."

Republicans, however, argued that the vote was a victory for their efforts both to back Bush's plan and to protect the procedural rights of the minority. While Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) argued that "Senate Republicans have indicated once again that they are going to insist on a debate on Iraq that includes funding for the troops," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) characterized the vote as protecting "what the United States Senate has stood for for 200 years ... [that] if an idea has 60 votes, it gets out of the Senate."

Seven Republicans joined 49 Democratic Senators on Saturday in voting to break a filibuster orchestrated by GOP leaders, five more than had joined Reid earlier this month during his first attempt to take up the resolution. GOP Sens. John Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) joined Sens. Norm Coleman (Minn.) and Susan Collins (Maine), the only two Republicans to previously oppose the filibuster.

Within minutes of the vote, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee issued a statement attacking Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) for supporting the filibuster. Sununu is up for re-election in 2008 and is facing what is expected to be a strong Democratic challenge, and the DSCC's statement is likely a harbinger of what is to come over the next several months for him and other vulnerable GOP incumbents who opposed the resolution.

At a press conference following the vote, Reid indicated that he would not look to bring a nonbinding resolution to a vote again, although he remained noncommittal on whether his party would look to take steps to forcibly bring Bush's surge plan to an end. Reid did say that the Senate would take up a bill addressing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission when it returns from the recess and that votes pertaining to Iraq could occur at that time.

Campaigns Pause For Senate Vote (WP)

Debate Presents Logistical Challenge for '08 Presidential Hopefuls

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton rushed to Washington yesterday afternoon to join the Senate fracas over an Iraq war resolution after telling a New Hampshire audience hours earlier that she would rather lose support for her presidential bid than apologize for her vote in 2002 authorizing the military action.

Under mounting pressure from antiwar Democrats to make amends for her support for the U.S. invasion of Iraq, which she now says was a terrible mistake, Clinton (D-N.Y.) renewed her vow to end the war if she is elected president. But she refused to repudiate her vote, as former Democratic senator John Edwards has done.

"Obviously I would not vote that way again if we knew then what we now know," the Democratic presidential front-runner said during a town meeting in Dover. "But I have to say that if the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from. But to me the most important thing now is trying to end this war."

For Clinton and other presidential aspirants, yesterday posed a logistical challenge in trying to straddle the competing demands of a congressional debate over the course of the war and the early, critical phase of the 2008 presidential campaign. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid's decision to hold a procedural vote Saturday on whether to consider a nonbinding House resolution critical of President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq forced them to scramble their campaign schedules to register votes of little consequence. The Senate fell four votes short of the 60 required to proceed to a floor vote on the resolution.

Clinton scrubbed one scheduled stop in New Hampshire but went ahead with the Dover town meeting before returning to Washington for the vote. In the Senate chamber, she sat composed and quiet in the back row.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) had planned to spend the day in Iowa but instead flew back to Washington for the vote, then returned for an evening event. Of all the Senate's presidential hopefuls, he was the only one to speak before the vote.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) hurriedly departed a campaign stop in South Carolina to cast his vote before hustling to a campaign appearance in Richmond and then boarding a plane to San Diego. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) voted against moving to a debate on the war before rushing to catch a plane to Orlando, where he was to address religious broadcasters.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of his party's front-runners for the 2008 nomination, did not bother to show up. In Iowa yesterday, McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade. He ridiculed the action as a "purely political stunt" that was "insulting to the public and our soldiers" in Iraq.

Other Republicans who showed up for the vote joined in deriding the unusual session as mere grandstanding by Democratic presidential candidates mollifying the party's left flank.

"We're not working," fumed Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "We're having a political, theatrical debate that does more harm than good. There are a lot of people who are working on a Saturday, not us. We're trying to jockey for political position among ourselves for '08."

Brownback was perhaps the only presidential candidate in a quandary over the Senate vote. He has voiced serious concerns over Bush's Iraq policies but has cast himself as a conservative's conservative. Yesterday, he decided to stand by the president and his leadership.

"While I do not think a troop surge is the best course of action, I believe that the Senate should be allowed to vote on resolutions that would demonstrate support for the men and women serving in our military and guarantee they have the funds necessary to complete their mission," Brownback said.

But Clinton had the most to say about the war. A video posted on her campaign Web site detailed what she called a plan to end the war. That proposal would cap the number of troops in Iraq at the January level. "It would be against the law to send more," she said. In a nod to House Democratic plans, she endorsed mandates for the training and equipping of combat troops, proposing that the defense secretary would have to certify that the troops met such standards before they are deployed.

Leading House Democrats hope to condition Iraq deployments on a series of caveats: Combat troops would need a year's rest between tours of duty. Combat tours in Iraq could no longer be extended beyond a year. And the Pentagon's "stop loss" program, which keeps some officers in the military beyond their required years of service, would have to end.

Clinton offered no such details. The political centerpiece of her plan would require the president to seek new authorization for the war in Iraq if troop withdrawals do not begin within 90 days.

"Let me be clear," she stated for the camera. "If George Bush doesn't end this war before he leaves office, when I'm president, I will."

In her morning appearance in New Hampshire, she said Democrats cannot wait for bipartisan solutions to stanch the bleeding from a war that has cost more than 3,100 American lives and more than half a trillion tax dollars. "We have to end this war, and we can't do it without Republican votes," she said.

Graham tried to goad Democrats to go further and vote to cut off funding for the war. Senate Democrats have spent weeks refusing to allow a debate on a Republican resolution opposing any withholding of funds for the troops, and Graham ascribed the maneuvering purely to politics.

"Here's the crux of the matter: The reason we're here on a Saturday playing stupid political games while people are off in Iraq trying to win this war is because our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are afraid to take a vote on cutting off funding," he said. "The reason they don't want to be on record is because the radical left will eat Democrat '08 hopefuls' lunch. They will create a fight on that side of monumental proportions."

As Senate Avoids Debate, Only Statements Are Sartorial (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Senators entered the chamber to vote on the Iraq war yesterday as if emerging from a Lands' End catalogue.

There was Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) in a gray tweed blazer with elbow patches, a purple sweater, lavender shirt and violet tie. Nearby was David Vitter (R-La.), wearing tan slacks and a black knit shirt. No fewer than 17 senators wore navy blazers: Richard Burr (R-N.C.) combined his with green corduroys, Pat Leahy (D-Vt.) with a blue sweater, Tom Carper (D-Del.) with a red sweater, Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) with a windowpane-pattern shirt, and John Sununu (R-N.H.) with wrinkled khakis.

Other weekend legislators had trouble with the casual Saturday concept. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) wore a pink hooded sweater known as a "hoodie," black clogs and white socks. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) opted for a bolo tie and a western jacket with suede patches on the shoulders. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) went with blue jeans and a turtleneck. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who does not drive on Saturday because of the Jewish Sabbath, wore hiking boots.

It was, as Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) put it, "a very special occasion." The rare Saturday session, in addition to making the Senate floor look like an Andover reunion, gave the lawmakers one more chance to talk about -- and then vote against -- having a full debate about the direction of the Iraq war. Both sides knew in advance that Republicans still had enough votes to block the debate again (Democrats came up four votes short), but Democrats were determined to cause the GOP maximum discomfort by forcing a vote on the weekend.

"We all know it's rare for the Senate to hold a Saturday vote, but the issue before us is too important to wait," said Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the majority leader.

Lindsey Graham (R-Blue Blazer-Gray Flannel Slacks) referred to see it as "a very, very sad Saturday" for all. "This is being billed as an unusual Saturday session where the Senate is working," said Graham, sporting South Carolina's palmetto-tree emblem on his tie. "I would argue we're not working, we're having a political theatrical debate."

West Virginia's Robert Byrd (D-Beige Suit), who knows something about theatrics, volunteered: "If it will help to bring our soldiers home, I will work every Saturday for the rest of this Congress. I will stand here -- right here! right here! -- on this floor, on this floor of this Senate every day, every day, every day, 24 hours every day if it would mean one less family without a son or a daughter. Hear me!"

Alaska's Ted Stevens (R-Blue Blazer-Gray Trousers), was sour about delaying his Presidents' Day recess. "It is an important subject to be debated, but why Saturday?" he complained.

With a few exceptions (Barack Obama sauntered in 20 minutes after the vote began), the Democratic senators attempted a note of solemnity. They sat quietly at their desks for the vote, standing to call out "aye." But Republicans, nine of whom skipped the vote entirely, declined to play. McConnell, the minority leader, ignored the clerk when his name was called. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) made a show of breezing through -- he put on his overcoat immediately after voting and left with his briefcase -- and fellow Kansan Pat Roberts (R-Blue Blazer-Chinos) wore a blue scarf and playfully swatted colleagues with his driving cap.

Wearied by two weeks of fighting over whether to have an Iraq debate, the senators by yesterday had resorted to calling each other chickens.

"Apparently some in the Senate are afraid of such a debate," said Byrd, who punctuated his taunts by sneezing into his microphone.

"I am not running from a vote," announced Jim Bunning (R-Ky.). "I don't know one of my Republican colleagues that is afraid to cast a vote."

"I applaud the courage of a few hearty Republicans who will vote cloture and allow this vote to occur," Reid bullied.

"I'm not afraid of your ideas," Graham maintained.

McConnell advised the Democrats that their position "takes no courage."

Among the few senators who did demonstrate courage yesterday was John Warner (R-Va.), who was all business in a dark blue suit and a dress shirt with French cuffs. He wore an angry expression as he heard Graham accusing Democrats of following the "politics of the moment" and "trying to jockey for political positioning." As Graham raged on, Warner made a circling motion with his finger and pretended to bang a gavel in an attempt to get the presiding officer to cut Graham off.

"I've been privileged to be a member of the United States Senate now in my 29th year," Warner said when Graham finally was silenced. "Never have I stood on this floor and in any way impugned the integrity of any senator." Siding with the Democrats, Warner declared that "we must move forward" with a debate, adding: "I think I'm doing right for the integrity of this institution."

Graham, who left his desk after his tantrum, must not have heard Warner's reproach. Even after his side prevailed in blocking the debate, Graham was still swinging. "I'm not afraid of any other idea," he boasted at a news conference. "There's nothing on the table I'm afraid of."

Not that anybody doubted Graham. It takes a strong man to wear a palmetto tie.

Senate Blocks Iraq War Resolution Debate (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Senate gridlocked on the Iraq war in a sharply worded showdown on Saturday as Republicans foiled a Democratic attempt to rebuke President Bush over his deployment of 21,500 additional combat troops.

The vote was 56-34. That was four short of the 60 needed to advance the measure, which is identical to a nonbinding resolution that Democrats pushed through the House on Friday.

"The Senate, on behalf of the American people, must make it clear to the commander in chief that he no longer has a rubber stamp in Iraq," said Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in the final moments before the vote.

Republicans blasted him and the Democratic leadership for refusing to allow a vote on an alternative that ruled out any reduction in money for troops in the field.

"A vote in support of the troops that is silent on the question of funds is an attempt to have it both ways," said Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the GOP leader. "So we are asking for an honest and open debate."

The vote marked the second time this winter that Senate Republicans have blocked action on nonbinding measures critical of the president's war policies. This time, however, there were signs of restlessness within the GOP.

Seven Republicans broke with their leadership, compared with only two on the previous test vote.

Also this time, the maneuvering concerned a nonbinding measure that disapproved of Bush's decision to deploy the additional troops and pledged to support and protect the troops.

The vote in the House on Friday was 246-182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to support the measure and two Democrats voting in opposition.

Saturday's debate and vote occurred in an intensely political environment, both in and out of the Capitol. The unusual weekend session sent presidential contenders in both parties scrambling to make the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0133408

One of them, Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, squeezed in a morning appearance in New Hampshire, where she told one audience, "We have to end this war and we can't do it without Republican votes."

Polls show strong public opposition to the war, which as killed more than 3,100 U.S. troops. Democrats seemed eager to force Republicans into votes that might prove politically troublesome.

"They are torn between their president's policy and the wishes of the constituents, but vote they must," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, head of the Senate Democrats' campaign committee.

Democrats in both the House and Senate have said the nonbinding measures would be only the first attempt to force a shift in Bush's war policies.

In the Senate, Reid has told lawmakers he will turn anti-terrorism legislation into a forum for debate over the war. He has met privately in recent days with fellow Democrats as the leadership plans its next move.

In the House, Democrats have said they will attempt to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the military in an attempt to make it impossible for him to deploy all 21,500 additional troops.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., has described a series of provisions that would require the Pentagon to meet certain standards for training and equipping the troops, and for making sure they have enough time at home between deployments.

Murtha and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., describe these provisions as designed to protect the troops.

Republicans argue the effect would be to deny troops needed reinforcements and are expected to try to block the restrictions.

Republicans Block Senate War Debate (POL)

By Daniel W. Reilly, John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 17, 2007

In a rare Saturday session, Senate Republicans blocked Democrats from debating a House-approved resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 combat troops into Iraq.

Republicans united largely behind Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and refused to allow the measure to be considered unless they could offer an alternative declaring that funding for military personnel in Iraq would not be cut.

The vote on a cloture motion filed by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was 56 to 34, four short of the 60 votes needed to begin debate.

Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats: Sens. John Warner of Virginia, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe, both of Maine.

Only Coleman and Collins had previously sided with the Democrats in an earlier bid to start Senate debate an Iraq resolution that would certainly have led to a rebuke of the president's strategy.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, I-Conn., joined the GOP filibuster Saturday and voted against cloture.

Republican Sens. Bob Bennett of Utah, Kit Bond of Missouri, Thad Cochran of Mississippi, Bob Corker of Tennessee, John Ensign of Nevada, Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, Jon Kyl of Arizona, John McCain of Arizona (read more here) and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska did not vote.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., recovering from brain surgery, has been absent from the Senate for several months.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow said the president was focusing on votes down the road to fund the war in Iraq, not on the latest "nonbinding" resolutions.

"This week's voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy's vigor," Snow said in a prepared statement. "The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success, supporting the cause of democracy, and stopping terrorist forces in their ultimate aim of bringing their violence to our shores."

After Saturday's Senate vote, Reid claimed the results showed the president was losing support from Senate Republicans for his plan to "surge" more troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there.

"A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority in the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," Reid said.

But McConnell, is a speech on the Senate floor, charged that Democrats want to cut off funds for the troops in Iraq but were afraid to proceed. He characterized as a political stunt a vote on the Iraq resolution that was passed, 246 to 182, by the Democratic-controlled House on Friday. Seventeen House Republicans broke with the president then and supported measure rejecting the troop surge.

"Let those of us who support the president's plan to win in Iraq say so. Let those of us who oppose it say so," McConnell said. "But we will not be forced to vote for a resolution that says we support the troops but does not ask us to seal that pledge with a promise to help them carry out that mission in the only way [we] can — funding their mission."

And Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said: "If you did have this vote, the left, the radical left, would eat every Democratic presidential hopeful alive."

"The hard left wants out of this war yesterday,'' Graham added. “And two-thirds of this body understands the hard left is dead wrong."

Senate Democrats Again Fail To Get Iraq Vote (HILL)

By Klaus Marre, Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 17, 2007

The effort of Democratic leaders to force a Senate vote on a non-binding resolution opposing a troop surge in Iraq was blocked in a rare Saturday session. Though a majority of senators supported the plan in a 56-34 vote, Democrats were unable to convince a sufficient number of Republicans to support them and failed to get to the 60-vote threshold they needed to move forward.

A day after the House rebuked President Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 combat troops to the existing force in Iraq, Senate Democrats again failed to invoke cloture and move to a vote on the underlying resolution. But while they fell short by 11 votes on February 5, this time they were only four votes shy of getting cloture.

Republicans supporting the measure were Sens. John Warner (Va.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Susan Collins (Maine), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Gordon Smith (Ore.), Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.), an independent who caucuses with the Democrats, voted against cloture.

Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), two of the frontrunners for the Democratic presidential nomination, decided to be in Washington for the vote rather than go campaigning. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a contender for the Republican nomination, did not vote.

The debate leading up to the vote Saturday was marked by heated rhetoric and interrupted by a protestor who had to be removed from the gallery.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the day marked a "low-point" in his career as a senator. He accused Democrats of playing "stupid political games," adding that if they think the situation in Iraq could not be salvaged, then they should just vote to cut off funding.

Several Republicans strongly criticized Democratic leaders for how they have handled the issue, accusing them of partisanship and trampling on minority rights in the Senate. The GOP wants to vote on its own resolutions on the issue.

"The Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world, but it's becoming clear that differing views and amendments will not be considered," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.). "The Democrats' hypocrisy is becoming a pattern that ignores their promises of bipartisanship."

But Democrats rejected those assertions and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said the vote was about Senators standing up and declaring where they stand on Iraq.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) stated prior to the vote that it was "an opportunity to send a powerful message." Reid and other Democrats accused Republicans of using Senate procedures to avoid a debate on the issue.

Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) said the Senate is "probably the only place" in the country where the debate on the Iraq war is not taking place.

Schumer said the resolution is the first step in ratcheting up the pressure on Bush and predicted eventually this would lead the president to change his strategy and eventually help get the troops home.

"This is not a fight against terrorism - this is a civil war…," Schumer said, calling Bush's Iraq policy misguided.

Following the vote Reid, when asked what the next step would be and whether it would include cutting funding, said, "I know of no talk at this stage about cutting funding."

Reid also stated that the Senate would move onto other issues. The upper chamber will take up legislation implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission after the Presidents' Day break. Senators are expected to offer amendments related to the war to that bill.

Senate Won't Vote On Objection To Troop Buildup (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Senate Democrats failed to garner the 60 votes they needed to consider a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

The vote was 56-34, with seven Republicans crossing the aisle to vote with senators who oppose the troop buildup.

The measure was identical to a nonbinding resolution the House passed Friday denouncing the plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0133410

"We are policing a civil war in Iraq," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-New York, said before the vote. "American troops should not be in the middle of that war."

He added, "The president's escalation is misguided, to put it kindly."

The Saturday vote was a procedural decision on whether the Senate should move on to a final vote on a resolution that expresses opposition to Bush's plan.

Republicans pushed for an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-New Hampshire, that would address funding of the war, which they said would make the vote meaningful.

"This nonbinding resolution, as a practical matter, doesn't do anything, but was designed to try to disapprove of the new mission," Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Kentucky, said after the vote. "Our view is you cannot discuss the new mission in Iraq without discussing funding for the troops."

McConnell said the Senate should have considered another resolution, put forward by Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and independent Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, which includes benchmarks to measure Iraqi progress toward security goals.

In a written statement after the vote, White House press secretary Tony Snow urged Congress to approve Bush's funding request for the military.

"It would enable the world's most capable military force to remain the most advanced in terms of training, equipment, doctrine and -- most importantly -- the quality of the men and women who serve," Snow said.

Graham said politics made Democrats afraid to allow a vote on funding the war.

"If you did have this vote, the left -- the radical left -- would eat every Democratic hopeful for president alive," Graham said. "That's why we're not having this vote. The hard left wants out of this war yesterday."

Senate Republicans succeeded earlier this month in blocking a vote on a similar resolution. Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada urged Senate Republicans to drop their procedural moves.

In the House, 17 Republicans joined Democrats on Friday in passing the two-sentence resolution. It expresses support for U.S. troops in Iraq but states that Congress "disapproves" of Bush's troop increase.

On February 5, all but two GOP senators voted to block debate on the similar resolution. Saturday's vote saw five more GOP senators join the Democrats.

They were Sens. John Warner of Virginia, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon, Olympia Snowe of Maine and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

"We support the president on the diplomatic aspects of his plan. We support the president on the economic aspects of his plan," Warner said.

"We only disagree with one portion of it: Mr. President, do you need 21,500 additional men and women of the armed forces in this conflict?" Warner said.

Sen. Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, backed the chance to vote on the resolution.

"If we believe plunging into Baghdad neighborhoods with more American troops will not increase chances of success, we are duty-bound to say so," Levin said.GOP insisted on 'measure of fairness'

Republican leaders insisted that members get a chance to vote on two GOP alternatives, and that the process be conducted under rules that called for 60 votes to pass.

Republican critics have claimed that passing the resolution could lead to a cutoff in funding for the troops.

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Kentucky, said before the vote that Republicans would insist on "a measure of fairness," allowing them to offer alternative resolutions -- including one stating the Senate won't cut off money for troops in the field.

"If we have only one alternative, it will involve a vote on funding the troops," McConnell said.

Published polls indicate a solid majority of the U.S. public opposes the Bush plan, and Democrats said the November election victories that put them in control of Congress show Americans want to wind down the nearly four-year-old war.Bush challenges Congress not to cut funding

Bush noted Thursday that the Senate recently confirmed the promotion of Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. troops in Iraq, even as members criticized the strategy he was installed to pursue.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made an unannounced visit to Iraq on Saturday on her way to meet with Middle East leaders. She told troops there that despite the political debate, their efforts are appreciated back home.

Though the president said lawmakers "have every right to express their opinion," he demanded they support an upcoming spending bill that would commit nearly $100 billion more to the war effort.

"Our men and women in uniform are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need to accomplish their mission," Bush said.

US Senate Blocks Vote On Iraq War (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

The US Senate has decided not to debate a resolution criticising President George W Bush's troop surge in Iraq.

The rare Saturday session followed a non-binding vote backing the resolution in the House of Representatives.

In the House, 17 Republicans had joined the majority Democrats to oppose the increase of 21,500 troops.

Democrats needed the support of 60 of the 100 senators to advance the same motion in the Senate, but they only managed to gain 56 votes in favour.

Mr Bush still faces battles with Congress over funding for US troops in Iraq.

Although both the Congressional resolutions are non-binding, the president needs the legislators to support his $93bn (£48bn) emergency troop-funding measure.

The White House has dismissed the vote, and warned Congress against trying to cut off funding.

Under Mr Bush's new Iraq strategy, 21,500 extra troops are being sent, mostly to the capital Baghdad, to help enforce new security measures.

Senate Democrats were hoping to repeat their Friday success in the House, when the motion criticising the president's Iraq policy was passed by 246 votes to 182.

"Today's vote is an opportunity to send a powerful message," said Democrat majority leader, Senator Harry Reid, during an emotional discussion.

"The Senate's responsibility must be to vote on escalation, whether the so-called surge is supported or opposed. This is the choice. More war, or less war," the Democrat leader told the Senate.

Republicans sought debate on a different motion, which would have ruled out any budget cuts affecting troops already in Iraq.

"A vote in support of the troops that is silent on the question of funds is an attempt to have it both ways," said Senator Mitch McConnell, the Republican leader.

Only seven Republicans broke ranks with the party, and so the Democrats failed to reach the 60 votes needed to pass the motion.

'Tragic goal'

The House vote on Friday in support of the non-binding motion brought to a close the first full debate there since the Democrats took control of Congress in November.

Speaking after the vote, House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi said it would send an unmistakable signal to the White House.

"The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president - we here in Congress are committed to protecting and supporting our troops."

House Minority Leader John Boehner had urged lawmakers to vote against the motion, saying it was "the first step towards a tragic, unthinkable goal".

Rice, In Surprise Baghdad Visit, Presses Leaders For Progress (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday to meet with Iraqi officials about the new security plan and to press the Shiite-led government to accelerate reconciliation, reconstruction and economic progress.

Iraqi officials in recent days have said the start of the new push for security in Baghdad has been a success, significantly reducing violence.

Ms. Rice, in a meeting with reporters after her talk with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders, said it was still too early to judge the effectiveness of the new plan. But she said she had pushed the Iraqis to think beyond short-term security, to how neighborhoods and Iraqi civil society could be rebuilt if sectarian violence between the ruling Shiites and the minority Sunnis subsided.

She said she had told Iraq's leaders to quickly finish work on an oil law that would distribute revenues evenly among Iraq's population. She also stressed the importance of creating a more balanced government by rehiring thousands of Sunni civil servants whom the Americans fired soon after the invasion in 2003, fearing they would remain loyal to Saddam Hussein.

She described both proposed moves as proxies for larger, still unanswered questions about whether Iraq could become a truly united country.

"I'm told that the oil law is almost complete." she said. "I did say to my colleagues that I've heard it's almost complete before, and this time I hope it really is complete — as in, complete — because people are looking to see some elements of national reconciliation put into place. It's really critical."

The Baghdad stop, tagged on to Ms. Rice's scheduled trip to Israel, comes at a politically delicate time for the Bush administration. On Friday, a sharply divided House of Representatives passed a resolution formally repudiating President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 new combat troops to Iraq.

The rare wartime rebuke to the commander in chief — an act that is not binding but carries symbolic significance — was approved 246 to 182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to join all but 2 Democrats in supporting the resolution.

Ms. Rice said she used the restiveness in Washington to underline for Iraqi officials the spread of American frustration with Iraq's lagging political and economic progress.

She said she had "made clear that some of the debate in Washington is, in fact, indicative of the concerns that the American people have about the prospects for success" if Iraq's leaders did not quickly take actions to ensure longer-term stability.

Ms. Rice also addressed the administration's recent claim that the Quds Force, an elite branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard, had supplied Shiite militants in Iraq with deadly roadside bombs that had killed American troops. Echoing comments made by President Bush, Ms. Rice said she did not know whether the top levels of Iran's government had approved delivering the weapons to Iraq. But she said she did not think that excused Iran.

"It is an activity that is done by an element of the Iranian government," she said, "so I think the Iranian government has to be held accountable for it."

Earlier Saturday, Ms. Rice addressed about 25o American soldiers and civilian State Department employees at a palace that doubles as the United States Embassy. Standing in a cavernous lounge, beside an American espresso bar and below gilded ceilings embossed with Mr. Hussein's initials, she acknowledged criticism over the war in Congress.

"Some do not think this war was the right war to fight," she said. "Some believe we in the administration haven't fought it quite right." But she also insisted that, despite those disagreements, both Democrats and Republicans appreciated the troops' efforts.

"We can have our discussions and debates at home, but Americans want to win this war," she said. "You're in a noble cause."

Mr. Rice also said that Iraq's struggles for stability were not dissimilar from what the United States once experienced: "Perfect union was imperfect at its start."

She said Iraq's situation was similar, and she cautioned against viewing Iraqis as less competent at building a democracy. "Usually people think of war and peace," she said. "We all know that, in between, there's a lot."

Ms. Rice's visit came on a day of relative calm in Baghdad, but in the northern city of Kirkuk, two car bombs near the offices of a Kurdish political party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, killed nine people.

After her day in Baghdad, Ms. Rice traveled to Israel for a meeting on Monday between the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

In Baghdad, Rice Acknowledges Frustrations In U.S. (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed support for a nascent Baghdad security plan during an unannounced visit to the capital Saturday, but she reminded Iraq's leaders that Americans were growing increasingly frustrated with the unyielding lethality and cost of the war.

Rice spoke approvingly of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's leadership, urged Iraqi officials to enact laws to fairly administer the country's vast oil reserves and acknowledged widespread disapproval of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq among many Americans and U.S. lawmakers.

She arrived in the capital a day after the U.S. House passed a nonbinding resolution rejecting the administration's troop increase in Iraq, where violence has become the norm in the streets and squabbling dominates the political process.

"The American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever," Rice said during a 30-minute conversation with reporters in U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad's living room. "But we're also not saying to the Iraqis: Get it done by X-date, or else. That's not the way one treats a partnership in these difficult circumstances."

Rice met with Maliki and President Jalal Talabani and later had lunch at the U.S. ambassador's residence with a group that included the Kurdish deputy prime minister and the country's foreign minister. She said the Baghdad security plan, which was formally launched this week, was bringing "new hope and a new optimism" to the besieged Iraqi capital. A spokesman for the security plan said attacks have fallen 80 percent since it was launched Wednesday, and there were relatively few reports of violence Saturday.

Ten people were killed and 90 injured in two car bombs in the northern city of Kirkuk, police said, and an improvised explosive device killed one person in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced that a Marine was killed Friday in combat in the western province of Anbar. His name was not released.

Rice praised Maliki for vowing to target lawlessness across sectarian lines.

"Thus far, they seem to be carrying through with the rules of engagement that would suggest that justice and law enforcement is going to be evenhanded," Rice said. "These are the first days of the security plan. It's not going to be one day and then everyone can declare victory . . . There are going to be bad days in the Baghdad security plan when violence is up."

Rice asked insistently about the progress of legislative bills that would regulate the exploration and revenue sharing of the country's oil reserves, according to Iraqi officials who spoke to her.

Iraqi officials tasked with creating a draft law have failed to present a bill to parliament. At stake is the extent to which the central government will control exploration and management of oil fields and whether revenue will be distributed equally across the country.

Iraq's oil reserves are concentrated in the northern Kurdish area and provinces in the predominantly Shiite south.

"I did hear it's almost complete," Rice said about a status report she received on the draft of the bill. "I've heard that it's complete before. And this time, I hope it really is almost complete -- as in complete."

Rice left with a realistic sense of the challenges that lie ahead, said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister.

"She emphasized a great deal the issue of urgency," Zebari said in a telephone interview Saturday night. Rice stressed to Iraqi leaders that "patience is not unlimited in the United States and that there's a great deal of frustration," he added.

Rice said U.S. officials believe Iranian officials are involved in supplying Iraqi militias with parts to assemble deadly armor-penetrating weapons. But Rice said she did not know to what extent and at what level Iranian officials are complicit in their procurement.

When asked whether she was surprised by the skepticism that followed assertions last week by U.S. military briefers in Baghdad that Iranian weapons were being provided to Shiite militias in Iraq, Rice responded, "It's America, it's a democracy. And everything is greeted with questioning and skepticism . . . We understand there's still the shadow of what happened about weapons of mass destruction here."

Rice arrived at the Baghdad airport at 11:30 a.m. and arrived minutes later at the fortified Green Zone, where embassy and military personnel were gathered at a large meeting hall inside the former national guard palace, which was converted into the interim U.S. Embassy after Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was overthrown in 2003.

Standing behind a lectern flanked by an Iraqi and a U.S. flag, Rice told those present that their work is "noble" and "necessary" to keep the United States safe. She acknowledged the fierce opposition in Washington to President Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq in what many see as a last-ditch effort to secure the country and lay the groundwork for a sustainable democracy.

"Some do not think this war was the right war to fight," she said. "Some believe we in the administration haven't fought it quite right."

But she assured the group there is unequivocal support for the troops.

Rice was accompanied by Karen Hughes, the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs. Hughes, a close friend of Bush, had not previously visited Iraq.

Rice and Hughes were shuttled around the Green Zone in heavily armored vehicles, trailed by dozens of security guards. While Rice met with Maliki and Talabani, Hughes attended a musical performance at the al-Rashid Hotel, inside the Green Zone. Neither spent time outside the secured compound.

After her stop in Baghdad, Rice flew to Israel for a three-day visit to try to nurture a new effort to promote peace between the Israelis and Palestinians. Her mission has been complicated by a new Palestinian unity government that brings the moderate Fatah party into a government led by the radical Hamas group.

Rice will bring the Israeli and Palestinian leaders together for a meeting Monday, but both sides appeared to be jockeying for position ahead of the summit. Before having dinner with Rice, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni hardened Israel's stance on the emerging government, saying "the understandings" between Hamas and Fatah "do not meet the requirements of the international community."

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas also took a tough line, telling a U.S. envoy Saturday that the power-sharing agreement he reached was the best he could get and that an international aid boycott must be lifted, Palestinians said.

Rice, In A Surprise Visit, Urges Iraqis To Reconcile (LAT)

By Louise Roug
T

BAGHDAD — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday and urged Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians to use a lull in violence resulting from a new security plan to reach long-delayed agreement on key political issues.

Her visit came as the much-vaunted plan, called Operation Law and Order, was getting underway in Iraq's capital. An Iraqi military spokesman said that attacks had already dropped significantly and that many fewer bodies were being brought to the morgue.

"How the Iraqis use the breathing space that [the plan] might provide is what's really important," Rice said during her half-day visit to Baghdad's heavily protected Green Zone. Iraqi security forces were "off to a good start," but it was still early, she said.

"There are going to be bad days for the Baghdad security plan, when violence is up — not down," she said. "The real test will be steering a steady course."

Though Baghdad has appeared calmer, attackers have hit elsewhere. In Kirkuk on Saturday, bombers killed six people and wounded 75. High-ranking Iraqi military officials have recently noted a significant increase in attacks in and around Kirkuk.

Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens all want control of the city and the surrounding region. At stake are land, water and some of Iraq's richest oil reserves.

Baghdad effort

In Baghdad, a crackdown that eventually will involve as many as 27,000 additional American and Iraqi troops began Wednesday. Despite opposition among the American public and in Congress to President Bush's plans to send more troops to Iraq, at least 5,000 more U.S. and Iraqi troops have joined the thousands already patrolling the streets of the capital.

The U.S. House on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Republicans blocked an effort to pass an identical resolution Saturday in the Senate.

Brig. Gen. Qassim Musawi, an Iraqi military spokesman, said that violence and crime in Baghdad had decreased by more than 80% and that at least 144 people had been detained in sweeps over the last three days.

A statement from Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's office said the plan also had resulted in the return of 107 displaced families to their homes. As many as 50,000 Iraqis are forced from their homes every month, joining 3.8 million others who have sought refuge elsewhere in the country or in neighboring states, according to the United Nations.

On Saturday, Rice met with Maliki, a Shiite; President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd; Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni; and others.

Iraq's religious and ethnic groups have been unable to agree on one of the most fundamental issues: how to share the country's oil resources. Lawmakers also have bickered over how to deal with onetime members of former President Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

"I'm told that the oil law is almost complete." Rice said. "I did say to my colleagues that I've heard it's almost complete before, and this time I hope it really is complete … because people are looking to see some elements of national reconciliation put into place. It's really critical."

Rice said U.S. commanders have told her that troop strength among Iraqi units in the Baghdad operation is as high as 90%. Initial reports had put them at about 50%.

But she reiterated that political progress would have to accompany any military advances.

"We've got to be sure not just to concentrate on the security plan…. The political side does need to keep pace."

Because of military action on the ground, Rice's plane circled above the city for half an hour before landing, according to the Associated Press.

In a 10-minute address in the Green Zone, Rice urged hundreds of American troops and U.S. Embassy staff members to be patient, saying they were engaged in a "noble cause."

"When you see Iraqis toiling and squabbling and struggling," she said, "remember it's not easy to build a democracy."

But she also said the Bush administration didn't have unlimited patience.

"The United States is investing a great deal, most especially the lives of our men and women in uniform, and the American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever," she said.

After meeting with Iraqi politicians and Western journalists, Rice flew by helicopter from the Green Zone to another U.S. military base, where she met Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq.

Iraqi authorities said Saturday that they had recovered five bodies in a Baghdad neighborhood just west of the Tigris River, significantly fewer than usual.

Marketplace targeted

DOJ_NMG_0133415

But bombers and gunmen attacked elsewhere in the country. The double car bombing in Kirkuk that killed six hit a marketplace in a predominantly Kurdish part of town.

The explosions ripped through residences and storefronts, setting fire to at least a dozen cars. A woman picked through the debris after the explosion, crying and screaming as she looked for her 12-year-old son.

Azad Mustafa, 28, said the explosion knocked him over as he stood in his shop.

"The scene was like doomsday," he said, "torn bodies everywhere, injured people screaming, burning cars."

The U.S. military said a Marine was killed Friday during combat in Al Anbar province, bringing the number of U.S. deaths in Iraq to at least 3,133, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks military casualties.

In Kut, gunmen shot an Iraqi police officer in front of his house.

In Hillah, police recovered two bodies.

Rice: U.S. Has Doubts On Iraq Democracy (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 18, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Iraqi government leaders Saturday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad as the U.S. Senate deadlocked on whether to repeat a symbolic rebuke that the U.S. House handed Bush on Friday when it opposed the administration's deployment of additional combat troops to Iraq.

Although Rice used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private.

Rice told Iraqi leaders that the Baghdad security operation needs to "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into the capital's major Shiite militia stronghold, the Iraqi official said.

The official said Rice told Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that the initial stage of the crackdown, which began Wednesday, appeared to focus on Sunni areas and had left Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia, nearly untouched.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to release the information to the media.

He said Rice stopped short of accusing the Iraqis of displaying pro-Shiite bias in the operation and said it appeared that the crackdown was going well.

Documents captured during a raid about a month ago show that al-Qaida in Iraq has a carefully planned strategy aimed at downing coalition aircraft using a variety of weapons, said a U.S. defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

The official said the documents provide fresh evidence that the al-Qaida insurgency is adapting and posing new threats to U.S. forces. The contents of the seized materials were summarized in an intelligence report analyzing recent helicopter crashes.

The New York Times, which first reported on the intelligence analysis, said militants want to concentrate on air forces. "Attacks on coalition aircraft probably will increase if helicopter missions expand during the latest phase of the Baghdad Security Plan or if insurgents seek to emulate their recent successes," the paper quoted the intelligence report as saying.

In the last month, at least six U.S. helicopters have gone down; five of the crashes were blamed on hostile ground fire. The deadliest was a Black Hawk hit by small arms fire on Jan. 20, killing all 12 soldiers aboard.

On Feb. 2, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowleged that ground fire has been more effective against U.S. helicopters recently. He said he didn't know "if this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

Stakes are high for the plan to bring down violence in Baghdad, both to encourage Iraqis to trust their government and police and to demonstrate progress to an American public increasingly fed up with the war.

Bush's approval rating stands at 32 percent, tied for his lowest standing in Associated Press-Ipsos polling, and most people in the United States find fault with his handling of the nearly four-year-old Iraq war.

"The United States is investing a great deal, most especially the lives of our men and women in uniform, and the American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever to see those results," Rice told reporters.

Although reports from the first day or two of the operation placed Iraqi force participation at 45 percent to 55 percent of full strength, Rice said commanders have told her that Iraqi participation is now as high as 85 percent to 90 percent.

She said the Iraqi government is meeting a test she had set for its commitment to the plan by ensuring that the rules of engagement for the joint forces are equitable and nonsectarian. She said Iraqi leaders are also ably describing and defending the plan to Iraqis.

Rice is the highest-ranking U.S. official to visit Iraq since last month's announcement of the security campaign. Her stop, coinciding with the congressional debate, appeared to reflect a calculation by the administration that focusing on potentially promising developments in Iraq was the best response to the congressional voting.

Meeting with a small group of troops and U.S. Embassy staff inside the old Saddam Hussein-era palace that serves as U.S. headquarters in the fortified Green Zone, Rice referenced the week of bitter debate on Capitol Hill.

"Some do not think that this was the right war to fight, and others think that we in the administration haven't fought this war quite right," but still support U.S. forces and others in harm's way.

"I keep hearing and reading the American people don't want to fight this war anymore. I don't think that's right. The American people want to know that we can succeed," Rice said.

The Bush administration so far has spent more than $350 billion on the war and reconstruction. More than 3,100 U.S. troops have died in the conflict. Bush's approval

Violence in Baghdad has dropped off sharply since the military push began earlier this week. U.S. military planners, however, caution that any attempt to stabilize Baghdad could take months and militants are not likely to leave without a fight.

Ten bodies were reported by the morgue in the capital on Friday, compared to an average of 40 to 50 per day common in recent months, as parts of Baghdad have descended into a lawless jumble of gang killings and sectarian payback.

New checkpoints have gone up around the city, creating long traffic jams as vehicles are searched. Iraqi tanks have pushed into areas where roaming gunmen and militant groups have ruled.

Rice's Iraq visit was a sidelight to a trip otherwise devoted to energizing stagnant peace efforts between Israel and the Palestinians.

That mission was complicated by last week's announced power-sharing pact between the U.S-backed Palestinian President and Hamas militants whom the Bush administration considers terrorists.

Rice will spend several days in Israel, the West Bank and Jordan before reporting on peace prospects at meetings in Europe.

Associated Press writer Katherine Shrader in Washington contributed to this report.

Rice Pushes Iraqis, Seeks To "See Results" (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Iraqi government leaders yesterday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Miss Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

Miss Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad as the U.S. Senate debated whether it would repeat a symbolic rebuke that the U.S. House handed Mr. Bush on Friday when it opposed the administration's deployment of additional combat troops to Iraq. Senate Republicans thwarted the move with a filibuster.

Although Miss Rice used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private.

Miss Rice told Iraqi leaders that the Baghdad security operation needs to "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into the capital's major Shi'ite militia stronghold, the Iraqi official said.

The official said Miss Rice told Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that the initial stage of the crackdown, which began Wednesday, appeared to focus on Sunni areas and had left Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia, nearly untouched.

The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to release the information to the media.

He said Miss Rice stopped short of accusing the Iraqis of displaying pro-Shi'ite bias in the operation and said it appeared that the crackdown was going well.

Stakes are high for the plan to bring down violence in Baghdad, both to encourage Iraqis to trust their government and police and to demonstrate progress to an American public increasingly fed up with the war.

"The United States is investing a great deal, most especially the lives of our men and women in uniform, and the American people want to see results and aren't prepared to wait forever to see those results," Miss Rice told reporters.

Although reports from the first day or two of the operation placed Iraqi force participation at 45 percent to 55 percent of full strength, Miss Rice said commanders have told her that Iraqi participation is now as high as 85 percent to 90 percent.

She said the Iraqi government is meeting a test she had set for its commitment to the plan by ensuring that the rules of engagement for the joint forces are equitable and nonsectarian. She said Iraqi leaders are also ably describing and defending the plan to Iraqis.

Miss Rice is the highest-ranking U.S. official to visit Iraq since last month's announcement of the security campaign. Her stop, coinciding with the congressional debate, appeared to reflect a calculation by the administration that focusing on potentially promising developments in Iraq was the best response to the congressional voting.

Violence in Baghdad has dropped off sharply since the military push began earlier last week. U.S. military planners, however, caution that any attempt to stabilize Baghdad could take months and militants are not likely to leave without a fight.

A twin bombing left 11 dead in northern Iraq and U.S. aircraft went in action yesterday against Sunni insurgents west of Baghdad.

The bombers struck in a Kurdish neighborhood of the oil city of Kirkuk, about 180 miles north of Baghdad, as streets were filled with cars and pedestrians.

Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area. Terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris. A restaurant owner lay screaming on the sidewalk, his body soaked with hot cooking oil after one of the blasts hurled him onto the curb.

Eleven persons were killed in the two blasts and 65 were wounded, police Brig. Gen. Sarhat Qader said. Sunni Arabs and Kurds have laid rival claims on Kirkuk and its oil wealth.

In Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of the capital, U.S. jets strafed gunmen after they ambushed a U.S. patrol, said 2nd Lt. Roger Hollenbeck, a Marine spokesman.

Hours later, U.S. aircraft destroyed a car with gunmen who were trying to escape after they attacked an Army patrol, Lt. Hollenbeck said.

Some U.S. officers think Sunni and Shi'ite extremists have fled Baghdad to avoid the crackdown, citing an increase in attacks in provinces that border the city.

Bomb Blasts Kill 11 In Northern Iraq (AP)

AP, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — A twin bombing left 11 dead in northern Iraq and U.S. aircraft went in action against Sunni insurgents west of Baghdad, as Iraqi officials claimed early success in the campaign to restore order in the capital.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice paid an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Saturday to discuss the security crackdown. She urged the Iraqis in a private meeting to "rise above sectarianism" and pursue Shiite as well as Sunni extremists, an Iraqi official said.

Rice also told Iraqi government leaders that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence.

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that some of the American people have ... if the Iraqi government doesn't do what it has said it will do," Rice said she told leaders from all of Iraq's factions.

The bombers struck in a Kurdish neighborhood of the oil city of Kirkuk, about 180 miles north of Baghdad, as streets were filled with cars and pedestrians on the main shopping day of the week.

Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area.

The back-to-back lasts shattered about 20 shops as terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris.

A total of 11 people were killed in the two blasts and 65 were wounded, police Brig. Gen. Sarhat Qader said. Sunni Arabs and Kurds have laid rival claims on Kirkuk and its vast oil wealth.

In Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of the capital, U.S. jets strafed gunmen with 40mm machine gun fire after they ambushed a U.S. patrol with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades, a Marine spokesman 2nd Lt. Roger Hollenbeck said.

Hours later, U.S. aircraft used precision weapons to destroy a car with gunmen who were trying to escape after they attacked a U.S. Army patrol with small arms fire, Hollenbeck said.

There were no U.S. casualties, but Hollenbeck said eight insurgents were killed — four in each attack.

The attacks north and west of the capital contrasted with a lull in major violence in Baghdad as U.S. and Iraqi forces try to regain control from sectarian militias and criminal gangs.

Some U.S. officers believe Sunni and Shiite extremists have fled Baghdad to avoid the crackdown, citing an increase in attacks in provinces that border the city.

The U.S. military said Saturday that a Marine was killed the day before during combat operations in Anbar province, which includes Ramadi. It was the first U.S. death reported since Wednesday when five soldiers were killed — all but one of them in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad.

Iraqi authorities said they foiled a would-be suicide attack near Karbala, about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south of Baghdad. A minivan came under fire after the driver failed to slowdown at a checkpoint, and then detonated the explosives and was killed in the blast, said Karbala police spokesman Rahman Mishawi. There were no other casualties.

In Baghdad, however, much of the gunfire appeared to come from Iraqi police firing weapons in the air to clear the way for their convoys speeding through the city. Police and soldiers searched cars at the numerous checkpoints.

On Palestine Street, a main thoroughfare in east Baghdad, police commandos with armored personnel carriers manned dozens of checkpoints — some only about 100 meters (yards) apart. In Waziriyah, a Sunni area of northeast Baghdad, cranes set concrete blast barriers into place to block would-be suicide bombers.

American paratroopers from the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division joined Iraqi soldiers in a sweep through a mostly Sunni neighborhood in the center of the capital. U.S. Apache helicopters flew overhead, and a U.S. jet streaked low across the sky in a show of force.

Although the Baghdad operation has been in full-swing only four days, Iraqi authorities have already begun heralding it as a major success.

Iraqi spokesman Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi told reporters that "crimes and terrorist attacks" had dropped by 80% since the long-awaited security operation began in force last Wednesday.

Police said the bodies of only five apparent victims of sectarian death squads were found in Saturday across the capital — in contrast to the scores that were recovered daily in the weeks before the crackdown.

U.S. officials, however, have been more cautious, saying it's too early to declare success.

But Sunni politicians have complained that the initial raids have focused on Sunni neighborhoods, sparing Shiite hotspots such as Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army of anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sunnis blame the Mahdi Army for much of the sectarian violence which has rocked Baghdad for nearly a year and for forcing thousands of Sunni families from their homes. Shiites insist the greater threat comes from Sunni extremists including al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Al-Sadr is a close ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The Shiite prime minister convinced al-Sadr to remove many of his armed militiamen from the streets to avoid a showdown with the Americans.

But many Sunni politicians believe al-Maliki is still reluctant to sanction a major military operation against al-Sadr's followers in the capital.

During a private meeting with Iraqi leaders, Rice said the Shiite-led government must "rise above sectarianism" and noted that no U.S. or Iraqi forces have yet moved into Sadr City, according to an Iraqi official familiar with the discussions.

The Iraqis, however, told her that the Mahdi Army and al-Sadr had been losing influence and were cooperating with authorities on security issues, the official said. The Iraqis said they did not want to "waste our resources in a place that's stable," the official added.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to release the information to the media.

He said Rice stopped short of accusing the Iraqis of displaying pro-Shiite bias in the operation and said it appeared that the crackdown was going well.

Documents captured during a raid about a month ago show that al-Qaeda in Iraq has a carefully planned strategy aimed at downing coalition aircraft using a variety of weapons, said a U.S. defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

The official said the documents provide fresh evidence that the al-Qaeda insurgency is adapting and posing new threats to U.S. forces. The contents of the seized materials were summarized in an intelligence report analyzing recent helicopter crashes.

The New York Times, which first reported on the intelligence analysis, said militants want to concentrate on air forces.

In the last month, at least six U.S. helicopters have gone down; five of the crashes were blamed on hostile ground fire. The deadliest was a Black Hawk hit by small arms fire on Jan. 20, killing all 12 soldiers aboard.

On Feb. 2, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowleged that ground fire has been more effective against U.S. helicopters recently.

Associated Press reporters Yahya Barzanji in Kirkuk and Hamza Hendawi and Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Planning Seen In Iraqi Attacks On U.S. Copters (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, David S. Cloud

DOJ_NMG_0133419

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — Documents captured from Iraqi insurgents indicate that some of the recent fatal attacks against American helicopters are a result of a carefully planned strategy to focus on downing coalition aircraft, one that American officials say has been carried out by mounting coordinated assaults with machine guns, rockets and surface-to-air missiles.

The documents, said to have been drafted by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, show that the militants were preparing to "concentrate on the air force." The contents of the documents are described in an American intelligence report that was reviewed by The New York Times.

Seized near Baghdad, the documents reflect the insurgents' military preparations from late last year, including plans for attacking aircraft using a variety of weapons.

Officials say they are a fresh indication that the United States is facing an array of "adaptive" adversaries in Iraq, enemies who are likely to step up their attacks as American forces expand their efforts to secure Baghdad, the Iraqi capital.

"Attacks on coalition aircraft probably will increase if helicopter missions expand during the latest phase of the Baghdad Security Plan or if insurgents seek to emulate their recent successes," notes the intelligence report, which analyzes the recent helicopter crashes.

The American military has said that seven helicopters have been downed since Jan. 20, a figure that exceeds the total number of coalition aircraft shot down in 2006.

After downing the helicopters, the insurgents often laid ambushes for the American ground troops they expected to come to the rescue, sometimes using roadside bombs that they placed in advance. American troops were attacked in five instances in which they rushed to the scene of aircraft that had been shot down, military officials said.

The intelligence report supports the concerns expressed by an American general this month that militants were adapting their tactics in an effort to step up attacks against helicopters. Such strikes have increased since the United States expanded its military operations in Baghdad in August. From December to January, the number of antiaircraft attacks rose by 17 percent, according to an American military report.

Insurgents in Iraq have boasted about the helicopter downings and posted video of some of the wreckage on militant Web sites. While Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has claimed it has "new ways" to shoot down the aircraft, some American analysts believe they are probably not employing new types of weapons but rather are making more effective use of arms already in their inventory.

The insurgents try to plan their attacks by studying flight patterns near American bases and along supply routes, according to the intelligence report.

In several recent helicopter downings, the attackers used a variety of weapons, including shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles, heavy machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and unguided rockets that cannot be diverted by the flares helicopters disperse to fool heat-seeking systems.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which the intelligence report says leads the insurgent group known as the Islamic State of Iraq, has claimed responsibility for shooting down three of the helicopters. Those helicopters were downed near Taji, Karma and in Diyala Province.

While the captured documents point to careful planning, it is not entirely clear whether this is an effort by some of the militant commanders in those areas or a nationwide strategy by the group.

Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, a deputy commander of the American-led multinational force in Iraq and an Army aviator, told reporters this week that multiple weapons systems had been used against American troops before, in attacks south of Baghdad last year.

"This is not a new tactic," he said. "But it is the first time that we have seen it employed in several months."

"We are engaged with a thinking enemy," he added. "This enemy understands based on the reporting and everything else that we are in the process of executing the prime minister's new plan for the security of Baghdad. And they understand the strategic implications of shooting down an aircraft."

He said that American commanders in Iraq have met to consider how to counter the shift in insurgent tactics, but he refused to discuss specifics.

General Simmons said the American military had not concluded whether a single militant cell was behind the attacks. Some of the attacks have been described by American intelligence as "opportunistic," meaning insurgents are simply firing at helicopters when they seen them.

American helicopters are being used extensively as American troops try to avoid the bombs hidden along streets and roads. Low-flying aircraft are also vulnerable when they pass over urban areas. In 2005, American Army helicopters flew 240,000 hours. In 2007, Army helicopters are expected to fly more than 400,000 hours, military officials said.

General Simmons had a firsthand look at opportunistic tactics on Jan. 25, when he was in one of a group of helicopters that was fired on near Hit in Anbar Province. In that attack, a Black Hawk helicopter in the group was stuck by automatic weapons fire after the helicopters flew near some militants who appeared to be removing or bringing arms to a weapons cache.

The damaged Black Hawk helicopter was forced to land. The helicopter General Simmons was in landed and picked up the crew, and the Marines sent a quick-reaction force to protect the aircraft, which was later brought to the American base at Asad.

"I've got firsthand knowledge on that one," General Simmons said. "We stumbled upon them, and they engaged us with what they had, and they got lucky."

Military officials say another opportunistic downing was the attack on an Apache helicopter near Najaf on Jan. 28 that killed both of the crew members. It occurred when the aircraft was sent to reinforce American and Iraqi troops. The officials also noted that the attack was the only recent instance in which a Shiite group — in this case, the Soldiers of Heaven — was responsible for shooting down a helicopter.

The Feb. 7 attack on a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight transport helicopter near Karma, an insurgent stronghold near Falluja, was initially attributed by military officials to mechanical problems. But this week they acknowledged it had been downed by hostile fire, most likely a shoulder-fired missile and heavy-caliber machine-gun fire.

In the video posted on the Internet by the Islamic State of Iraq, the Sea Knight is seen flying toward the camera. Then it banks to the right and turns a half-circle. An object darts into the screen from the right, trailed by a curl of black smoke. Moments after the object enters the frame, an explosion rips through the helicopter, which falls to the ground in flames.

Gen. James Conway, the Marine Corps commandant, confirmed Friday that the video seemed genuine. General Conway also told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the CH-46's defensive systems intended to shield the aircraft from missiles "did not properly deploy" when it came under attack from the ground.

The CH-46 did not release flares, which fire automatically and are intended to fool a heat-seeking missile into flying away from the aircraft. Nor did the helicopter take defensive maneuvers, which military officials said suggested that the pilots did not see the missile before they were hit.

Col. Dave Lapan, a Marine spokesman, said investigators were looking into whether the flare system malfunctioned or whether there had been other reasons the system failed, including "environmental factors," and whether the missile had characteristics that prevented it from being detected.

The recent spate of helicopter attacks began Jan. 20 with the shooting of a Black Hawk in Diyala Province that killed 12 soldiers on board. Three days later, a helicopter operated by the Blackwater security company crashed, leading to the deaths of five civilian contractors, including one thought to have been killed by militants surviving the crash. On Jan. 25, the Black Hawk helicopter in General Simmons's group was forced to land near Hit, but there were no casualties.

Two American crew members were killed in the Apache helicopter downing near Najaf on Jan. 28. On Jan. 31, a helicopter carrying civilian contractors was hit by small-arms fire near Baghdad and forced to land, but there were no casualties. On Feb. 2, two Americans were killed when their Apache was shot down in a coordinated attack. Seven marines died in the Sea Knight downing near Karma on Feb. 7.

Iran's Chance: U.S. Troubles In Iraq Create Opening For Regional Shift (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 17 — In recent weeks, President Bush and American military officials have increasingly accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's affairs. But from Iran's perspective, given its longstanding interests in Iraq, it is the United States that is meddling in its backyard, analysts inside and outside of Iran say.

From the very start of the American occupation of Iraq, at least some in the Bush administration saw an opportunity to curtail the influence of Iran's radical Shiite leaders by producing an alternative, moderate center of Shiite Islam that would effectively neuter Tehran in ideological, political and strategic terms.

This was abundantly clear to Iran's clerical rulers, whose paramount priority since they seized power in 1979 has been to preserve their revolution and their grip on their own country.

Faced with more than 100,000 American troops next door and a White House that pursued a policy of pre-emptive war, Iran's leaders moved quickly to try to prevent the United States from gaining a permanent foothold.

"Iran's policy in Iraq works to prevent the U.S. from feeling safe and secure," said Talal Atrissi, a researcher and writer on Middle Eastern affairs based in Lebanon. "It works to prevent the formation of a pro-American Iraqi government, in favor of at least an Iraqi government that does not feel enmity toward Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0133421

While the United States sees in Iraq a venture that will affect its foreign interests for years to come, Iran sees an occupied neighbor with close religious, cultural, political and economic ties. Though Iran is Persian while Iraq is Arab, both have majority Shiite populations that have mingled, religiously and culturally, for centuries.

"We have been there for thousands of years," said Reza Alavi, a historian and a former managing editor of the Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review, who said his own grandfather — like many Iranian Shiites — was buried in the Iraqi holy city of Najaf.

Mr. Atrissi said: "The Iranian historic, religious, economic ties with Iraq make Iran keen on preventing the U.S. being the sole authority in Iraq. They feel a duty to preserve these ties, and to protect their national security, which is threatened by the U.S. presence in Iraq."

In strategic terms, America's failure to secure its position in Iraq has presented Tehran with a rare opportunity to recalibrate the balance of power in a neighborhood that had long been hostile to its aspirations.

Before Sept. 11, 2001, Iran was virtually surrounded by the Sunni-dominated states of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan, with Turkey, a NATO member, on its northern flank.

Now, with the initial rout of the Taliban in Afghanistan and the ouster of Saddam Hussein, its most powerful and fearsome competitors, Iran is trying to assert itself as the dominant regional power.

In defiance of the United Nations Security Council, the Iranian government has proceeded with a nuclear program that it says is for peaceful purposes, but that the West says is aimed at developing weapons. Iran has strengthened ties with Syria, built the militia Hezbollah into a state within a state in Lebanon and offered support to the radical Palestinian group Hamas.

But the cornerstone to its regional plans lies in Baghdad.

In economic terms, Iran has an interest in a stable, Tehran-friendly Iraq. For decades, while Mr. Hussein was in power, Iraq was an economic obstacle for Iran, a wall blocking trading routes and diplomatic ties with its Arab neighbors.

The chaos in Iraq still means that Iran's trade with Syria has to be routed through Turkey. But Iranian officials say they hope someday to link the railroads of Iran and Syria with Iraq's, redrawing the economics of the region.

But Tehran's interests in Iraq cut much deeper than the economic. They range from its ideological desire to spread its influence throughout the Arab world — part of the so-called Shiite revival — to its connection to the people and holy sites of Iraq.

"Iran and Iraq's national interests are intertwined," said Farzaneh Roostaee, foreign editor of Shargh, a popular reformist daily in Iran that the government shut down late last year. "Both geographically and religiously, the two countries have many common interests. No matter how much Americans try, they can not separate these two countries from one another. It won't work."

The connections extend to the political sphere, as well. Iraq's two dominant Shiite parties, Dawa and the Supreme Council for the Iraqi Islamic Revolution, or Sciri, have deep roots in Iran, where many Shiite leaders fled to escape Mr. Hussein's violent repression of Shiites, which intensified after the Iranian revolution.

Several top Dawa leaders, including Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and a former prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, along with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of Sciri, lived for years in Iran before returning to Iraq after the American invasion. Sciri was founded in Iran in 1984, and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, fought with Iran in the long, bitter war with Iraq in the 1980s.

The militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr travels frequently to Iran; American officials said he went there this week to escape the security crackdown in Baghdad, though Shiite officials disputed that. And Mr. Sadr's potent militia, the Mahdi Army, is said to have received training from the Iranians.

There are deep spiritual connections, too, centered in Najaf and Karbala, the Iraqi cities which have for centuries been central to the Shiite faith. Long before the Iranian city of Qum grew into a hub of Islamic learning, Najaf was the center of thinking for the Shiite faithful. In the early 1900s, the religious scholars in Najaf effectively exported what came to be known as Iran's constitutional revolution.

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini lived in Najaf for 12 years during his exile before returning to lead the overthrow of the shah of Iran and the installation of the clerical system. It is believed that Imam Ali, the son-in-law and cousin of the Prophet Muhammad, is buried there, and his tomb is a leading site for Shiite pilgrims.

Karbala resonates throughout Shiite ideology and faith as the site of the martyrdom of Hussein, the grandson of the prophet, and his followers at the hands of a far larger Sunni army. His tomb is in Karbala, and his death in battle is central to Shiite notions of justice, self-sacrifice and opposition to oppression.

The religious centers are so important to Iranians that legions of them still visit the shrines even amid the chaos and bloodshed in Iraq today.

"There are still a lot of lower-middle-class Iranians who want to go to Iraq," said Mr. Alavi in Iran. "It is a really big deal to them. They want to go, as they say, to 'kiss the feet of Imam Hussein.' "

DOJ_NMG_0133422

Those links to Iran's religious and revolutionary identity, combined with the presence of American troops in Iraq and thousands of NATO forces in Afghanistan, are more than enough justification for Iran to try to counter American influence next door, political analysts in the region said.

"It is not logical to have an American presence in Iraq, and Iran sitting passively, waiting for the formation of an anti-Iranian Iraqi government," Mr. Atrissi said. "From the Iranian perspective, Iran is a country defending its national security."

"Rogue" Shi'ite Militias Using Iranian Bombs (WT)

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

Lethal Iranian bomb technology spotlighted by U.S. officials in Iraq last week is being used by rogue elements of Shi'ite militias that are not under any kind of central command, the U.S. military says.

The evidence presented at a briefing in Baghdad last week further confuses an enemy landscape in which death is as likely to come at the hands of government-allied Shi'ite militias as from disgruntled former Ba'athist extremists and their al Qaeda allies.

U.S. military officials think members of Shi'ite militias -- most of which have links with both Iran and Iraq's Shi'ite-led government -- are receiving and using the "explosively formed penetrators" (EFPs), or shaped bomb charges. Officials say the EFPs have killed about 170 coalition troops in the past two years -- many of those in recent months.

"Our intelligence has assessed that they are Shia rogue elements of illegal armed groups," Lt. Col. Christopher Garver told The Washington Times in an e-mail interview from Baghdad.

"The primary user is a radical splinter element within Jaysh al-Mahdi that has more than likely been perpetrating a majority of the attacks," he said.

Jaysh al-Mahdi is the formal name for the Mahdi's Army militia, the armed following of the radical Shi'ite cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr. The sheik's political party has 30 seats in parliament, and he is a major political backer of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The other principal Shi'ite militia is the Badr Brigade, linked to the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which is a major partner in the ruling coalition.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said Thursday that Sheik al-Sadr had ordered the heads of his Mahdi's Army militia to leave Iraq.

"I think many of his top Mahdi Army officials have been ordered to leave Iraq to make the mission of the security forces easier," said a statement issued in the president's name by his office.

According to a document purportedly smuggled out of the prime minister's office, Mr. al-Maliki last month advised Shi'ite militia leaders to retreat to Iran and southern Iraq until the current U.S.-led security push is over.

The U.S. Embassy told The Times that the Iraqi government had declared the document a fake.

Tom Donnelly, a defense and security-policy analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, said Sheik al-Sadr is "both inside and outside the tent, and sometimes he is a useful ally and sometimes a hated enemy of the prime minister."

Sunni insurgents and disgruntled former Ba'athists, sometimes working with al Qaeda in Iraq, have long been blamed for most of the attacks on U.S. forces as well as waves of spectacular suicide attacks that have killed thousands of Shi'ites.

Bruce Reidel, senior fellow at the Saban Center of the Brookings Institution, said that roughly 90 percent of the anti-U.S. action to date had been from Sunni insurgents, but evidence pointed to a recent increase in Shi'ite attacks.

"The al Qaeda types hate us, but they also hate the Shi'ites. Sometimes other Sunni traditional clans and sheiks are enemies, but sometimes we are their only protectors from Shi'ite reprisals," Mr. Donnelly said.

Col. Garver said the United States had seen "crude attempts" by other illegal armed groups and al Qaeda to copy the Iranian EFP technology, but that the resulting weapons were "not nearly as precise or lethal."

In addition to killing more than 170 coalition troops, the Iranian technology has wounded more than 620 since 2004, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad on Wednesday.

Syrian President In Iran To Discuss Iraq (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

Syrian President Bashar Assad arrived in Iran Saturday to discuss Iraq and other Middle East issues with President Mahmoud Ahmadinajed, state-run television reported.

Assad was given a red-carpet welcome at the Presidential Palace in Tehran, the report said.

The United States has accused both Iran and Syria of not doing enough to stop militants from crossing from these countries into Iraq to join the insurgency. Both have rejected the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0133423

This is Assad's fifth visit to Iran since he took office in 2000.

Iran and Syria have long been close allies. During the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war, Syria was the only Arab country that supported Iran.

The Iran Options (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S actions toward Iran are consistent with two very different underlying strategies. Both start with a correct reading of Iran's behavior at home and in the region as dangerous to U.S. interests and to the prospects for peace and democracy in the Middle East. Both mix pressure -- economic, rhetorical, military -- with diplomatic overtures. In one scenario, these are employed with the hope of success. In the other they are employed with the hope of success but an expectation of failure, in which case military force would be brought to bear with a justification that every other reasonable approach had been tried.

We have seen no evidence that the administration has Option B in mind, but it's plausible enough to merit stating that such a course for this president would be folly. There is much speculation in Washington about how Mr. Bush views his "legacy": about how he ostensibly wouldn't want to kick the Iran problem to his successor as he believes President Bill Clinton left North Korea to him, or to be known as the president who invaded the country without nukes while allowing the two other "axis of evil" nations to go nuclear. Concern about historical judgment is natural, but it should play no part in such decisions.

What Tehran Is Really Up To (WP)

By Daniel L. Byman

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Reports that Iran is arming various factions in Iraq are about as surprising as claims that Mafia members have been seen in Las Vegas casinos. Iran has been meddling in its neighbors' affairs for a long time, and not just in Iraq. Teheran has trained terrorist and guerrilla groups in Bosnia, Lebanon and Palestine, all of which are far from Iran.

So when U.S. military officials displayed explosively formed penetrators (EFPs), rocket-propelled grenades and other weapons that they say Iran provided to Shiite militias in Iraq, we have to recognize that this was no big departure for the Iranians.

As President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged last week, finding Iranian arms in Iraq does not prove the more important, and harder to make, argument that Iran is ordering its Iraqi proxies to attack U.S. troops. It may seem absurd to give Iran the benefit of the doubt, in light of its sorry track record on nuclear proliferation and support for radicalism in general, but we can't understand what Iran is up to without an appreciation for its broader Iraq strategy, which goes well beyond Tehran's desire to undermine U.S. policy. Iranian leaders calculate that they will need formidable proxies should the United States leave, and indeed Iran will face many challenges in Iraq if U.S. forces depart.

So why would Iran arm Iraqis and perhaps direct attacks on U.S. forces? For most Iranians, Iraq is an emotional issue. They see the daily suffering of Iraqis, both from the chaos in Iraq in general and at the hands of Sunni suicide bombers. They empathize with their fellow Shiites in Iraq, with whom they have historic ties and shared religious traditions. Though they rejoice over the downfall of Saddam Hussein (Iran suffered hundreds of thousands of casualties in the bitter war of 1980-88, which Hussein launched against it) they blame the United States for the violence that has swept Iraq since Hussein fell.

Iran worries about the United States. When Ayatollah Khomeini took power in the 1979 Islamic revolution, he made anti-Americanism a core of the new regime's foreign policy. The United States has been hostile ever since, even tilting toward Iraq during its war with Iran. The United States and Iran have not had diplomatic relations since 1979, and have periodically confronted each other.

In the decade before 9/11, Iran structured its military forces to fight America, even when the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf region was confined to the conservative oil states of the Arabian peninsula. Since 9/11, the United States has occupied Iraq with more than 100,000 troops, put significant forces in Afghanistan and Central Asia, and strengthened its security relationship with Pakistan. Iran perceives itself as surrounded. The United States has repeatedly made threats against the Iranian regime, has refused to surrender anti-regime Iranian terrorists found in Iraq, organized international economic pressure on the country, led a diplomatic effort to deny Iran the right to develop nuclear energy and nuclear weapons, and pointedly included military force against Iran as an option after dispatching two aircraft carriers to the Persian Gulf region-- hostile steps, in Iranian eyes, that reinforce paranoia.

Tehran does not want the secular and pro-Western Iraq that America dreams of, and it wants to ensure that the U.S. doctrine of preventive regime change is dead. So far, developments in Iraq have worked out in Iran's favor -- indeed, Iran appears to be the one state that is winning this war. Iraq is too weak to pose a military threat to Iran for years and perhaps decades to come. The democratic procedures that the United States imposed on Iraq put in power Shiite leaders who are far friendlier to Tehran than to Washington.

Iran is less nervous than it was in 2003, but it remains understandably anxious. The long-term role of U.S. forces and the future of the Shiite regime in Iraq are open questions. Instability in Iraq could lead to waves of refugees returning to Iran, as happened during the Iran-Iraq war, and could excite unrest among Iran's Kurdish and Arab populations. Expecting an American withdrawal sooner or later, Iran wants to prepare for a postwar era by maximizing its influence now.

The United States focuses on how Iran's arming of its Iraqi proxies hurts U.S. interests, but this is hardly Iran's only concern. The Iraqi Shiite groups that have received arms may be more loyal to Iran after American forces depart. Even more important, they will be stronger than their Iraqi rivals. In Lebanon, Iran helped build Hezbollah from disparate small Shiite movements, welding it together against rivals in the Shiite community and, over time, making it stronger than non-Shiite groups. The goal is the same in Iraq.

Many Iranian leaders, particularly the president and the emerging conservative political elite, are profoundly anti-American. They want the United States to fail in Iraq and elsewhere, and they share an ideological bond with many radical Iraqi groups. So it is not surprising that Iran works with its closest Shiite proxies in Iraq, providing them with EFPs and other weapons that make them far more capable of fighting U.S. forces. Other Iranian elites have more complex feelings about the United States, though none is favorable, and Iranians want to bury the doctrine of regime change. Even if Iranians do not control the attacks, Iran knows that some of the people it trains and equips may at some point be involved in anti-American operations, thus keeping the heat on U.S. forces.

But Iran could easily be even more aggressive in Iraq. Tehran could provide sophisticated weapons to a wider range of Iraqi groups than it reportedly has so far. Iran's Shiite proxies do at times attack American forces, but their principal targets are Sunni militias. They could kill a lot more Americans than they have. Iran could be encouraging them to convert relatively peaceful parts of Iraq into battlefields similar to the wildest parts of Anbar province.

Iraq's Shiites are not Iran's only interest. Tehran also has a long history of working with (and also against) various Kurdish groups. Iran recognizes theIraqi Kurds as the strongest and most organized military force in the country, and has cultivated good relations with Kurdish leaders. Iran has its own restive Kurdish population, and wants to ensure that its Kurds don't use bases in Iraq or otherwise exploit the conflict to advance their own sectarian interests.

Iran also has a history of cultivating Sunnis when doing so seemed advantageous. It has reached out to a range of revolutionary Sunni groups and has good ties to Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Hamas and other organizations whose ideology is closer to Osama Bin Laden's than to Khomeini's. The 9/11 commission found that Iran had engaged in low-level tactical cooperation with Sunni militants linked to al-Qaeda. And Tehran can be intensely practical. During the Iran-Iraq war, Iran worked with Israel and the United States to gain much-needed weapons. Dealing with the Sunnis may follow a similar logic, though mutual suspicion will limit the extent of relations.

Ironically, Iran's long-term position could weaken when the United States draws down its forces. At first, the U.S. withdrawal will expand the power vacuum and Iran will try to fill it, but the limited chaos Iran foments can easily become uncontrolled. Iran's economic and military power is limited, and Iran's theocratic model of governance has little appeal for most Iraqis. Even many Shiite militants have at times been hostile to Iran, and respected moderates such as Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani are careful to maintain their distance from Tehran. Sunnis already rage against perceived Iranian dominance.

In a postwar environment, Tehran will have lost a lever against U.S. pressure and may find itself both overextended and vulnerable in Iraq -- a weakness that the United States might exploit in years to come.

Oh What A Malleable War (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

MAYBE the Bush White House can't conduct a war, but no one has ever impugned its ability to lie about its conduct of a war. Now even that well-earned reputation for flawless fictionalizing is coming undone. Watching the administration try to get its story straight about Iran's role in Iraq last week was like watching third graders try to sidestep blame for misbehaving while the substitute teacher was on a bathroom break. The team that once sold the country smoking guns in the shape of mushroom clouds has completely lost its mojo.

Surely these guys can do better than this. No sooner did unnamed military officials unveil their melodramatically secretive briefing in Baghdad last Sunday than Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, blew the whole charade. General Pace said he didn't know about the briefing and couldn't endorse its contention that the Iranian government's highest echelons were complicit in anti-American hostilities in Iraq. Public-relations pandemonium ensued as Tony Snow, the State Department and finally the president tried to revise the story line on the fly. Back when Karl Rove ruled, everyone read verbatim from the same script. Last week's frantic improvisations were vintage Scooter Libby, at best the ur-text for a future perjury trial.

Yet for all the sloppy internal contradictions, the most incriminating indictment of the new White House disinformation campaign is to be found in official assertions made more than a year ago. The press and everyone else seems to have forgotten that the administration has twice sounded the same alarms about Iranian weaponry in Iraq that it did last week.

In August 2005, NBC News, CBS News and The Times cited unnamed military and intelligence officials when reporting, as CBS put it, that "U.S. forces intercepted a shipment from Iran containing professionally made explosive devices specifically designed to penetrate the armor which protects American vehicles." Then, as now, those devices were the devastating roadside bombs currently called E.F.P.'s (explosively formed penetrators). Then, as now, they were thought to have been brought into Iraq by members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard. Then, as now, there was no evidence that the Iranian government was directly involved. In February 2006, administration officials delivered the same warning yet again, before the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Timing is everything in propaganda, as in all showmanship. So why would the White House pick this particular moment to mount such an extravagant rerun of old news, complete with photos and props reminiscent of Colin Powell's infamous presentation of prewar intelligence? Yes, the death toll from these bombs is rising, but it has been rising for some time. (Also rising, and more dramatically, is the death toll from attacks on American helicopters.)

After General Pace rendered inoperative the first official rationale for last Sunday's E.F.P. briefing, President Bush had to find a new explanation for his sudden focus on the Iranian explosives. That's why he said at Wednesday's news conference that it no longer mattered whether the Iranian government (as opposed to black marketeers or freelance thugs) had supplied these weapons to Iraqi killers. "What matters is, is that they're there," he said. The real point of hyping this inexact intelligence was to justify why he had to take urgent action now, no matter what the E.F.P.'s provenance: "My job is to protect our troops. And when we find devices that are in that country that are hurting our troops, we're going to do something about it, pure and simple."

Darn right! But if the administration has warned about these weapons twice in the past 18 months (and had known "that they're there," we now know, since 2003), why is Mr. Bush just stepping up to that job at this late date? Embarrassingly enough, The Washington Post reported on its front page last Monday — the same front page with news of the Baghdad E.F.P. briefing — that there is now a shortfall of "thousands of advanced Humvee armor kits designed to reduce U.S. troop deaths from roadside bombs." Worse, the full armor upgrade "is not scheduled to be completed until this summer." So Mr. Bush's idea of doing something about it, "pure and simple" is itself a lie, since he is doing something about it only after he has knowingly sent a new round of underarmored American troops into battle.

To those who are most suspicious of this White House, the "something" that Mr. Bush really wants to do has little to do with armor in any case. His real aim is to provoke war with Iran, no matter how overstretched and ill-equipped our armed forces may be for that added burden. By this line of thinking, the run-up to the war in Iraq is now repeating itself exactly and Mr. Bush will seize any handy casus belli he can to ignite a conflagration in Iran.

Iran is an unquestionable menace with an Israel-hating fanatic as its president. It is also four times the size of Iraq and a far more dangerous adversary than was Saddam's regime. Perhaps Mr. Bush is as reckless as his harshest critics claim and will double down on catastrophe. But for those who don't hold quite so pitch-black a view of his intentions, there's a less apocalyptic motive to be considered as well.

Let's not forget that the White House's stunt of repackaging old, fear-inducing news for public consumption has a long track record. Its reason for doing so is always the same: to distract the public from reality that runs counter to the White House's political interests. When the Democrats were gaining campaign traction in 2004, John Ashcroft held an urgent news conference to display photos of seven suspected terrorists on the loose. He didn't bother to explain that six of them had been announced previously, one at a news conference he had held 28 months earlier. Mr. Bush played the same trick last February as newly declassified statistics at a Senate hearing revealed a steady three-year growth in insurgent attacks: he breathlessly announced a thwarted Qaeda plot against the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles that had already been revealed by the administration four months before.

We know what Mr. Bush wants to distract us from this time: Congressional votes against his war policy, the Libby trial, the Pentagon inspector general's report deploring Douglas Feith's fictional prewar intelligence, and the new and dire National Intelligence Estimate saying that America is sending troops into the cross-fire of a multifaceted sectarian cataclysm.

That same intelligence estimate also says that Iran is "not likely to be a major driver of violence" in Iraq, but no matter. If the president can now whip up a Feith-style smoke screen of innuendo to imply that Iran is the root of all our woes in the war — and give "the enemy" a single recognizable face (Ahmadinejad as the new Saddam) — then, ipso facto, he is not guilty of sending troops into the middle of a shadowy Sunni-Shiite bloodbath after all.

Oh what a malleable war Iraq has been. First it was waged to vanquish Saddam's (nonexistent) nuclear arsenal and his (nonexistent) collaboration with Al Qaeda. Then it was going to spread (nonexistent) democracy throughout the Middle East. Now it is being rebranded as a fight against Tehran. Mr. Bush keeps saying that his saber rattling about Iran is not "a pretext for war." Maybe so, but at the very least it's a pretext for prolonging the disastrous war we already have.

What makes his spin brazen even by his standards is that Iran is in fact steadily extending its influence in Iraq — thanks to its alliance with the very Iraqi politicians that Mr. Bush himself has endorsed. In December the president welcomed a Shiite leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, to the White House with great fanfare; just three weeks later American forces had to raid Mr. Hakim's Iraq compound to arrest Iranian operatives suspected of planning attacks against American military forces, possibly with E.F.P.'s. As if that weren't bad enough, Nuri al-Maliki's government promptly overruled the American arrests and ordered the operatives' release so they could escape to Iran. For all his bluster about doing something about it, Mr. Bush did nothing.

It gets worse. This month we learned that yet another Maliki supporter in the Iraqi Parliament, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the murderous 1983 attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait. He's now in Iran, but before leaving, this terrorist served as a security adviser, no less, to the first Iraqi prime minister after the American invasion, Ibrahim al-Jafaari. Mr. Jafaari, hailed by Mr. Bush as "a strong partner for peace and freedom" during his own White House visit in 2005, could be found last week in Tehran, celebrating the anniversary of the 1979 Iranian revolution and criticizing America's arrest of Iranian officials in Iraq.

Even if the White House still had its touch for spinning fiction, it's hard to imagine how it could create new lies brilliant enough to top the sorry truth. When you have a president making a big show of berating Iran while simultaneously empowering it, you've got another remake of "The Manchurian Candidate," this time played for keeps.

Why Iran "Meddles" In Iraq (LAT)

By Adam Shatz

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

THIS TIME AROUND, when the Bush administration presented "intelligence" from unidentified sources about a dangerous foe in the Middle East, the American media was noticeably more skeptical. Eager to redeem themselves for the generally obsequious reporting about Saddam Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction and ties to Al Qaeda, journalists don't want to get fooled again as the administration lays the groundwork for a possible war against Iran.

But even though journalists have quite rightly raised questions about the credibility of the intelligence and the motives behind its release, they have failed to take the next step and examine the fundamental underlying premise behind the administration's accusations: that Iran's role in Iraq is inappropriate.

Take, for instance, the New York Times' Feb. 13 editorial, "Iran and the Nameless Briefers." While demanding that President Bush "make his intentions toward Iran clear," warning against "another disastrous war" and questioning the administration's assertion (since retracted) that "the highest levels of the Iranian government" authorized the sale of armor-piercing explosives to militants in Iraq, the paper added, as if it were self-evident: "We have no doubt of Iran's malign intentions. Iran is defying the Security Council's order to halt its nuclear activities, and it is certainly meddling inside Iraq."

Let's be clear: Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, with his disgraceful Holocaust denial conference and incendiary strutting, cuts an unsavory profile, to say the least. And since the collapse of the Iranian reform movement, hard-liners have shrewdly exploited Bush's threats, jailing intellectuals with contacts in the West.

Still, is it fair to characterize Iran's involvement in Iraq as "malign," or, for that matter, as "meddling" (in contrast, say, to the presence of 130,000 American troops in Iraq)? Might Iran have legitimate interests in what is, after all, its own geographic neighborhood?

Could it be that Iran's stake in Iraq is solidly grounded in the same realist principles that drive the behavior of most nations, rather than in "malign intentions" or a desire to export the Islamic revolution?

If Iran wants to see a friendly government established in Iraq, it hardly lacks for reasons. Unlike the United States, Iran was attacked by Iraq, back when Hussein's regime enjoyed American support as a bulwark against Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's revolution. Hundreds of thousands of Iranians died during the Iran-Iraq war (1980-88). When Iraq used poison gas against Iranian troops, the United States uttered not a single protest.

Not surprisingly, Iran wants to ensure that no government in Iraq will threaten it again. That's why Iran made no secret of its joy over Hussein's downfall, but it also refuses to accept a potentially hostile American base in the Persian Gulf or to cede absolute control over Iraq's future to the United States.

Iran also sees itself as a protector of Shiite interests in the region — and is, with a mixture of gratitude and wariness, viewed as such by Shiites from the gulf to Lebanon to Pakistan. Iraq's Shiite majority, though Arab and nationalist, is linked to Iran's Shiites through both family and religious ties. It was in Tehran that many of the Iraqi Shiite parties in power today found sanctuary from Hussein's agents; many Iraqi clerics studied in Iran, and some — most notably Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani — were born in Iran. Every Iraqi Shiite politician must pay his respects to Tehran, including secularists such as Washington's former darling, Ahmad Chalabi.

The future Iraqi government, frankly, is likely to bear a stronger resemblance to the Islamic republic than to the liberal democracy the Bush administration publicly championed — or to the "Saddamism without Saddam" scenario that many advocates of the invasion privately preferred. That Iran has acted to bolster the power of its Shiite allies in Iraq — and to arm Shiite militias avenging Sunni attacks on their people and their shrines — may not be to Washington's liking, but "meddling" doesn't seem the right word for it.

In thinking about Iran's behavior, it's important to remember that the United States has made plain its determination to curb Iranian influence in the region — by force of arms, if necessary. From Iran's perspective, the U.S. is an implacable enemy that has rebuffed its diplomatic overtures. No state likes to see a hostile army stationed in its backyard.

If Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has indulged Ahmadinejad's rhetorical extremism, it may be because he expected to be rewarded, rather than punished, for Iran's assistance to the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq.

As Gareth Porter recently reported in the American Prospect, Iran floated a proposal in May 2003, shortly after the fall of Baghdad, for a "grand bargain" with the United States. It offered to back the 2002 Arab Summit's proposal for a two-state solution in Israel-Palestine and to end its military support for armed Palestinian groups as well as Hezbollah in return for the restoration of diplomatic relations with the United States.

Prematurely intoxicated by its "mission accomplished," the Bush administration reportedly ignored Iran's proposal and has since given every indication that it prefers regime change in Tehran to the kind of dialogue recommended by the Iraq Study Group. To this end, the administration has flirted with the Iranian Mujahedin Khalq, also known as MEK, a bizarre Maoist guerrilla group/cult that opposes the Islamic government and frequently launched attacks on Iran from Iraq with Hussein's backing.

Given the Bush administration's belligerent position, the Iranian government might have concluded that, with Hussein dead and the Shiite parties in power, Tehran's interests are best served by the withdrawal of American troops on its border. Even if the Iraqis fail to drive out U.S. forces, a deepening quagmire usefully distracts attention from Tehran's nuclear program and reminds the United States that it needs Iran in order to exit with its honor intact.

Like any state, the Islamic republic seeks above all to preserve itself. But, again, is this "malign intent" or a sober calculation?

Iran has, in other words, a strong realist case for being involved in Iraq. If Iranian "designs" on Iraq are seen as malign, it is only by those who believe that U.S. "intentions" in Iraq (unlike other imperial powers, we have no designs) are benign.

In this fairy-tale version of history, American rationales for occupying Iraq may change as often as necessary (from the destruction of Hussein's nonexistent "stockpile of weapons of mass destruction" to the promotion of democracy to the prevention of a civil war detonated by our invasion), but they remain virtuous in intent, while those who resist our plans are always portrayed as sinister.

The liberal mainstream has come to view the Iraq war as the greatest foreign policy disaster since Vietnam, but its faith in American virtue — its belief in American exceptionalism — remains as unshaken as the Bush administration's.

In the narrow parameters of American politics, you can ask whether Bush is telling the truth about Iraniandesigned bombs, but you may not ask whether the United States would accept the presence of 130,000 Iranian troops on our border. Nor may you ask who exactly is "meddling" in Mesopotamia.

Jailed 2 Years, Iraqi Tells Of Abuse By Americans (NYT)

By Michael Moss, Souad Mekhennet

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

DAMASCUS, Syria — In the early hours of Jan. 6, Laith al-Ani stood in a jail near the Baghdad airport waiting to be released by the American military after two years and three months in captivity.

He struggled to quell his hope. Other prisoners had gotten as far as the gate only to be brought back inside, he said, and he feared that would happen to him as punishment for letting his family discuss his case with a reporter.

But as the morning light grew, the American guards moved Mr. Ani, a 31-year-old father of two young children, methodically toward freedom. They swapped his yellow prison suit for street clothes, he said. They snipped off his white plastic identification bracelet. They scanned his irises into their database.

Then, shortly before 9 a.m., Mr. Ani said, he was brought to a table for one last step. He was handed a form and asked to place a check mark next to the sentence that best described how he had been treated:

“I didn’t go through any abuse during detention,” read the first option, in Arabic.

"I have gone through abuse during detention," read the second.

In the room, he said, stood three American guards carrying the type of electric stun devices that Mr. Ani and other detainees said had been used on them for infractions as minor as speaking out of turn.

"Even the translator told me to sign the first answer," said Mr. Ani, who gave a copy of his form to The New York Times. "I asked him what happens if I sign the second one, and he raised his hands," as if to say, Who knows?

"I thought if I don't sign the first one I am not going to get out of this place."

Shoving the memories of his detention aside, he checked the first box and minutes later was running through a cold rain to his waiting parents. "My heart was beating so hard," he said. "You can't believe how I cried."

His mother, Intisar al-Ani, raised her arms in the air, palms up, praising God. "It was like my soul going out, from my happiness," she recalled. "I hugged him hard, afraid the Americans would take him away again."

Just three weeks earlier, his last letter home — with its poetic yearnings and a sketch of a caged pink heart — appeared in The Times in one of a series of articles on Iraq's troubled detention and justice system.

After his release from the American-run jail, Camp Bucca, Mr. Ani and other former detainees described the sprawling complex of barracks in the southern desert near Kuwait as a bleak place where guards casually used their stun guns and exposed prisoners to long periods of extreme heat and cold; where prisoners fought among themselves and extremist elements tried to radicalize others; and where detainees often responded to the harsh conditions with hunger strikes and, at times, violent protests.

Through it all, Mr. Ani was never actually charged with a crime; he said he was questioned only once during his more than two years at the camp.

American detention officials acknowledged that guards used electric devices called Tasers to control detainees, but they said they did so rarely and only when the guards were physically threatened. The officials said that detainees had several ways to report abuse without repercussions, and that all claims were investigated.

Officials declined to give specific details about why they had detained Mr. Ani or why they had freed him.

"He was released because the board that reviewed his case didn't believe he any longer posed a threat," said First Lt. Lea Ann Fracasso, a spokeswoman for detention operations, in a written answer to questions. "He was originally detained as a security threat. I don't have anything more."

The Detention System

The American detention camps in Iraq now hold 15,500 prisoners, more than at any time since the war began. The camps are filled with people like Mr. Ani who are being held without charge and without access to tribunals where their cases are reviewed, the Times examination published last December found.

Mr. Ani, a women's clothing merchant, said he was detained in 2004 after American soldiers who were searching for weapons in his six-family apartment building found an Iraqi military uniform in the basement. His joy upon being released in January was short-lived. Days later, he said, a Shiite militia ransacked his home in Baghdad, looking to kill him. He hid, going from house to house, until he could move his family out of Iraq.

Now he is among the estimated 1.5 million Iraqis who have taken refuge in neighboring Syria and Jordan, where sectarian rifts are springing up.

In one area of Damascus, Shiite refugees from Iraq have established a mini version of Sadr City, the Baghdad neighborhood. Sunni refugees, in turn, are forming their own enclaves. In interviews, former detainees seethed with rage at the United States.

One, a 43-year-old man from Samarra, Iraq, said he was released last year despite having fought American troops.

"I wish to go back to Iraq and fight against the Americans, God willing," vowed the man, who spoke on the condition that he be identified only by his nom de guerre, Abu Abdulla, for fear of reprisal.

Mr. Ani has other priorities, still exhausted from his detention and preoccupied with finding a permanent home. But he regularly turns his television to a new station called Al Zawra, transfixed by its running montage of videotaped attacks on American troops.

The station is owned by a Sunni, Meshaan al-Juburi, a former Iraqi politician who was indicted last year on charges of embezzling millions of American dollars; he denied the charges and returned to Syria, where he lived before the war. The station has become an information center for the Sunni insurgency and in the process has exasperated American and Iraqi forces. In an interview at his office here, Mr. Juburi said that he opposed Al Qaeda's use of suicide bombers to kill Iraqi civilians but was soliciting support for Iraqis intent on killing American troops. When the image of a roadside bomb blowing up an American Humvee appears on the large flat screen on his office wall, his eyebrows rise and he urges his visitors to watch, "This is a good one."

A Nightmare Begins

Mr. Ani's ordeal began on Oct. 14, 2004, when soldiers brought him in for what he described as desultory questioning.

" 'Are you married? How many children? Sunni or Shiite? Which mosque do you pray in?' " Mr. Ani said he was asked. "I said I didn't pray, and they said, 'Are you not Muslim,' and I said, 'Yes, but I'm not praying and going to mosques.' "

"They never asked me about terrorism," he said. "I'm a normal person, just a usual man, and don't have anything to do with anyone who was fighting against the Americans."

Mr. Ani spent a total of 44 days at two other American facilities before being sent to Camp Bucca. In all, he said, he was questioned just once at each site.

Mr. Ani said the electric prods were first used on him on the way to Camp Bucca. "I was talking to someone next to me and they used it," he said, describing the device as black plastic with a yellow tip and two iron prongs. He said the prods were commonly used on him and other detainees as punishment.

"The whole body starts to shake and hurt," he said. "And you lose consciousness for a couple of seconds. One time they used it on my tongue. One guard held me from the left and another on my back and another used it against my tongue and for four or five days I couldn't eat."

In a separate interview, the insurgent from Samarra said such a device had been used on him for speaking out of turn. Ahmed Majid al-Ghanem, 50, a former Baath Party official who was also freed from Camp Bucca and is now living in Syria, said in a separate interview that he witnessed the electric prods being used as punishment on other detainees.

The Times interviewed Mr. Ani at his apartment in Damascus, the Syrian capital, where he sat on a couch with his parents, wife and children. When he demonstrated how he had been held for the electric prod, his 4-year-old daughter, Al Budur, mimicked his actions.

Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a detention system spokesman, said: "Every use of less than lethal force, to include use of Tasers, is formally reported by facility leadership, ensuring soldiers are in accordance with proper use. Touching a Taser to someone's tongue is not one of the approved uses."

Mr. Ani said guards treated him kindly when he arrived at the jail on Nov. 20, 2004. He recalls being given soap, and, when his hands cracked from the cold, a soldier bringing him lotion and socks.

But soon new guards came "who had had special thoughts," he said. "They were not allowing us to talk. They cut off the salt, gave us food that was not fit for dogs. One guard named David sometimes brought us outside to stay in the sun, or when it was cold. He also didn't respect our faith, telling us not to pray here, and when we moved not to pray there."

The detainees also began fighting among themselves. Those who spoke to the American guards were ostracized. Long toilet lines further raised tensions.

One day the guards searched a makeshift prayer area, Mr. Ani said, "and they started to step on the Korans, which fell down."

"A fight started," he continued. "There was a huge demonstration. The prisoners started to throw their shoes at the guards, and we started to beat them with empty plastic bottles. The guards shot at us with rubber bullets, but then prisoners were killed and others were injured."

A Pentagon statement at the time described such an incident in January 2005, saying that four detainees were killed when guards were compelled to use deadly force to quell the riot and that it was set off by a search for contraband. Colonel Curry said an investigation concluded that a detainee leader had fabricated the Koran allegations to instigate violence.

Mr. Ani and other former detainees said there were frequent demonstrations to protest various grievances. Mr. Ghanem said he was released in late 2003 after hunger strikes forced camp officials to review his case and those of others.

Detention officials said they were also fighting radicalization at the camps and were trying to identify and isolate extremists. Former detainees said in interviews that the influence of Islamic extremists was still growing. At Camp Bucca, they said, hundreds of men formed a group called the Brothers. Members shaved their beards and otherwise masked their ideology so they would be placed with other detainees.

Mr. Ani generally slept in a wooden barrackslike structure, with a mattress on the ground and a nail on the wall for hanging clothes. Once, when the guards found an improvised needle that he said was used to repair clothes, he was taken to an isolated cell, where he was kept for 24 days.

"You cannot see the difference between day and night," he said. "There was no opening, not even in the door."

Colonel Curry said it was standard to discipline detainees when they did not follow procedure.

Mr. Ani despaired of ever being released. His letter that was printed in The Times ended with, "I hope I can be dust in the storms of Bucca so that I can reach you."

Dangers Beyond Jail

"I didn't see any kind of solution for me," Mr. Ani said after his release. "The only solution was to die," he said, his eyes welling with tears. "I was hoping to die."

DOJ_NMG_0133430

In releasing Mr. Ani, the American military transferred him to Camp Cropper in Baghdad and gave him $25, which he and his parents used to hire a taxi. Along the way home, they had to dodge Shiite-controlled checkpoints, and just days later, he said, he narrowly escaped capture by a Shiite militia. Mr. Ani and other Iraqis say they believe these militias have found a way to learn when Sunni men are released from jail and then hunt and kill them.

Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, commander of American detainee operations, said that he had heard such concerns and that he was trying to alter the process of releasing detainees to improve their safety.

Mr. Ani said that for him there was only one way to stay alive: flee Iraq.

He said he was scared and puzzled about his next step. He said he felt that he could not stay in Syria, if only because work was scarce. But he must compete with other refugees for the attention of another host country.

"Until now, I can't sleep, really," he said. "Whenever I hear something noisy I stand up. I'm in a very bad psychological situation. I can't stop thinking of what we should do. I don't have a future here. How should we live?"

When his uncle put on Al Zawra, the satellite television station, Mr. Ani turned to look at the scenes of Sunni children who had been killed and the attacks on American soldiers.

"I am an Iraqi," he said. "I love my country. Of course, everyone who is an Iraqi at the moment, we are thinking how can we support our country."

"The United States through its actions made people hate the Americans much more than before."

Marine To Serve 8 Years In Killing Of Iraqi (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON, California (CNN) -- A U.S. Marine will serve no more than eight years in prison in connection with the killing of an Iraqi civilian, a Marine Corps spokesman said Saturday.

Marine Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington was sentenced to 14 years' confinement but will serve no more than eight under a plea agreement, Marine spokesman Sean Gibson told CNN.

Pennington pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges regarding the death of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, in Hamdaniya, west of Baghdad.

Pennington was among a group of seven Marines and a Navy medic charged in Awad's death. He and two other Marines were ordered to stand trial in October.

Pennington agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy to commit premeditated murder and kidnapping, and to a kidnapping charge. Other charges he faced were dismissed at sentencing.

He was given credit for the 340 days he served in pretrial confinement, Gibson said.

On February 8, Marine Cpl. Trent Thomas withdrew his guilty plea in the case, saying he now believes he acted under a lawful order. (Full story)

The Navy medic, Hospital Corpsman Melson Bacos, pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and kidnapping and agreed to testify against the Marines. Bacos was sentenced to a year in the brig.

He has testified that Marines were conducting a house-to-house search for suspected insurgents when they came across Awad, a retired policeman and a veteran of Iraq's war with Iran in the 1980s.

Bacos said Awad's hands and feet were bound and he was dragged from his home and shot numerous times. Then, he said, one Marine put the dead man's fingerprints on a rifle and shovel to make it look like he had been caught trying to plant a roadside bomb.

Marine Jailed Over Iraqi Murder (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

A US marine has been sentenced to eight years in military prison for his role in the killing of an Iraqi civilian.

Lance Cpl Robert Pennington, 22, is the fifth of eight US soldiers to plead guilty and be sentenced over the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52.

Investigators said the soldiers dragged disabled Mr Awad from his home and killed him in Hamdaniya in April 2006.

It is one in a series of inquiries into the alleged abuse or killing of Iraqis by coalition forces.

Murder and other charges were dropped in return for Cpl Pennington testifying against three other marines in the case.

Cpl Pennington pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy. His rank was also reduced and he has been dishonourably discharged.

'Truly sorry'

Mr Awad, a police officer, was taken from his home, put in a hole and shot in the head 10 times.

A gun and a shovel were then placed by his body to make it look as if he were an insurgent planting a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0133431

The unit was reportedly searching for an insurgent and took Mr Awad when they failed to find their target.

Other US investigations Cpl Pennington, the squad's radio operator, told the court martial that he did not shoot Mr Awad but that he helped to force him into the hole and held his hand over his mouth.

At his sentencing hearing on Friday, Cpl Pennington expressed remorse for his actions.

"I can honestly and truly say that I am sorry that I did what I did. Saying I feel bad just does not begin to describe it," he said.

He was sentenced to 14 years but the military judge dropped six years in return for the plea bargain.

After the sentencing, Cpl Pennington's mother, Deanna, said: "I've come to understand that Bobby died in [the battle for] Falluja and I want to help him come back to life and be the good person I know he is".

Another marine, Cpl Trent Thomas - the only one in the group to plead guilty to murder - withdrew his guilty plea at the last minute as the court prepared to sentence him on 8 February.

Three other marines and the navy medic have pleaded guilty to various lesser charges related to the incident.

Letters From Baghdad (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Americans have always been fascinated by correspondence from the front. I have nothing from our soldiers to share, but I do have letters from an Iraqi friend and his wife. Hasan (sadly, I dare not give his real name) was a translator for the Coalition Provisional Authority when I worked in Baghdad in 2003 and 2004. These brief letters catalogue the deterioration, the chaos and the human tragedy that have become Iraq's lot. Perhaps they show the futility of our remaining there; perhaps they point out why we must stay. But they surely speak to the need to help those who once so hopefully helped us.

Here's a small window into the sadness called Iraq:

-- John Agresto

June 24, 2004: I hope you made the trip safely. If I may loosen the rein to my humble imagination, you may be relaxing in an easy chair . . . savoring the tranquility of the scene in front of you, listening to "American Pie." [Along with anything by Buddy Holly, Don McLean's 1971 classic was one of Hasan's favorites. He knew all the lyrics by heart and sang them repeatedly.] If that's what is happening, then I'm really happy for you, after all the effort that you made, you deserve a lot more.God, I'm so talkative, even for a first e-mail across continents!

Aug. 12, 2004: Things are going well for us, in spite of the deteriorating security state . . . [My wife] is going to work [at] an independent women assembly . . . I'm doing well, too, been praised & paid monthly. Lots of work, but I'm for it.

Sept. 9, 2004: Hello Sir, I'm still alive! It's been nearly a month since I e-mailed you last. The situation is getting tighter by the day, one can even smell chaos in the air! Being a confirmed optimistic, I still lead a sociable life, with great assistance from [my wife], who believes like me that one can only die once, so it better be done in style!

May 16, 2005: [A] burglar or "s" broke into our house twice & a car exploded in our neighborhood, not far away, which caused window-glass breaking. [B]ut we're safe & sound, comparatively speaking for what others are suffering. [B]ombed cars are by wholesale nowadays! Miraculously, [my wife] was not affected by the exploding car [because] she decided to leave the living room just seconds prior to the explosion. The broken glass covered all the sofa she was sitting on! Our ration of optimism is decreasing drastically!

Nov. 30, 2005: The situation here is deteriorating by the days, nowadays, even I, the optimist see it as unbelievingly unbearable beyond any standard. The constitution is a disaster, & [the] religious fanatics are power-thirsty, driven only by their complexities. I'm not only revealing my own opinion, this is standard street talk . . . Iraqis are yearning for a government that brings security & order among other obvious needs. They brought us ethnic & sect segregation, while most Iraqi families have [had] a husband or a wife from the other sect & even another ethnic group, for generations . . .If these degenerates continue in power after Dec. elections, God forbid, then it becomes inevitable for any sane Iraqi to get the heck out! We had humble hopes. [W]e came to the levee but the levee was dry! [We need America to] simply support sane, secular &; multi-party government, even bring it to power. By doing so, be assured every Iraqi will praise US of A all night & day . . .It could be immensely enhanced if Uncle Sam comes to rescue, don't we wish, oh boy, that'll be the day!

March 7, 2006: A nearly total eclipse of the heart & soul is the reason behind not writing! As you're concluding from what you gather, nothing is going the right direction. Deterioration is the master of the scene. I don't want to depress you more; you're too dear to us to do so. We're still in Baghdad, where else to go to? No place on the sphere is willing to accept Iraqis. I suppose we're considered potential threat, especially after the Amman explosions, not to say what we're doing in our own country, flying a 1,000-year-old, gold-cladded dome high in the sky & turning it to debris -- a shameful example of what I'm stating. Any way, I don't blame the world for looking down to us.

June 17, 2006: We're fine & safe by current Iraqi standards! Although we're living in unbelievably unbearable circumstances . . . [E]verything is worse than the day before: infrastructure, services, security, even hope! I don't need to elaborate. What you gather from media is only a fraction of reality. Baghdad is taking the worst out of that. Nowadays women are afraid of going outdoors unless for an absolute need, or going to work, but most wear veils as a precaution from a sudden harassment by a stupid degenerate, claiming to implement religion . . . To top it all, we have a curfew extension, so now we should be home at sunset till 6 am, just like domesticated farm animals! [W]asn't I right [back in 2004] about sitting down & watching [TV] with a drink in hand, hoping to live another day with our limbs & head where they were the day before?! Our feelings & reactions have become numb . . .

Oct. 12, 2006: [All] things [are] worse in everything & by all standards. Public electrical power is only 2 hours a day for ordinary citizens; VIPs (Hakim & his likes) get 24! I suppose you're well aware that what is circulated by media regarding the daily casualties is only the tip of the iceberg. Last night, the announced figure was 60 for the day, but a neighbor informed that till noon [it] was 198 in the city morgue, when he was collecting his tortured & killed brother's corpse. Killing on identity [i.e., because of one's religious or ethnic identity] is the hottest trend in our beloved & multi-ethnic, sect & religion city! We, citizens, used to judge each other by personalities, good or bad, never by sect, ethnicity or religion, for so many generations. Hell, you can rarely find an Iraqi family that's single sect, without marrying from the other. The same with ethnicity. . . . [D]isplaced families by force are now 51,000, not persons but families according to the minister of immigration & displaced announcement yesterday! We both take moral support from your e-mails . . . & your passport photo, that's still put in our living room! That's what we really needed & what we always will: your friendship & communication, although we would really love a reunion, any time! Of course USA is out of the question for a simple Iraqi couple . . . . it's a wide world, though not so "wide" for Iraqis.

Christmas Eve, 2006: This time of the year enables us to seize the opportunity to wish you & your family a MERRY CHRISTMAS & a HAPPY NEW YEAR. We're still alive; suffering of what now must have been obvious & clear to the entire world. Restricting our daily movement to essential needs, but thinking positively & not trying to ruin the occasion -- hoping for you times of joy & comfort.

Influence Of Joint Chiefs Starting To Rebound (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes,

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Military critics say the generals' voices had been muffled under Rumsfeld, allowing mistakes in Iraq.

WASHINGTON — When President Bush went to the Pentagon in December to discuss his new war strategy with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld scheduled the meeting for his own conference room.

The chiefs rejected Rumsfeld's plan for the conference. Instead, according to a military source briefed on the meeting, they sent word that they would be in "the Tank," the Joint Chiefs' own secret briefing room. If the president and Rumsfeld wanted to hear their views, they could find them there.

It was a declaration that went unnoticed outside the Pentagon at the time, and Bush met with the generals on their terms. But it signaled a determination by the nation's top uniformed military officers to take on a greater role in shaping U.S. war policy after years in which some military critics said their voices had been muffled.

By law, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the president's principal military advisor. But for much of the Rumsfeld tenure, the Joint Chiefs — which include the top officers from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force — were kept out of war planning, according to some senior officers critical of that arrangement. Some top military voices have argued that had the Joint Chiefs been consulted more regularly, some key mistakes — such as the troop shortage early on — could have been avoided.

"When you are about to send young men and women to fight a war, you need the collective wisdom of many people. The service chiefs are part of the solution," said retired Gen. James L. Jones, a former Marine commandant who served as a member of the Joint Chiefs until 2003. "Some of the difficulty we are in now I think an honest man could say was due to that particular system … where the Joint Chiefs were left out."

Under the new secretary of Defense, Robert M. Gates, military officers say the influence of the Joint Chiefs is starting to rebound. Unlike his predecessor, Gates is publicly and privately paying close attention to his uniformed advisors.

Rumsfeld preferred to meet with service chiefs in larger groups that also included civilian officials, a practice that effectively diluted the influence of the military voices. Gates, on the other hand, has begun meeting with the chiefs once a week — in the Tank, a room Rumsfeld often avoided.

"That is a damn good thing," said a military officer, who, like several others, spoke about internal Pentagon differences on condition of anonymity. "There were huge periods — months — between meetings of the old SecDef and the chiefs. That's almost incomprehensible."

Rumsfeld and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, who was the top Mideast commander during the Afghanistan and Iraq invasions and who disdained the top generals, formed a "perfect storm" that cut the Joint Chiefs of Staff out of the loop, said Jones, the retired Marine general who also served as top military commander in Europe.

"You can circumvent the legitimate opinions that should be developed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff," Jones said. "And I think there is evidence that has happened on a number of occasions."

In his autobiography, Franks wrote dismissively about the Joint Chiefs and said that briefing them was a "bureaucratic exercise."

Unlike Rumsfeld, who was very sure of his own military opinion, Gates has said he wants to hear a variety of voices. And as Gates' own views on military policy become clearer through his appearances before Congress and at news conferences, his positions seem to be close to those of the Joint Chiefs and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the group's chairman.

The plan for the troop increase in Iraq was developed by the White House and other military leaders, like Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top U.S. commander in Iraq. Although the Joint Chiefs helped shape the plan, they have been less enthusiastic about the open-ended commitment advocated by the White House, a skepticism Gates seems to share.

Pentagon insiders say that if the new Bush strategy falters, "Plan C" — whatever that may turn out to be — likely will emerge from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They and the Joint Staff, the top military planners who report to Pace, are at work on alternatives if Bush's "surge" plan should fail, according to defense officials.

The role of the Joint Chiefs began growing in the months before Bush replaced Rumsfeld, when Pace decided to take a closer look at Iraq policy.

Last summer, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., then the top U.S. commander in Iraq, announced that rather than drawing down U.S. forces, he would need reinforcements to stabilize Baghdad. At that point, according to a senior Pentagon official, Pace decided the Joint Chiefs of Staff should take a closer look at why the U.S. policy was not succeeding.

Until then, according to the senior official, Pace thought the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been doing a good job "grading the homework" of Casey and other commanders but needed to do more. Pace formed a "Council of Colonels" consisting of top officers from every service who had served in Iraq. Among them was Army Col. H.R. McMaster, lauded for his efforts to secure the Iraqi city of Tall Afar and author of a book critical of the military leadership during the Vietnam War.

Pace's effort seemed unusual — but welcome — to White House officials, some of whom had grown frustrated that even in the face of a worsening military situation, the Pentagon seemed to keep peddling the same military advice.

In an interview, Pace said he began taking a harder look at Iraq last summer, which also is when Casey requested more troops.

"When I was self-analyzing my time as chairman, when I looked back in August of 2006 at what we had been doing, I thought we could be doing more … taking a look at the same facts and doing a deeper analysis," Pace said.

Pace did not agree that he and the other chiefs previously had been on the sidelines. But he acknowledged that he and the Joint Chiefs embarked last year on a new kind of analysis.

"We found a way to be more helpful," he said.

The controversy has rekindled a debate over the federal law governing the organization of the military, the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986. Designed to diminish rivalry between military services, the act designated the chairman of the Joint Chiefs as the president's top military advisor, but placed the office outside the formal military chain of command.

Pace and Jones have debated whether a change in the law is needed. Pace said that each time, he comes down on the side of the current system.

"As a citizen of the United States I like the fact there is no one military person who commands all things in our military," Pace said.

Nonetheless, there seems little doubt that under Gates the Joint Chiefs will have a greater role. Pace says he intends to continue gathering groups of officers to examine American strategy, as he did last year for Iraq.

"We will continue to use that concept for lots of issues in the global war — Afghanistan, other places, yes," Pace said. "It was really helpful."

Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration At Army's Top Medical Facility (WP)

By Dana Priest, Anne Hull, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Behind the door of Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan's room, part of the wall is torn and hangs in the air, weighted down with black mold. When the wounded combat engineer stands in his shower and looks up, he can see the bathtub on the floor above through a rotted hole. The entire building, constructed between the world wars, often smells like greasy carry-out. Signs of neglect are everywhere: mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses.

This is the world of Building 18, not the kind of place where Duncan expected to recover when he was evacuated to Walter Reed Army Medical Center from Iraq last February with a broken neck and a shredded left ear, nearly dead from blood loss. But the old lodge, just outside the gates of the hospital and five miles up the road from the White House, has housed hundreds of maimed soldiers recuperating from injuries suffered in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The common perception of Walter Reed is of a surgical hospital that shines as the crown jewel of military medicine. But 5 1/2 years of sustained combat have transformed the venerable 113-acre institution into something else entirely -- a holding ground for physically and psychologically damaged outpatients. Almost 700 of them -- the majority soldiers, with some Marines -- have been released from hospital beds but still need treatment or are awaiting bureaucratic decisions before being discharged or returned to active duty.

They suffer from brain injuries, severed arms and legs, organ and back damage, and various degrees of post-traumatic stress. Their legions have grown so exponentially -- they outnumber hospital patients at Walter Reed 17 to 1 -- that they take up every available bed on post and spill into dozens of nearby hotels and apartments leased by the Army. The average stay is 10 months, but some have been stuck there for as long as two years.

Not all of the quarters are as bleak as Duncan's, but the despair of Building 18 symbolizes a larger problem in Walter Reed's treatment of the wounded, according to dozens of soldiers, family members, veterans aid groups, and current and former Walter Reed staff members interviewed by two Washington Post reporters, who spent more than four months visiting the outpatient world without the knowledge or permission of Walter Reed officials. Many agreed to be quoted by name; others said they feared Army retribution if they complained publicly.

While the hospital is a place of scrubbed-down order and daily miracles, with medical advances saving more soldiers than ever, the outpatients in the Other Walter Reed encounter a messy bureaucratic battlefield nearly as chaotic as the real battlefields they faced overseas.

On the worst days, soldiers say they feel like they are living a chapter of "Catch-22." The wounded manage other wounded. Soldiers dealing with psychological disorders of their own have been put in charge of others at risk of suicide.

Disengaged clerks, unqualified platoon sergeants and overworked case managers fumble with simple needs: feeding soldiers' families who are close to poverty, replacing a uniform ripped off by medics in the desert sand or helping a brain-damaged soldier remember his next appointment.

"We've done our duty. We fought the war. We came home wounded. Fine. But whoever the people are back here who are supposed to give us the easy transition should be doing it," said Marine Sgt. Ryan Groves, 26, an amputee who lived at Walter Reed for 16 months. "We don't know what to do. The people who are supposed to know don't have the answers. It's a nonstop process of stalling."

Soldiers, family members, volunteers and caregivers who have tried to fix the system say each mishap seems trivial by itself, but the cumulative effect wears down the spirits of the wounded and can stall their recovery.

"It creates resentment and disenfranchisement," said Joe Wilson, a clinical social worker at Walter Reed. "These soldiers will withdraw and stay in their rooms. They will actively avoid the very treatment and services that are meant to be helpful."

Danny Soto, a national service officer for Disabled American Veterans who helps dozens of wounded service members each week at Walter Reed, said soldiers "get awesome medical care and their lives are being saved," but, "Then they get into the administrative part of it and they are like, 'You saved me for what?' The soldiers feel like they are not getting proper respect. This leads to anger."

This world is invisible to outsiders. Walter Reed occasionally showcases the heroism of these wounded soldiers and emphasizes that all is well under the circumstances. President Bush, former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and members of Congress have promised the best care during their regular visits to the hospital's spit-polished amputee unit, Ward 57.

"We owe them all we can give them," Bush said during his last visit, a few days before Christmas. "Not only for when they're in harm's way, but when they come home to help them adjust if they have wounds, or help them adjust after their time in service."

Along with the government promises, the American public, determined not to repeat the divisive Vietnam experience, has embraced the soldiers even as the war grows more controversial at home. Walter Reed is awash in the generosity of volunteers, businesses and celebrities who donate money, plane tickets, telephone cards and steak dinners.

Yet at a deeper level, the soldiers say they feel alone and frustrated. Seventy-five percent of the troops polled by Walter Reed last March said their experience was "stressful." Suicide attempts and unintentional overdoses from prescription drugs and alcohol, which is sold on post, are part of the narrative here.

Vera Heron spent 15 frustrating months living on post to help care for her son. "It just absolutely took forever to get anything done," Heron said. "They do the paperwork, they lose the paperwork. Then they have to redo the paperwork. You are talking about guys and girls whose lives are disrupted for the rest of their lives, and they don't put any priority on it."

Family members who speak only Spanish have had to rely on Salvadoran housekeepers, a Cuban bus driver, the Panamanian bartender and a Mexican floor cleaner for help. Walter Reed maintains a list of bilingual staffers, but they are rarely called on, according to soldiers and families and Walter Reed staff members.

Evis Morales's severely wounded son was transferred to the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda for surgery shortly after she arrived at Walter Reed. She had checked into her government-paid room on post, but she slept in the lobby of the Bethesda hospital for two weeks because no one told her there is a free shuttle between the two facilities. "They just let me off the bus and said 'Bye-bye,' " recalled Morales, a Puerto Rico resident.

Morales found help after she ran out of money, when she called a hotline number and a Spanish-speaking operator happened to answer.

"If they can have Spanish-speaking recruits to convince my son to go into the Army, why can't they have Spanish-speaking translators when he's injured?" Morales asked. "It's so confusing, so disorienting."

Soldiers, wives, mothers, social workers and the heads of volunteer organizations have complained repeatedly to the military command about what one called "The Handbook No One Gets" that would explain life as an outpatient. Most soldiers polled in the March survey said they got their information from friends. Only 12 percent said any Army literature had been helpful.

"They've been behind from Day One," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who headed the House Government Reform Committee, which investigated problems at Walter Reed and other Army facilities. "Even the stuff they've fixed has only been patched."

Among the public, Davis said, "there's vast appreciation for soldiers, but there's a lack of focus on what happens to them" when they return. "It's awful."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, commander at Walter Reed, said in an interview last week that a major reason outpatients stay so long, a change from the days when injured soldiers were discharged as quickly as possible, is that the Army wants to be able to hang on to as many soldiers as it can, "because this is the first time this country has fought a war for so long with an all-volunteer force since the Revolution."

Acknowledging the problems with outpatient care, Weightman said Walter Reed has taken steps over the past year to improve conditions for the outpatient army, which at its peak in summer 2005 numbered nearly 900, not to mention the hundreds of family members who come to care for them. One platoon sergeant used to be in charge of 125 patients; now each one manages 30. Platoon sergeants with psychological problems are more carefully screened. And officials have increased the numbers of case managers and patient advocates to help with the complex disability benefit process, which Weightman called "one of the biggest sources of delay."

And to help steer the wounded and their families through the complicated bureaucracy, Weightman said, Walter Reed has recently begun holding twice-weekly informational meetings. "We felt we were pushing information out before, but the reality is, it was overwhelming," he said. "Is it fail-proof? No. But we've put more resources on it."

He said a 21,500-troop increase in Iraq has Walter Reed bracing for "potentially a lot more" casualties.Bureaucratic Battles

The best known of the Army's medical centers, Walter Reed opened in 1909 with 10 patients. It has treated the wounded from every war since, and nearly one of every four service members injured in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The outpatients are assigned to one of five buildings attached to the post, including Building 18, just across from the front gates on Georgia Avenue. To accommodate the overflow, some are sent to nearby hotels and apartments. Living conditions range from the disrepair of Building 18 to the relative elegance of Mologne House, a hotel that opened on the post in 1998, when the typical guest was a visiting family member or a retiree on vacation.

The Pentagon has announced plans to close Walter Reed by 2011, but that hasn't stopped the flow of casualties. Three times a week, school buses painted white and fitted with stretchers and blackened windows stream down Georgia Avenue. Sirens blaring, they deliver soldiers groggy from a pain-relief cocktail at the end of their long trip from Iraq via Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany and Andrews Air Force Base.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, 43, came in on one of those buses in November 2004 and spent several weeks on the fifth floor of Walter Reed's hospital. His eye and skull were shattered by an AK-47 round. His odyssey in the Other Walter Reed has lasted more than two years, but it began when someone handed him a map of the grounds and told him to find his room across post.

A reconnaissance and land-navigation expert, Shannon was so disoriented that he couldn't even find north. Holding the map, he stumbled around outside the hospital, sliding against walls and trying to keep himself upright, he said. He asked anyone he found for directions.

Shannon had led the 2nd Infantry Division's Ghost Recon Platoon until he was felled in a gun battle in Ramadi. He liked the solitary work of a sniper; "Lone Wolf" was his call name. But he did not expect to be left alone by the Army after such serious surgery and a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder. He had appointments during his first two weeks as an outpatient, then nothing.

"I thought, 'Shouldn't they contact me?' " he said. "I didn't understand the paperwork. I'd start calling phone numbers, asking if I had appointments. I finally ran across someone who said: 'I'm your case manager. Where have you been?'

"Well, I've been here! Jeez Louise, people, I'm your hospital patient!"

Like Shannon, many soldiers with impaired memory from brain injuries sat for weeks with no appointments and no help from the staff to arrange them. Many disappeared even longer. Some simply left for home.

One outpatient, a 57-year-old staff sergeant who had a heart attack in Afghanistan, was given 200 rooms to supervise at the end of 2005. He quickly discovered that some outpatients had left the post months earlier and would check in by phone. "We called them 'call-in patients,' " said Staff Sgt. Mike McCauley, whose dormant PTSD from Vietnam was triggered by what he saw on the job: so many young and wounded, and three bodies being carried from the hospital.

Life beyond the hospital bed is a frustrating mountain of paperwork. The typical soldier is required to file 22 documents with eight different commands -- most of them off-post -- to enter and exit the medical processing world, according to government investigators. Sixteen different information systems are used to process the forms, but few of them can communicate with one another. The Army's three personnel databases cannot read each other's files and can't interact with the separate pay system or the medical recordkeeping databases.

The disappearance of necessary forms and records is the most common reason soldiers languish at Walter Reed longer than they should, according to soldiers, family members and staffers. Sometimes the Army has no record that a soldier even served in Iraq. A combat medic who did three tours had to bring in letters and photos of herself in Iraq to show she that had been there, after a clerk couldn't find a record of her service.

Shannon, who wears an eye patch and a visible skull implant, said he had to prove he had served in Iraq when he tried to get a free uniform to replace the bloody one left behind on a medic's stretcher. When he finally tracked down the supply clerk, he discovered the problem: His name was mistakenly left off the "GWOT list" -- the list of "Global War on Terrorism" patients with priority funding from the Defense Department.

He brought his Purple Heart to the clerk to prove he was in Iraq.

Lost paperwork for new uniforms has forced some soldiers to attend their own Purple Heart ceremonies and the official birthday party for the Army in gym clothes, only to be chewed out by superiors.

The Army has tried to re-create the organization of a typical military unit at Walter Reed. Soldiers are assigned to one of two companies while they are outpatients -- the Medical Holding Company (Medhold) for active-duty soldiers and the Medical Holdover Company for Reserve and National Guard soldiers. The companies are broken into platoons that are led by platoon sergeants, the Army equivalent of a parent.

Under normal circumstances, good sergeants know everything about the soldiers under their charge: vices and talents, moods and bad habits, even family stresses.

At Walter Reed, however, outpatients have been drafted to serve as platoon sergeants and have struggled with their responsibilities. Sgt. David Thomas, a 42-year-old amputee with the Tennessee National Guard, said his platoon sergeant couldn't remember his name. "We wondered if he had mental problems," Thomas said. "Sometimes I'd wear my leg, other times I'd take my wheelchair. He would think I was a different person. We thought, 'My God, has this man lost it?' "

Civilian care coordinators and case managers are supposed to track injured soldiers and help them with appointments, but government investigators and soldiers complain that they are poorly trained and often do not understand the system.

One amputee, a senior enlisted man who asked not to be identified because he is back on active duty, said he received orders to report to a base in Germany as he sat drooling in his wheelchair in a haze of medication. "I went to Medhold many times in my wheelchair to fix it, but no one there could help me," he said.

Finally, his wife met an aide to then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz, who got the erroneous paperwork corrected with one phone call. When the aide called with the news, he told the soldier, "They don't even know you exist."

"They didn't know who I was or where I was," the soldier said. "And I was in contact with my platoon sergeant every day."

The lack of accountability weighed on Shannon. He hated the isolation of the younger troops. The Army's failure to account for them each day wore on him. When a 19-year-old soldier down the hall died, Shannon knew he had to take action.

The soldier, Cpl. Jeremy Harper, returned from Iraq with PTSD after seeing three buddies die. He kept his room dark, refused his combat medals and always seemed heavily medicated, said people who knew him. According to his mother, Harper was drunkenly wandering the lobby of the Mologne House on New Year's Eve 2004, looking for a ride home to West Virginia. The next morning he was found dead in his room. An autopsy showed alcohol poisoning, she said.

"I can't understand how they could have let kids under the age of 21 have liquor," said Victoria Harper, crying. "He was supposed to be right there at Walter Reed hospital. . . . I feel that they didn't take care of him or watch him as close as they should have."

The Army posthumously awarded Harper a Bronze Star for his actions in Iraq.

Shannon viewed Harper's death as symptomatic of a larger tragedy -- the Army had broken its covenant with its troops. "Somebody didn't take care of him," he would later say. "It makes me want to cry. "

Shannon and another soldier decided to keep tabs on the brain injury ward. "I'm a staff sergeant in the U.S. Army, and I take care of people," he said. The two soldiers walked the ward every day with a list of names. If a name dropped off the large white board at the nurses' station, Shannon would hound the nurses to check their files and figure out where the soldier had gone.

Sometimes the patients had been transferred to another hospital. If they had been released to one of the residences on post, Shannon and his buddy would pester the front desk managers to make sure the new charges were indeed there. "But two out of 10, when I asked where they were, they'd just say, 'They're gone,' " Shannon said.

Even after Weightman and his commanders instituted new measures to keep better track of soldiers, two young men left post one night in November and died in a high-speed car crash in Virginia. The driver was supposed to be restricted to Walter Reed because he had tested positive for illegal drugs, Weightman said.

Part of the tension at Walter Reed comes from a setting that is both military and medical. Marine Sgt. Ryan Groves, the squad leader who lost one leg and the use of his other in a grenade attack, said his recovery was made more difficult by a Marine liaison officer who had never seen combat but dogged him about having his mother in his room on post. The rules allowed her to be there, but the officer said she was taking up valuable bed space.

"When you join the Marine Corps, they tell you, you can forget about your mama. 'You have no mama. We are your mama,' " Groves said. "That training works in combat. It doesn't work when you are wounded."Frustration at Every Turn

The frustrations of an outpatient's day begin before dawn. On a dark, rain-soaked morning this winter, Sgt. Archie Benware, 53, hobbled over to his National Guard platoon office at Walter Reed. Benware had done two tours in Iraq. His head had been crushed between two 2,100-pound concrete barriers in Ramadi, and now it was dented like a tin can. His legs were stiff from knee surgery. But here he was, trying to take care of business.

DOJ_NMG_0133438

At the platoon office, he scanned the white board on the wall. Six soldiers were listed as AWOL. The platoon sergeant was nowhere to be found, leaving several soldiers stranded with their requests.

Benware walked around the corner to arrange a dental appointment -- his teeth were knocked out in the accident. He was told by a case manager that another case worker, not his doctor, would have to approve the procedure.

"Goddamn it, that's unbelievable!" snapped his wife, Barb, who accompanied him because he can no longer remember all of his appointments.

Not as unbelievable as the time he received a manila envelope containing the gynecological report of a young female soldier.

Next came 7 a.m. formation, one way Walter Reed tries to keep track of hundreds of wounded. Formation is also held to maintain some discipline. Soldiers limp to the old Red Cross building in rain, ice and snow. Army regulations say they can't use umbrellas, even here. A triple amputee has mastered the art of putting on his uniform by himself and rolling in just in time. Others are so gorked out on pills that they seem on the verge of nodding off.

"Fall in!" a platoon sergeant shouted at Friday formation. The noisy room of soldiers turned silent.

An Army chaplain opened with a verse from the Bible. "Why are we here?" she asked. She talked about heroes and service to country. "We were injured in many ways."

Someone announced free tickets to hockey games, a Ravens game, a movie screening, a dinner at McCormick and Schmick's, all compliments of local businesses.

Every formation includes a safety briefing. Usually it is a warning about mixing alcohol with meds, or driving too fast, or domestic abuse. "Do not beat your spouse or children. Do not let your spouse or children beat you," a sergeant said, to laughter. This morning's briefing included a warning about black ice, a particular menace to the amputees.

Dress warm, the sergeant said. "I see some guys rolling around in their wheelchairs in 30 degrees in T-shirts."

Soldiers hate formation for its petty condescension. They gutted out a year in the desert, and now they are being treated like children.

"I'm trying to think outside the box here, maybe moving formation to Wagner Gym," the commander said, addressing concerns that formation was too far from soldiers' quarters in the cold weather. "But guess what? Those are nice wood floors. They have to be covered by a tarp. There's a tarp that's got to be rolled out over the wooden floors. Then it has to be cleaned, with 400 soldiers stepping all over it. Then it's got to be rolled up."

"Now, who thinks Wagner Gym is a good idea?"

Explaining this strange world to family members is not easy. At an orientation for new arrivals, a staff sergeant walked them through the idiosyncrasies of Army financing. He said one relative could receive a 15-day advance on the $64 per diem either in cash or as an electronic transfer: "I highly recommend that you take the cash," he said. "There's no guarantee the transfer will get to your bank." The audience yawned.

Actually, he went on, relatives can collect only 80 percent of this advance, which comes to $51.20 a day. "The cashier has no change, so we drop to $50. We give you the rest" -- the $1.20 a day -- "when you leave."

The crowd was anxious, exhausted. A child crawled on the floor. The sergeant plowed on. "You need to figure out how long your loved one is going to be an inpatient," he said, something even the doctors can't accurately predict from day to day. "Because if you sign up for the lodging advance," which is $150 a day, "and they get out the next day, you owe the government the advance back of $150 a day."

A case manager took the floor to remind everyone that soldiers are required to be in uniform most of the time, though some of the wounded are amputees or their legs are pinned together by bulky braces. "We have break-away clothing with Velcro!" she announced with a smile. "Welcome to Walter Reed!"A Bleak Life in Building 18

"Building 18! There is a rodent infestation issue!" bellowed the commander to his troops one morning at formation. "It doesn't help when you live like a rodent! I can't believe people live like that! I was appalled by some of your rooms!"

Life in Building 18 is the bleakest homecoming for men and women whose government promised them good care in return for their sacrifices.

One case manager was so disgusted, she bought roach bombs for the rooms. Mouse traps are handed out. It doesn't help that soldiers there subsist on carry-out food because the hospital cafeteria is such a hike on cold nights. They make do with microwaves and hot plates.

Army officials say they "started an aggressive campaign to deal with the mice infestation" last October and that the problem is now at a "manageable level." They also say they will "review all outstanding work orders" in the next 30 days.

Soldiers discharged from the psychiatric ward are often assigned to Building 18. Buses and ambulances blare all night. While injured soldiers pull guard duty in the foyer, a broken garage door allows unmonitored entry from the rear. Struggling with schizophrenia, PTSD, paranoid delusional disorder and traumatic brain injury, soldiers feel especially vulnerable in that setting, just outside the post gates, on a street where drug dealers work the corner at night.

"I've been close to mortars. I've held my own pretty good," said Spec. George Romero, 25, who came back from Iraq with a psychological disorder. "But here . . . I think it has affected my ability to get over it . . . dealing with potential threats every day."

After Spec. Jeremy Duncan, 30, got out of the hospital and was assigned to Building 18, he had to navigate across the traffic of Georgia Avenue for appointments. Even after knee surgery, he had to limp back and forth on crutches and in pain. Over time, black mold invaded his room.

But Duncan would rather suffer with the mold than move to another room and share his convalescence in tight quarters with a wounded stranger. "I have mold on the walls, a hole in the shower ceiling, but . . . I don't want someone waking me up coming in."

Wilson, the clinical social worker at Walter Reed, was part of a staff team that recognized Building 18's toll on the wounded. He mapped out a plan and, in September, was given a $30,000 grant from the Commander's Initiative Account for improvements. He ordered some equipment, including a pool table and air hockey table, which have not yet arrived. A Psychiatry Department functionary held up the rest of the money because she feared that buying a lot of recreational equipment close to Christmas would trigger an audit, Wilson said.

In January, Wilson was told that the funds were no longer available and that he would have to submit a new request. "It's absurd," he said. "Seven months of work down the drain. I have nothing to show for this project. It's a great example of what we're up against."

A pool table and two flat-screen TVs were eventually donated from elsewhere.

But Wilson had had enough. Three weeks ago he turned in his resignation. "It's too difficult to get anything done with this broken-down bureaucracy," he said.

At town hall meetings, the soldiers of Building 18 keep pushing commanders to improve conditions. But some things have gotten worse. In December, a contracting dispute held up building repairs.

"I hate it," said Romero, who stays in his room all day. "There are cockroaches. The elevator doesn't work. The garage door doesn't work. Sometimes there's no heat, no water. . . . I told my platoon sergeant I want to leave. I told the town hall meeting. I talked to the doctors and medical staff. They just said you kind of got to get used to the outside world. . . . My platoon sergeant said, 'Suck it up!' "

Walter Reed Couldn't Handle Wounded From Iraq, Leader Says (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The head of the Army hospital responsible for most of the seriously injured war veterans has acknowledged that the staff responsible for tracking patients after they receive treatment was overwhelmed by the number of wounded when violence spiked in Iraq two years ago.

The undermanned staff may have led to wounded veterans falling through the bureaucratic and medical cracks, he said.

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, commander of the prestigious Walter Reed Army Medical Center, said the number of outpatient soldiers reached a high of 872 in summer 2005, up from about 100 before the war, leaving the military and medical staff responsible for monitoring their well-being unable to keep on top of critical cases.

"We found that the platoon sergeants that we had for accountability and the case managers that we had, they were literally managing 125 patients each," Weightman said. "That's too many to do [oversight] effectively."

Walter Reed, located in northwest Washington, D.C., is renowned for its inpatient medical care, which has helped keep alive hundreds of soldiers who probably would have died during previous conflicts.

Less well-known is the care soldiers receive as outpatients, which has stretched to an average of 10 months — two months longer than Army guidelines call for — a period Weightman said can be even more frustrating for wounded soldiers and their families.

"When you're an inpatient, you're literally a captive in our organization," Weightman said. "When you're an outpatient, there's a lot more options that you have as a patient as far as where you can go and who accounts for you. That was, in some cases, a problem."

Weightman's acknowledgment, made during a briefing Friday for a small group of reporters, came ahead of a Washington Post investigation to be published today that details multiple cases of soldiers who accused Walter Reed of neglecting them and forcing them to live in substandard wards on the medical center's campus once they became outpatients.

The Post story includes allegations that one outpatient soldier at Walter Reed drank himself to death, and two others died in a high-speed car accident even though the driver was supposed to be restricted to medical center grounds because of past use of illegal drugs.

Weightman, who took command of Walter Reed in July, said he has quadrupled the number of staff responsible for serving as liaisons between outpatients and the review boards charged with deciding whether to discharge outpatients or return them to active duty.

He also said he is increasing the number of military officers and case workers handling individual outpatients so that every caregiver will only have to handle 30 to 35 veterans.

Weightman insisted he has also ordered his staff to focus on "high-risk" cases, such as veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder or traumatic brain injuries, to insure they are more closely monitored once they become outpatients.

"Maintaining quick accountability at all times on those, it generates a lot less problems for us downrange," Weightman said. "They're the folks that are at risk of not being where they're supposed to be, or getting on a motorcycle and going 120 miles per hour, or inappropriate use of alcohol or medication or illegal substances."

Despite these improvements, however, some of the cases documented by the Post — including the two soldiers who died in the car accident — occurred after Weightman's changes. And, according to the Post, many of the substandard living conditions and bureaucratic problems still exist.

Paul Rieckhoff, an Iraq war veteran who heads Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, said he had heard of similar cases at Walter Reed, including a friend who had suffered "catastrophic injuries" in Iraq and was forced to "carry his paperwork through the snow" when he became an outpatient.

"They didn't plan properly for the war," Rieckhoff said. "If it even happens to one veteran, then it's shameful. None of these guys should ever fall through the cracks."

Two "Private Fuzzies," Diverted On Their Way To War (WP)

By Bill Murphy, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

FORWARD OPERATING BASE WARHORSE, Iraq

An explosion in the distance broke the silence in tent MC-01 just after 9 a.m.

"IED?" Pvt. Ryan Tozour asked his friend sitting astride the next cot, referring to an improvised explosive device, or bomb.

"I never heard an IED before," Pvt. Stephen Daniel replied. He leaned forward and spat tobacco juice into a Gatorade bottle, just inches from his rifle. "I only saw a video," part of a briefing a few days before when he and Tozour got to Iraq.

The two privates, artillerymen, had been together since basic training in July, and they had reached this small, dusty base outside Baqubah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, the night before purely by accident. The helicopter ferrying them to their unit made a quick stop here, and when they got off to let some other passengers out, other soldiers grabbed their bags and jogged away.

"We were yelling, 'No!' " Daniel explained. "By the time we got clear to where they could hear us," he paused, then lifted his arm slowly, mimicking a helicopter taking off.

They slept here last night, in this dark, cavernous tent, where plywood covers the ground and the furniture consists of about 60 green canvas cots. Dust, sand and gravel are everywhere.

Their unit, a battalion in the 1st Cavalry Division, has been in Iraq since October. Nobody has told them what job they'll be doing here, but they don't think there is much artillery in this war, and they expect to be used as infantry.

"They call us Private Fuzzies," said Daniel, 22, because they have no rank tabs on their uniforms -- just a soft Velcro patch where an insignia would go if they had one. "Our drill sergeant used to say, 'You'll be in Iraq in 90 days.' We'd say, 'You're crazy.' Guess it wasn't too crazy."

They had eaten breakfast at the dining hall nearby and now had nothing to do but wait. They rehashed rumors, worried that the helicopter mix-up meant they would now have to fly in daylight. They argued about where and what kind of helicopters had crashed in Iraq recently.

"When you're not here yet, you're like obsessed with here," Daniel said. "You're like looking at blogs and looking online. And then you get here, and it gets old within a day. You halfway don't want to go. But it's why you joined, so it's cool. Maybe time will go faster if you're getting shot at."

Of the 150 people who attend his small church in Belton, Tex. -- "the buckle of the Bible belt," Daniel described it -- nine are serving in Iraq. "It's a conservative, Independent Baptist church. Very patriotic, rah-rah."

He has a 6-year-old son. The other families in Daniel's congregation were disappointed in him and his girlfriend for getting pregnant. "They kept asking, 'When are you two going to get married? You're going to get married, aren't you?' " They did get married, a year and a half ago.

"Everything happens for a reason," Tozour assured him. He is 19 and grew up in Wilmington, N.C.

"Don't say it like you're proud of it," Daniel interrupted.

"Hey, it's a nice place," said Tozour, who got married two days before basic training. His wife works at a Wal-Mart back home, and he said he joined the Army "for the benefits. I mean, I don't need to pay for dental, medical, none of that."

At 9:50 a.m., Daniel checked his watch. They gathered their duffel bags and carried them out of the tent, through the maze of blast walls designed to protect against mortars and other dangers.

"Hey, Daniel!" called out a burly staff sergeant.

Daniel spun on his heels and snapped to "parade rest" -- hands clasped smartly behind his back, feet shoulder width apart, eyes straight ahead.

"Yes, sergeant!" both men said.

"It's okay, you can stand easy. Are you guys new?"

"Yes, sergeant," came the replies. They unclasped their hands.

He asked what job they had trained for and where they were headed. It's tough here, he said. "Keep your eyes open. Be alert."

"Yes, sergeant."

"Don't relax. This is no place to relax."

"Yes, sergeant."

The sergeant looked them over. "But you guys are going to have a lot of fun," he said as he sent them on their way. "Be safe."

Just out of the sergeant's earshot, Daniel turned to Tozour. "Don't relax speech Number 208," he said.

Their ride arrived a few minutes after 10 a.m., and they headed back to the landing zone.

Shortly afterward, the sergeant who had given them the "don't relax" speech, Staff Sgt. Benjamin Maldonado, 31, had a minute to reflect. An infantryman in his second year in Iraq, his current job is to help run the transient tents and other facilities on the base.

U.S. casualties are piling up here now, slowly but steadily. Maldonado said he doesn't see things here getting better, and it's tough to watch new guys go off into the fight. "It would be one thing if you saw some improvement."

A few minutes later, Maldonado ushered some Iraqi workers into tent MC-01. They started sweeping, and the air was filled with dust.

Strengthen Civilian Forces, Too (WT)

By Richard Lugar

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan are foremost in our thoughts and prayers, but the U.S. military has been quietly fighting the war against terror in scores of other foreign countries. Since September 11, 2001, the number of military personnel and Defense Department activities in non-combat countries has soared.

Finding, capturing and eliminating terrorists and their support networks are only part of the military's new mission. They have won new authority outside the traditional foreign aid framework to provide military training to foreign countries. Increasingly, the military is taking on roles once reserved for civilian agencies, such as building schools and clinics, drilling wells and conducting public information campaigns.

A strong military response is necessary for the war against terrorism. When our foreign friends use our training and intelligence to round up global terrorists on their soil, it is clearly a mutual success. But over-reliance on the military also carries risks.

To succeed, we need diplomats who can shape complex bilateral relationships, repair and build alliances and navigate through a labyrinth of foreign languages and cultures. We need foreign aid experts who know how best to promote democratic practices and economic development. And we need communication professionals to get our message across to foreign audiences.

These civilians are our best hope for defusing religious extremism and defeating international terrorism long-term. They are found in the State Department, the U.S. Agency for International Development and other civilian agencies. The military's encroachment into traditionally civilian activities risks blurring lines of authority and weakening the secretary of state's lead role in foreign policy.

Worse, it could actually hurt our anti-terror efforts by giving too strong a military cast to our programs and policies, fueling suspicion and resentment overseas.

The shift is not the result of carefully considered policy. Often, the Pentagon is taking on these civilian responsibilities simply because it has the money to do so. Currently we have almost a 14:1 ratio of military spending to spending on the diplomatic and foreign aid agencies. The president's new budget for fiscal 2008 seeks an increase in routine defense spending (excluding supplemental requests for Afghanistan and Iraq) over the fiscal 2006 appropriation of some $71 billion. This two-year increase alone is roughly twice what we spend on the entire civilian foreign affairs budget.

And because the Pentagon now has authority to conduct its own foreign assistance programs, albeit with the "concurrence" of the State Department, the likelihood increases of skewing the balance between civilian and military programs. In the Dominican Republic, for instance, the Pentagon has $7.5 million to offer for military equipment and training, but only $800,000 in U.S. funds goes to public diplomacy.

While the military has received hefty budget increases since September 11, 2001, Congress has shortchanged the president's requests for civilian foreign affairs funding by $5.6 billion. Yet it is precisely vigorous action by those agencies that we need for success.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff members who recently visited a number of embassies to assess the impact of our growing military presence found that our ambassadors and a number of foreign officials are concerned. In particular, in countries where U.S. military assistance now exceeds our traditional economic aid, they worry that the U.S. ambassador could lose effective leadership of the bilateral relationship in-country as well as control over the coordination between Pentagon and civilian agencies.

I welcome the increased resources the military brings, and I believe strong military-to-military relations are an important ingredient in winning cooperation against terrorism. But the administration and Congress should adopt three important principles to bolster our civilian forces in the campaign against terror.

Full authority for ambassadors. An ambassador is the personal representative of the president and must direct all U.S. government activities in-country. That means he or she must be consulted ahead of time on all planned U.S. military activities and programs, and must have authority to overrule the Pentagon when necessary.

One voice in foreign policy. All security assistance, like other foreign aid, should go through the secretary of state, who should rationalize and prioritize our many assistance programs according to the president's strategic vision.

Match money to mission. Civilian foreign policy agencies get far less funding than they need. The administration should develop a comprehensive spending plan for robust diplomatic capability and assistance in every country important to our anti-terror campaign. Money should flow to the agencies with the expertise to accomplish the mission, rather than assigning the mission to whomever happens to have the money to pay for it.

Richard Lugar of Indiana is the Republican leader of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Taliban Offensive Expected In Spring (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Some observers worry that NATO forces in Afghanistan have failed to seize the initiative.

KANDAHAR, AFGHANISTAN — As the U.S. Black Hawk helicopter skimmed low over the desert, the signs of approaching spring were everywhere: melting frost in the hollows, the first shoots of green in the nearby fields, shrinking snowcaps on distant peaks.

In coming weeks, winter will loosen its grip on Afghanistan. Senior NATO generals insist that their troops are well positioned to confront the Taliban offensive that is expected to follow.

But some analysts, diplomats and other observers think the Western alliance, and the Afghan government it supports, has failed to use winter's relative lull in fighting to seize the initiative in advance of a new battle with the insurgents.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces in the south are being bolstered, but the influx of about 3,000 additional troops is privately described by field commanders as both tardy and considerably smaller than what they had hoped for.

The reinforcements will come almost exclusively from the United States and Britain; troop commitments by other alliance members have failed to materialize.

In some key districts, Taliban militants have reinfiltrated areas they were driven from months ago. Even before the start of any large-scale offensive, the insurgents are demonstrating an ability to capture territory, including their brazen seizure of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province this month.

DOJ_NMG_0133443

With Western troop levels at their highest since the fall of the Taliban in 2001, including a record 26,000 U.S. soldiers, senior NATO officials in Kabul, the capital, described the insurgents as scattered and demoralized after defeats last year — the bloodiest year of the conflict, with about 4,000 people killed.

The Taliban harbored ambitions of seizing Kandahar, the movement's onetime stronghold, but were blocked in that drive last autumn, though fighting came within 10 miles of the city.

"2006 was a year of Taliban failure," said British Gen. David Richards, who turned over command of NATO forces to U.S. Army Gen. Dan McNeill this month. "The Taliban did not achieve a single objective…. We proved that NATO can and will defeat the Taliban militarily."

But commanders of remote coalition outposts that have come under frequent hit-and-run attacks this winter describe a resourceful and determined foe they think will be back in force to fight again.

"They're hard-core — very determined, very disciplined. They know the ground and they know how to fight, and they know how to adapt to changing conditions," said Canadian army Capt. Piers Pappin, whose mud-walled, thatched-roof outpost in the desert west of Kandahar was repeatedly attacked by bands of insurgents, even during the supposed winter lull.

Insurgent commandants have boasted that in coming months they will step up the use of crude yet lethal tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings, with which they can counter NATO troops' vastly superior firepower.

Suicide attacks increased fivefold in 2006, and the use of remotely detonated devices nearly doubled from the previous year, according to U.S. military figures.

'The call of extremists'

In Afghanistan's impoverished south, which is expected to be the focal point of fighting in the spring and summer, the slow pace of reconstruction has hurt allied military efforts to build the trust of villagers.

"While the growing insurgency is attracting increasing attention, long-term efforts to build the solid governmental institutions a stable Afghanistan requires are faltering," the Brussels-based International Crisis Group said in a report released at the end of January. As a result, "disillusioned, disenfranchised Afghans are … responding to the call of extremists."

Aid groups and nongovernmental organizations have characterized the reconstruction effort as falling far short of the targets set a year ago by Western nations and the Afghan government.

"So much could have been done over the winter to make these people's lives better," said Norine MacDonald, who works in Kandahar province in village outreach programs sponsored by the nonprofit Senlis Council. "Instead, their situation is getting worse all the time."

Heading into the next round of fighting, the dubious efficacy of the Afghan army is also a growing cause for concern. Coalition goals call for the force to expand to 80,000 troops by next year, but at this point, struggling with a high desertion rate, it is fielding about 20,000.

Senior Western military officials put a positive face on the progress made in arming and training the force. But field-level allied officers who work closely with the Afghan troops privately predict that it will take many years to shape them into a professional army capable of confronting the insurgents on their own.

The Afghan troops protest that they are counted on to smooth over anger when NATO operations result in civilian deaths and injuries. At least 100 Afghan civilians died last year at the hands of allied forces, according to New York-based Human Rights Watch, and Afghan rights groups put the figure many times higher.

"Whenever they do something that is against our culture, people get angry, very angry," said Lt. Col. Sheehin Shah Kabandi, a regional Afghan army commander in Kandahar. "We remind them again and again: If you enter someone's house by breaking down his door, that man and all his relatives are your enemy forever."

Local resentment is sometimes inflamed by what Western military officials see as an effort by Afghans to better their lot. In the Panjwayi district outside Kandahar, NATO troops for months have been bulldozing vineyards, arbors and orchards to build three wide roads radiating from their bases. Alliance officials say the roads will be an economic boon to villagers.

But some farmers said that promised compensation never arrived and that the roads appeared to be mainly for the troops' use.

"What do we gain?" said a weathered villager named Rahmatullah, bent nearly double under a load of dry sticks. "My grapes are gone, and I have nothing.

"I'm angry at the Taliban who were hiding here, but I'm angry at them too," he said, pointing with his chin toward NATO combat engineers leveling ground for the latest stretch of road.

Civilian casualties

As they seek to benefit from any NATO missteps, the insurgents have honed their tactics. Western commanders describe how the insurgents seed an area with arms caches, then blend with farmers and villagers until they are ready to pick up their weapons and fight.

DOJ_NMG_0133444

One commander at an outpost near Kandahar said he was grudgingly impressed when Afghan men who later proved to be insurgents loitered in a field by day, stacking stones that hours later were used to precisely position a rocket-propelled grenade launcher for a nighttime attack.

During a sweep last month, NATO soldiers found a compound that apparently had been used as an insurgent field hospital, with bandages, syringes and painkillers, within 200 yards of a troop outpost.

When the insurgents are able to establish themselves in a populated area, coalition forces face a difficult decision: whether to risk civilian casualties by attacking.

Musa Qala, a town in Helmand province's poppy-growing belt that was overrun by the Taliban early this month after a British-brokered truce collapsed, is a case in point.

NATO used a pinpoint airstrike to kill the Taliban commander who had led the takeover and said it would evict the rest of the insurgents when it was ready to do so. But military officials acknowledged it would be difficult to dislodge the Taliban fighters without inflicting civilian casualties, even though many residents had fled.

Civilian deaths have become a highly sensitive subject, particularly after Afghan President Hamid Karzai publicly broke into tears late last year while imploring allied troops to be more careful.

Bombers-in-waiting

Air power has become a much-relied-on advantage for coalition troops, but in addition to the risk of civilian casualties, springtime fighting will bring other challenges: for example, keeping helicopters and other aircraft in the skies when dust storms send columns of fine, sandy grit thousands of feet aloft.

Low-altitude surveillance carries the risk of drawing fire, but from higher altitudes "it's really hard to tell what's a threat and what isn't," said Sgt. Scott Campbell, a Black Hawk gunner with the Army's 10th Mountain Division at the Kandahar base.

Travel on the ground is also dangerous. Over the last several months, Taliban commanders have boasted that hundreds of would-be suicide bombers are waiting to be sent into action. Afghan and coalition arrest figures seem to bear out the claim; during one recent week, nearly a dozen suspected bombers-in-waiting were detained in and around Kandahar.

As a result, coalition convoys tend to race through the city after dark rather than moving about freely during the day.

Late one moonless night last month, NATO soldiers prepared for a run that would take their armored vehicles through downtown Kandahar and deep into the desert. With the engines rumbling, they listened to a squad commander's grim and detailed litany of attacks that had taken place recently in the area.

"What I'd say is this: Try not to stop," he told them. "Really try not to stop."

Everyone nodded.

U.S.-led Coalition Helicopter Crashes In Southeastern Afghanistan (AP)

AP, February 17, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A U.S.-led coalition helicopter crashed Sunday in southeastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure, a coalition statement said. An official said the helicopter was not shot down.

"It was not enemy fire related," said Col. Tom Collins, spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force. "The pilot was able to radio in that he was having engine problems. We're confident it was not due to enemy action."

It wasn't immediately clear how many people were on board or what type of helicopter it was. The coalition has launched a search and rescue operation for the helicopter and its occupants, said U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta.

"For the safety of the people on board, we will not release the number of people on board until rescue operations are complete," Accetta said. "Rescue operations are underway."

Accetta also declined to give details about the model of the helicopter and the exact location of the crash.

The mountainous region of southeastern Afghanistan is under the command of U.S.-led forces.

Helicopter Crashes In Afghanistan (BBC)

BBC.com, February 17, 2007

The US-led coalition has said one of its helicopters has crashed in south-eastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure.

The helicopter is reported to be an American Chinook, but the coalition did not give any more details.

An operation has been mounted to locate and rescue the helicopter's occupants.

Coalition and Nato forces have lost several helicopters in Afghanistan in the last few years but only one is thought to have been shot down.

Taleban claim

"It was not enemy fire related," Col Tom Collins, of Nato's International Security Assistance Force (Isaf), was quoted by the Associated Press news agency as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0133445

The Chinook is regularly used as a troop carrier in Afghanistan

"The pilot was able to radio in that he was having engine problems. We're confident it was not due to enemy action."

The helicopter crashed in the Shah Joy district of Zabul province. The province borders Pakistan and has been the scene of Taleban activity recently.

A Taleban spokesman said the helicopter had been shot down, but the BBC's Alastair Leithead in Kabul says they frequently make similar claims that are unfounded.

There is no indication as to whether the helicopter was on a military mission.

Our correspondent says the helicopter was based in Bagram airbase, near Kabul, where the weather has been poor.

But he said the weather further south in Zabul has been clearer.

Nato and coalition forces in Afghanistan are bracing for an expected spring offensive from regrouping Taleban fighters.

NATO Troops Mistakenly Kill Afghan Man (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

NATO-led forces in southern Afghanistan shot to death an Afghan civilian mistaken for a suicide bomber because of twine and straps protruding from his jacket, the alliance said Sunday.

The man was crossing a road Saturday about seven miles west of Kandahar and appeared to be approaching a NATO convoy, said a statement from NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

"He appeared to be chanting and refused to heed warnings to stop," a NATO statement said. "As he continued his approach, members of the convoy noted what appeared to be a device with wires protruding from it on his chest."

The man failed to stop after the troops fired two warning shots, said Capt. Andre Salloum, an ISAF spokesman in Kandahar. They then shot him.

The troops searched the man and found that "he had twine, straps and other materials protruding from his jacket, which resembled wires, but there were no explosives," the statement said.

It was the second such civilian shooting Saturday in Kandahar.

NATO-led troops shot to death another Afghan man on Saturday as he ran between vehicles of a military convoy stopped near Kandahar's military airfield. The troops fired upon him after he failed to heed warning shots.

President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly called on U.S. and NATO-led troops to exercise extreme caution to prevent civilian casualties. Dozens of civilian deaths during operations by foreign troops have undermined his authority among Afghans.

Coalition Copter Crashes In Afghanistan; Search Launched (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- A coalition helicopter went down in southeastern Afghanistan early Sunday after reporting an engine failure, according to a statement issued by the coalition headquarters in Bagram.

A search-and-rescue operation for the helicopter and its occupants was launched. "An investigation will be conducted into the cause of the incident," the statement said.

No further information was immediately available.

Also Saturday, NATO troops in southern Afghanistan shot and killed a man they mistakenly thought was a suicide bomber, according to NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

The incident occurred near Kandahar Airfield, in Kandahar province, and involved ISAF personnel.

ISAF said a man had been running "between the vehicles of a stopped convoy."

ISAF troops "believing he might be a suicide bomber, attempted to stop him. A gunner on one of the vehicles flashed a light at the individual after he kept moving toward the convoy, then fired warning shots. When the individual failed to stop, ISAF forces fired upon him."

They later determined the man -- who died at a medical facility at Kandahar Airfield -- was not carrying explosives.

"ISAF deeply regrets this loss of life" ISAF spokesperson Lt. Col. Angela Billings said in the statement.

"ISAF forces attempted to warn the individual away from the convoy, but he did not respond. Local nationals are encouraged to keep clear of all convoys, whether they are moving or stopped, to avoid further incidents," the statement said.

On Thursday, President Bush warned that U.S. and NATO forces can expect a heating up of the Taliban offensive as the snow melts in the mountains of eastern Afghanistan.

In comments to the American Enterprise Institute, Bush said "fierce fighting" will continue in the Afghan-Pakistani frontier region, but he vowed that international forces are ready.

DOJ_NMG_0133446

"Taliban and al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks," Bush said. "Our strategy is not to be on the defensive but to go on the offense. This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan and it's going to be a NATO offensive, and that's part of our strategy."

Bush described the resurgence of Taliban and their attacks in 2006 as the "most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country."

The Afghan Crucible (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

'LAST YEAR, THE NUMBER of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold." That's not a quote from one of the president's critics about Iraq — it's from the president himself, and he was talking about Afghanistan.

It's not quite fair to call Afghanistan the war the administration forgot. But it was heartening last week to hear President Bush give a speech about that other war for the first time in his second term, to acknowledge the growing Taliban threat and to call for a renewed U.S. and NATO commitment. Still, military power alone won't make Afghanistan secure — the country must also undergo substantial economic development.

Congress should approve Bush's request for $11.8 billion for the next two years of operations in Afghanistan, but this will not suffice. Without a plan to jump-start reconstruction — and convince the Afghan people that the civil society the West wants to build for them is not just obtainable but worth fighting for — all could be lost.

The old saw that there are no military solutions to political conflicts was never more true than in Afghanistan. Yet, in the five years since U.S. forces toppled the Taliban government with a "light footprint," the Bush administration has never spent enough on reconstruction, opium-crop substitution payments for farmers, road building, education, healthcare or jobs programs — or enough on security to make sure the rebuilding succeeds.

Bush will not get the full support and cooperation of NATO allies until he demonstrates that reconstruction is not a second priority to fighting Al Qaeda. There are serious differences with Germany, which has sent thousands of troops and spent millions in Afghanistan, commanded NATO forces and been responsible for security in the country's north, where Berlin believes its style of nation-building has been notably successful. The government of Angela Merkel has signaled it believes that Washington is relying too heavily on military solutions.

The war effort cannot be allowed to falter over an "Americans are from Mars, Europeans are from Venus" cultural divide on whether to emphasize military commitment or nation-building. Both approaches are necessary.

NATO needs to bear its share of the burden, contributing troops to the fight in the south and continuing to lift conditions on their deployment. And Washington, however distracted by its Iraqi adventure, cannot shortchange the effort to rebuild the nation whose failure led directly to 9/11. The possibility that democracy could fail in Afghanistan is awful to contemplate.

Shooting Pain (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

If you're worried about terrorism, upset about the war in Iraq, and depressed by global chaos, violence and death, cheer up. The U.S. military just invented a weapon that fires a beam of searing pain.

Three weeks ago, it was tested on volunteers at an Air Force base in Georgia. You can watch the video on a military Web site (http://https://www.jnlwp.com/ActiveDenialSystem.asp). Three colonels get zapped, along with an Associated Press reporter. The beam is invisible, but its effects are vivid. Two dozen airmen scatter. The AP guy shrieks and bolts out of the target zone. He says it felt like heat all over his body, as though his jacket were on fire.

The feeling is an illusion. No one is harmed. The beam's energy waves penetrate just 1/64 of an inch into your body, heating your skin like microwaves. They inflame your nerve endings without burning you. This could be the future of warfare: less bloodshed, more pain.

Military technology has always sought a greater precision from a longer range. In the Persian Gulf War, Kosovo and Afghanistan, we exploited the increasing accuracy of laser-guided bombs. In the post-9/11 terrorist hunt and the occupation of Iraq, we've sent hundreds of remotely piloted aerial drones to spy and kill. But the lives protected by drones are ours. The pain beam is more ambitious: It can spare civilians and even the enemy. Precision isn't just the ability to kill. Sometimes, it's the ability to disperse and deter without killing.

That kind of precision is becoming more important. Twelve years ago, the Defense Department observed that our armed forces were increasingly being used for peacekeeping, humanitarian aid and protection of civil society. More of our enemies were blending in with, or disguising themselves as, civilians. Through the media, more eyeballs, hearts and minds could see the infrastructure we destroyed. DOD proposed the development of weapons "to incapacitate personnel or materiel, while minimizing fatalities, permanent injury to personnel, and undesired damage to property and the environment."

Like lethal weapons, nonlethal weapons have evolved from short to long range. Batons and pepper spray required hand-to-hand combat. Water cannons, rubber bullets, beanbag rounds and stingball grenades have extended our reach, but not far enough to keep troops clear of rocks or small-arms fire. Some of those nonlethal weapons are insufficiently discriminate. Tear gas torments a whole crowd, not just the miscreants using the crowd for cover.

Projectiles are also unpredictable. At long range, particularly in crosswinds, rubber bullets can hit the wrong people, or the right people in the wrong places. At close range, they can kill. Look at the absurdly named "FN303 less lethal launcher." It's supposed to fire "nonlethal projectiles at established nonlethal ranges." But when launching things, less lethal is the best you can do.

That's where the pain beam comes in. Unlike projectiles, beams are "directed energy." They travel in a straight line over long distances, ignoring gravity and wind. They cause no more damage at 10 feet than at 1,000. Unlike gas, they discriminate. Raytheon, the pain beam's manufacturer, points out that the weapon "allows precise targeting of specific individuals" and that the pain "ceases immediately" when the beam is diverted or the target flees.

The shift from hardware to software, from matter to energy, can do more than control the unpredictability of weapons. It can control the unpredictability of the people who fire them. Early nonlethal devices, such as rubber bullets and Mace, often caused injuries because of abuse by hotheads. When the pain beam was being developed, somebody accidentally fired it on a high setting, inflicting a second-degree burn. The designers responded by programming limits on the beam's power and duration.

Years of work have gone into making the beam safe. It has been tested thousands of times on 600 volunteers. It has been reviewed and revised by the military's Human Effects Review Board, a Human Effects Advisory Panel made up of nonmilitary experts in the field and military surgeons general. It has been tested for effects on skin cancer, fertility, jewelry and drunks. The results have been published in peer-reviewed journals. Never has an organization that is licensed to kill jumped through so many hoops to make sure nobody gets injured.

The DOD's nonlethal weapons program is a pacifist's dream. Its "vehicle lightweight arresting devices" are built to stop cars with minimal damage, allowing minor injuries only if you're "not wearing a seat belt." Its "acoustic hailing devices" are engineered to deliver sound waves "below Occupational Safety and Health Administration hearing limits for prolonged exposure." Its founding directive pledges to avoid environmental damage. Even the Less Lethal Launcher projectiles are "nontoxic."

But the ability to inflict pain without injury doesn't just make injury less necessary. It makes pain more essential to military operations -- and easier to inflict. To achieve the desired "repel effect," I have to make you suffer. Knowing that your agony will be brief and leave no physical damage makes the weapon easier to fire. It's almost as though, like the flames the AP reporter imagined were engulfing his jacket, your pain isn't real.

That's the metaphysical gap that nonlethal energy weapons exploit. The rain of pain falls mainly in the brain. The long-range acoustic device, for instance, "can target narrow sound beams at excruciating decibel levels, but below the threshold of hearing damage," according to a military account of a presentation by its project manager. Four months ago, Congress passed and President Bush signed legislation to prosecute torture, defined as intentional infliction of "serious physical or mental pain or suffering." But that rule applies only in captivity. On the street, pain administration won't be a crime. It'll be a policy.

Two weeks from now, military leaders will convene in London to discuss the pain beam and the next generation of directed-energy weapons, including microwaves and lasers. Law enforcement agencies are interested. Raytheon is already advertising the technology for commercial applications. The military is even developing a "personnel halting and stimulation response" system -- yes, a PHaSR -- to stun targets instead of killing them. But don't worry, nobody will get hurt. Sort of.

DOJ:

6 Of 7 Dismissed U.S. Attorneys Had Positive Job Evaluations (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

All but one of the U.S. attorneys recently fired by the Justice Department had positive job reviews before they were dismissed, but many ran into political trouble with Washington over issues ranging from immigration to the death penalty, according to prosecutors, congressional aides and others familiar with the cases.

DOJ_NMG_0133448

Two months after the firings first began to make waves on Capitol Hill, it has also become clear that most of the prosecutors were overseeing significant public-corruption investigations at the time they were asked to leave. Four of the probes target Republican politicians or their supporters, prosecutors and other officials said.

The emerging details stand in contrast to repeated statements from the Justice Department that six of the Republican-appointed prosecutors were dismissed because of poor performance. In one of the most prominent examples, agency officials pointed to widely known management and morale problems surrounding then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in San Francisco.

But the assertions enraged the rest of the group, some of whom feel betrayed after staying silent about the way they have been shoved from office.

Bud Cummins, the former U.S. attorney in Little Rock, who was asked to resign earlier than the others to make way for a former White House aide, said Justice Department officials crossed a line by publicly criticizing the performance of his well-regarded colleagues.

"They're entitled to make these changes for any reason or no reason or even for an idiotic reason," Cummins said. "But if they are trying to suggest that people have inferior performance to hide whatever their true agenda is, that is wrong. They should retract those statements."

The decision by Cummins and some of the others to speak out underscores the extent to which the firings have spiraled out of the Justice Department's control. Officials initially sought to obscure the firings even from some senators, and have since issued confusing signals and contradictory information about the episode.

For example, one source who was familiar with the episode said last week that an eighth U.S. attorney was asked to resign in December along with the others. The unidentified prosecutor is negotiating to stay in the job, said the source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of those discussions.

The end result is an unusual spectacle in which Democratic lawmakers are bemoaning the firings of Republican-appointed prosecutors. The political pressure has become so great that Cummins's successor in Arkansas, former White House aide J. Timothy Griffin, announced on Friday that he had decided not to submit his name to the Senate for a permanent appointment.

Lawmakers from both parties are pushing to strip Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales of his power to name replacement U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period, although Republicans blocked that proposal in the Senate last week. The House Judiciary Committee is planning hearings on similar legislation in March.

"I don't know how they could have mishandled this any worse," said one of the fired U.S. prosecutors, who declined to be quoted by name because he feared repercussions.

"There always have traditionally been tensions between main Justice and U.S. attorneys in the districts," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "But it does seem like there's an effort to centralize authority in Washington more than there has been in the past and in prior administrations."

Most of the firings came on Dec. 7, when senior Justice Department official Michael A. Battle -- a former U.S. attorney himself -- called at least six prosecutors to inform them that they were being asked to resign. Battle was apologetic but offered little in the way of explanations, telling some that the order had come from "on high," according to sources familiar with the calls.

In addition to Ryan in San Francisco, the prosecutors who were called that day included Carol S. Lam in San Diego, John McKay in Seattle, David C. Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona. Cummins had been informed of his dismissal last summer but stayed until December.

The breaking point for Cummins and the others was testimony this month by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest had been dismissed for "performance-related" reasons and that Cummins had been pushed out to make room for Griffin.

That testimony "was the moment the gloves came off," said one fired prosecutor who declined to be identified.

Five of the dismissed prosecutors -- Bogden, Charlton, Cummins, Iglesias and McKay -- told reporters that they were not given any reason for their firings and had not been told of any performance problems. Only one of the fired prosecutors, Ryan in San Francisco, faced substantive complaints about turnover or other management-related issues, officials said.

Justice Department officials in recent days have sought to clarify the performance comments, saying the dispute is mired in "semantics." The officials said McNulty was referring to policy differences between the Bush administration and some of its employees. One official also said that the department had not made a list of replacements ahead of time.

"When you are setting national policy, you cannot have U.S. attorneys setting their own policies," said a Justice Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Bogden and Lam are among a handful of declared independents who worked as U.S. attorneys in the Bush administration. The rest of the group are viewed as moderate Republicans who have sometimes been at odds with their Washington bosses or more conservative Republicans.

In Seattle, for example, local Republicans complained to Gonzales about McKay's decision not to intervene in the disputed Washington gubernatorial race in 2006, which a Democrat eventually won by 129 votes.

Lam was the target of repeated complaints from conservative House Republicans, who asserted that she was lax in enforcing immigration laws. The Justice Department also points to drops in the number of firearms cases filed by her office.

Charlton in Arizona clashed with the Justice Department's headquarters on at least two occasions over murder cases in which he opposed seeking the death penalty, including one that prompted an outcry from Navajo groups opposed to the use of capital punishment. He was overruled in both cases, officials said.

"There was no public controversy about any of these; any controversy was within the Justice Department," said J. Grant Woods, a Republican and former Arizona attorney general.

But the cases that have gotten most of the attention among Democrats in Congress involve public-corruption investigations. In San Diego, Lam oversaw the probe that resulted in the guilty plea of then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican. Two others connected to that case, including a former senior CIA official, were indicted two days before Lam left the job on Thursday.

Bogden in Nevada and Charlton in Arizona were also in the midst of investigations targeting current or former Republican members of Congress when they were fired. And in New Mexico, Iglesias's office had been examining alleged wrongdoing involving state Democrats.

Gonzales, McNulty and other Justice Department officials have strongly denied that those investigations played a role in the dismissals.

"The department's commitment to pursuing prosecuting public-corruption cases is clear," said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. "Any suggestion that removal of these particular U.S. attorneys was political or in any way would harm ongoing investigations is 100 percent false."

Ark. U.S. Attorney Appointee Won't Seek Senate Confirmation (AP)

By Jon Gambrell, Associated Press

AP, February 18, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. – An interim U.S. attorney says a “partisan circus” over his recess appointment makes it impossible for him to receive fair consideration, and he will not seek Senate confirmation to his Arkansas district.

However, Tim Griffin can remain at the post without confirmation under a new provision in the Patriot Act that allow recess appointments to last until the end of a president's term, instead of 120 days. That provision was included in the act's reauthorization last year.

The new rules became fuel for hearings when the Democratic-controlled Congress took power this year, with Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., questioning Griffin's appointment.

“They should do the right thing and name another interim appointment,” said Michael Teague, a spokesman for Pryor. “Let's get back to the way the founding fathers saw this process working.”

Griffin left open whether he would remain in the position until the end of President Bush's term, but he said he has not looked for another job.

“The upside is I'm here in the job and will remain in the job until such time the White House asks me to move on,” Griffin said Friday.

Griffin, 38, is a former military lawyer who worked in the White House under Karl Rove as a special assistant to the president. He replaced former U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins in a December recess appointment.

White House officials did not immediately comment on Griffin's decision. In a statement, Department of Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was “disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation.”

“We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed,” Talamona said.

Senators continue to debate a bill that would change the provision of the Patriot Act that allows the indefinite appointments and return to the 120-day deadline for legislative approval.

Politicizing Justice (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, February 18, 2007

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty just couldn't tell a lie. So when pressed during Senate hearings on the unceremonious firing of seven U.S. attorneys, Mr. McNulty had to concede that politics did play a role in dumping the chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark. The replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, was an FOK - friend of Karl. That's Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser and key Republican strategist.

You can't get any more political than that.

With Arkansas Sen. Mark Pryor raising serious questions about the appointment, Mr. Griffin wisely withdrew his name for permanent consideration.

Mr. McNulty and his boss at the Justice Department, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, should stop conning the American people. Their explanation for the firings - that they were "performance-related" - is pure poppycock. Congress should move swiftly to repeal an aspect of the Patriot Act that gives the attorney general the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period of time, which could result in someone serving in this powerful post without congressional consent. Mr. Gonzales doesn't deserve this power.

His recent firings show what matters to Mr. Gonzales, and it isn't performance:

Consider the dismissal of the U.S. attorney in San Diego, Carol S. Lam. She successfully prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican, for influence peddling.

Then there's John McKay, U.S. attorney in Seattle. He had received a glowing report from Justice Department auditors last year, and a follow-up letter from a Justice official congratulating him on the good work. That same official called him in December, and without explanation told him his time in office was over. The chief judge of the federal court there took the unusual step of speaking out in defense of Mr. McKay, calling him "absolutely superb."

And there was the U.S. attorney in Nevada, Daniel G. Bogden, who, in comments to the Las Vegas Review-Journal, said he was given no indication his performance was a problem.

U.S. attorneys have enormous power. By politicizing the appointments, the Bush administration has diminished their ability to fairly and judiciously carry out their responsibility.

A New Crimefighter In Town (STPPP)

By Ellen Tomson

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 18, 2007

Rachel Paulose is a U.S. attorney who is comfortable quoting Bible verses. She believes it is a blessing to live in a country where a person can take on crime, terror and corruption.

The daughter of immigrants who support her every move, she works herself hard, shorts herself on sleep and sacrifices her social life in the pursuit of justice.

Meeting her for the first time, you might not detect her underlying strengths. She easily disarms you.

Glimpsed down a hallway at the federal courthouse in Minneapolis, she's a slight, 5-foot-6-inch figure who moves gracefully from an open office doorway. She's wearing her dark hair long down her back. She's smiling as she offers a greeting and a handshake.

"The greatest reward is seeing the impact we have on people's lives," she says. That's the kind of statement that normally prompts eye rolls. But Paulose's intensity sidetracks questions about her sincerity.

At 33, she's the youngest current U.S. attorney and the first woman to serve in the position in Minnesota.

She manages some 50 assistant U.S. attorneys in an office that examines and seeks to successfully prosecute the most repulsive and harmful of crimes.

She points with pride to the more-than-20-year prison sentences obtained by her office in three child pornography cases during the past six months and then, referring to predators as yet uncaught, she promises: "We're going to find you, hold you, and you're going to do a long time in federal prison."

"The crimes have become more depraved, more heinous, and the victims are subjected to particularly sadistic forms of abuse that the general public would find unimaginable," she says. "The reality is that good people don't know about this because they're not online looking."

'THIS COUNTRY IS A GIFT TO THE WORLD'

PPaulose (pronounced "Paul-us") was 8 when she asked for a Time magazine subscription for her next birthday. She was in elementary school when she organized her first political rally.

Her mother recalls, "She was always interested in understanding what was going on around her — and wanted to make a difference.

"She's very strong in what she believes in, whether it is moral values, spiritual values or effects on society," Lucy Paulose says.

Rachel Paulose's family background and faith are keys to understanding her patriotism and the passion she brings to her work.

DOJ_NMG_0133451

"I have a great appreciation of how special this country is," she says. "I believe this country is a gift to the world."

Her grandfather, a government official in India, came to the United States to study theology in the 1960s.

"I have a hard time talking about this without becoming emotional," Paulose says, her eyes suddenly welling with tears. Her family, she explains, "came here hoping for the American dream at a time when the Communists were basically sweeping across Southeast Asia."

Her last name is Greek and derives from a branch of her ancestry that included a Greek Orthodox bishop. Her first name and middle name, Kunjummen, are drawn from the Semitic origins of ancestors from the Middle East. But her family converted to Christianity, most likely in the first century after St. Thomas is said to have traveled to India. She and her family currently attend Plymouth Bible Chapel.

Paulose's grandparents Daniel and Sara Kunjummen have lived in Bloomington for 40 years, but she grew up in Findlay, Ohio, a 30-minute drive from Toledo. Paulose graduated from high school a year early, and the family moved to Minnesota after her mother received job offers here and Paulose was accepted to the University of Minnesota.

Paulose's father, Joseph, is a Hopkins school district administrator and former economics professor in India. Her mother owns Home Electronic Specialists in Hudson, Wis.

They raised Rachel and her younger sister, Elizabeth Schulte, with the idea "you have to have a passion for what you do and should make a difference," says Lucy Paulose. "Enjoy the journey, but make this a better place."

Paulose's parents, as well as an extended family of more than 100 relatives who have settled in the United States, have always provided a tight network of support.

While in high school, Paulose was selected for the American Legion-sponsored Girls State and elected governor in the mock government and citizenship program. She recalls her parents' patience when she changed her mind three times about what she wanted to wear after she was elected Girls State "governor." They drove home to retrieve each outfit.

Throughout high school, college and even while preparing for the bar exam, Paulose's parents stayed up late with her while she studied, providing help, snacks and hot chocolate. After Paulose was accepted to both Harvard and Yale law schools, an uncle accompanied her on a trip to New England to help her decide between the two. When Paulose moved briefly to Washington to work for the Justice Department, another uncle helped her find a place to live and helped her move in. And Paulose's grandfather, who was disappointed when she chose law over medicine after three years as a pre-med student, nevertheless indicated his pride in her by providing her registration fee for law school.

Many family members were present at her Yale Law School commencement to see Paulose, chosen as the law school's representative, carry a banner in the procession.

"So many people in my family had invested in me," she says. "It was the culmination of years and years of hard work by all of us."

'ETHICAL IN EVERYTHING SHE DOES'

IIn just 10 years, Paulose has compiled an impressive record. After graduating from Yale Law School, she snagged a sought-after position in Minneapolis as a law clerk to James Loken, chief judge of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. She worked for four years in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm and served in the U.S. Justice Department as an Attorney General's Honors Program trial attorney for the civil rights division.

She also prosecuted criminal and civil cases as an assistant U.S. attorney for Minnesota; served as senior counsel to Acting Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, and as the Justice Department's special counsel for health care fraud.

Nevertheless, her appointment a year ago as U.S. attorney for the District of Minnesota was headline news and raised a few eyebrows.

The appointment departed from normal practice. For the first time in decades, an interim U.S. attorney was sent directly from the Department of Justice to fill the job in Minnesota. Traditionally, interim appointees have come from within the Minnesota office, promoted either from first assistant U.S. attorney or chief of the criminal division.

"There were plenty of women who wanted that job — and plenty of men, too," says A.M. "Sandy" Keith, former chief justice of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

Keith and others who know Paulose describe her as well qualified for her job, which includes taking on corrupt public officials and law enforcement officers — "policing the police," as Paulose describes it.

Hank Shea, a fellow at the University of St. Thomas Law School's Holloran Center for Ethical Leadership in the Professions, worked with Paulose from 1999 to 2002. The fact that she began working in the U.S. attorney's office as a law student and now leads the office, he says, "shows a real commitment to public service on her part."

"Her integrity is unbelievably high, and she is ethical in everything she does. For the top federal attorney in a state, there are no more important qualities than those."

Paulose works 10 to 12 hours a day, six days a week, and forces herself to leave her office no later than 8 p.m. on some days by scheduling workouts. She's serious in every endeavor she undertakes, including exercise. Kickboxing and karate are her favorite sports.

"I've had my share of injuries," she says during a recent interview in a corner conference room at her office. In fact, her injuries have been numerous, including a concussion and broken collarbone.

She grins as she extends one foot to show the location of a scar and a swollen ankle.

She's normally media shy, prefers press releases to interviews and is particular about how she is portrayed. She refused to have her picture taken in a non-work venue, for example.

"I'm wearing a suit, and I'm going to be in my office," she stated firmly. Her suggestion for the background of the photo? The American flag.

'A FAST LEARNER'

PPaulose graduated summa cum laude from the University of Minnesota, where she was a member of Phi Beta Kappa and a Truman Scholar.

Keith met her while she served as a student representative on the university's Board of Regents. Even then, Paulose was a newsmaker, objecting to proposed tuition increases, which she argued would deny poor students access to the university.

Keith, a Yale Law School graduate, became her mentor. He is executive director of the Rochester Downtown Alliance and displays her photo in his office.

After law school, Paulose clerked for Loken from 1997 to 1998. Loken, a Harvard Law School graduate and former longtime partner at Faegre & Benson, receives about 300 applicants for the three clerk positions he offers each year.

"I look for academic superstardom, undergraduate years as well as law school, first and foremost, because that's the most likely guarantor of someone who can do the incredibly difficult analytical work required," says the judge, who assigns his clerks separate cases. He estimates he judges 600 to 800 cases a year, writing 50 to 60 opinions to be published in law books, in addition to writing shorter orders and papers not requiring published opinions.

Because the work is intense and his office is small — just himself, a secretary and the three clerks — he says, "I also look for people who would be fun to spend a year with." Paulose's interview was "delightful and her zeal pretty apparent," he recalls.

Paulose is his "first former clerk to be confirmed by the (U.S.) Senate for anything," Loken notes. She is also likely the only one working as a prosecutor. Most former clerks are in private practice.

"She's come a long way very, very rapidly, and the reason is she's very, very competent and can do the job, obviously," Keith says. "She's tough, a fast learner, very hard working, disciplined, focused and is very, very skilled."

She is also adept at figuring out how an office or organization functions, how to get to know the right people in the right places and what she needs to learn to move up, he says.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appointed Paulose as Minnesota's acting U.S. attorney a year ago. She replaced Thomas Heffelfinger, whom she had worked under previously.

Gonzales has fired some top federal prosecutors, replacing them with attorneys regarded as more conservative and, some critics say, less likely to buck Washington. Some current and former prosecutors allege the changes are an attempt by the Bush administration to curb prosecutors' independence.

The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process, and while Paulose's name is sometimes mentioned in the context of the recent firing and hiring controversy, the circumstances of her appointment and confirmation were different.

Heffelfinger, her predecessor, was expected to continue in the job but surprised the Justice Department when he announced his resignation.

"I left for personal and financial reasons and delayed announcing my departure until the last minute to avoid being a lame duck," Heffelfinger says.

Unlike other new appointees named by Gonzales last March, Paulose was named to her position in mid-February, following Heffelfinger's announcement. And, unlike some other appointees, she was confirmed by the U.S. Senate (in December). Her investiture ceremony is set for next month.

'A SENSE OF MISSION'

TThe six priorities of her office include terrorism, violent crime, drug trafficking, cybercrime, government and corporate corruption, and civil rights, especially as they relate to human trafficking and housing discrimination.

Her job is a vantage point for Minnesota's worst problems and also involves anticipating worst-case scenarios. As she refers to two high-profile cases charging terrorism, for example, she notes the state's "points of vulnerability," which include a portion of the longest unarmed border in the world, a trucking industry that is among the most active in the country and an inland harbor that is one of the largest in the world.

Ordinary citizens sometimes need to be educated about crime that they may not notice but is taking its societal toll nevertheless. Several months ago, she co-wrote an editorial in an effort to make people more aware of the negative effects of methamphetamine, "the Number 1 narcotics threat in Minnesota." The manufacture and use of the drug harms not just users, she says, but also families and children because people are making it in their garages and homes.

She also wants people to know that human trafficking, a form of modern slavery for sex and labor, is more relevant to Minnesota than most of us realize. Recent immigrant populations, particularly Hmong and Somali, are especially vulnerable. Her office recently indicted one case and is investigating several others in an effort to shut down and deter smuggling rings of human traffickers.

In one case, a professional couple held someone from a developing country as a worker, against the person's will, and paid the person nothing. In other instances, young women are held as sexual slaves and "tortured or threatened to prevent them from escaping," she says.

Paulose refers to her job in the public sector, which is a lot less lucrative than many of the private practice jobs held by her peers, as "a privilege" and "an opportunity to serve." She especially thrives, she says, when she works with others who also "have a sense of mission."

As an appointee with Republican ties, she could be replaced when President Bush leaves office. So, what might be next for Paulose? Politics?

"No!" she says. But she would love to stay in public service and in Minnesota.

She cites a Bible verse, Micah 6:8: " 'What does the Lord require of you but to do justice, to love kindness and to walk humbly with your God. …'

"When I keep my focus on those things, good opportunities appear."

CRIMINAL LAW:

'McMissile' Moment Lands Mom In Jail (WP)

By Theresa Vargas, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Driver Gets Felony Conviction For Tossing Cup of Ice Into Car

To the locals, it's the "McMissile" case.

And like the name, the details of it spill forth like a bad joke: A woman is driving north on Interstate 95. Three kids squirm in the back seat, and her sister, six months pregnant and having early contractions, sits in the front. The stress starts to simmer. Traffic slows, then crawls, then creeps. More stress. A car cuts in front of her, then scoots away. A short time later, it darts in again. She can no longer take it. She veers onto the shoulder and speeds up. Wham! She tosses a large McDonald's cup filled with ice into the other car.

"From my side, I heard a whoomp," recalled the woman's sister, LaJeanna Porter, 27. "I was like, 'I know you didn't throw that cup.' She said, 'Yes I did.' "

Neither woman foresaw the seemingly supersize repercussions of that misguided moment July 2.

No one was injured, but the cup launcher, Jessica Hall, 25, of Jacksonville, N.C., was charged and convicted by a Stafford County jury of maliciously throwing a missile into an occupied vehicle, a felony in Virginia. The instructions given to the jury said that "any physical object can be considered a missile. A missile can be propelled by any force, including throwing."

Hall, a mother of three young children whose husband is serving his third tour in Iraq, has spent more than a month in jail.

The jury sentenced her to two years in prison, the minimum, and a judge will formally impose a sentence Wednesday. Under state law, the judge can only decrease the jury's sentence.

"We didn't think it would go this far," Hall said in an interview at the Rappahannock Regional Jail. "Two years! What did I do?"

There are two versions of what happened that day. The occupants of both cars agree on this: It was hot, the kind of hot in which legs stick to leather seats, and the traffic was barely moving, slowed by a fatal crash up the road in Prince William County.

In one car, driver Pete Ballin, 36, and girlfriend Eliza Fowle, 28, were heading home to the District after visiting her father in North Carolina. They said they were maneuvering through the stalled traffic, not even noticing Hall until the Mickey-D moment.

"I guess we inadvertently merged back in front of her," Fowle said. "She apparently took that as some sort of aggressive maneuver on our part."

DOJ_NMG_0133454

The next thing they knew, Fowle said, Hall was pulling up in the emergency lane and "chucking a big, supersized McDonald's cup at us." It flew diagonally across Ballin and onto Fowle. "It was gross and sticky and got all over me and the front of our car, the dashboard and the windshield," Fowle said.

Hall, whose family was driving from North Carolina to New York for a family party, saw the situation differently. She said she had never driven that route and was trying to keep up with her father's truck when Ballin cut in front of her the second time, causing her to swerve onto the shoulder. She said she was worried because her sister's bulging belly almost slammed into the dashboard.

Hall's next move was wrong, she said, but she felt provoked.

"It was past me ignoring him. I'm not going to lie; I was cursing him," she said. "I took the McDonald's cup. I tossed it over my car."

She never fathomed that it would land her in jail for the first time in her life, wearing a standard-issue jumpsuit frayed up both legs and learning to curl her hair using toilet paper. Not even when she saw Ballin talking to the state trooper up the highway, or when she was arrested and released on her own recognizance, or even when a trial date was set for Jan. 3.

Even when Ballin testified, Hall said, "I'm thinking about what I'm going to cook when I get home."

"I passed out when they said guilty, two years," she added. "I became a convicted felon."

Fowle stands by the couple's decision to report the crime but concedes that even she and Ballin were surprised at the conviction.

"I think that this is way too much of a punishment for her actions. This is just to me absolutely ridiculous," Fowle said. Community service would have made more sense, she said. "It's something that's going to make someone realize I did screw up, and I'm going to remember this, and I'm not going to do something like this again."

Hall's attorney, public defender Terence Patton, did not return calls for comment. Nor did Commonwealth's Attorney Daniel M. Chichester or Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney George Elsasser, who handled the case.

Elsasser argued in court that had Ballin been hit by the drink, he might have gotten into a serious accident with injuries. Hall also was found guilty of reckless driving, assault against Ballin and assault and battery against Fowle. For her conviction on those charges, the jury recommended she be fined $1,000.

According to court documents, Hall is unemployed and, with her husband's salary, the couple takes in $30,384 a year. She receives $388 a month in food stamps.

"It doesn't seem right for her not to be around," said Porter, who is watching one of Hall's three children, ages 4, 6 and 8. The younger two are with their grandparents. "We just hope that whatever they do, don't let them keep her. Without her, I don't know what I'll do."

Hall said she has cried every day she has spent locked up and wakes most days to find clumps of hair on her pillow from the stress. She shares a cell with two other women and spends 19 hours a day in the cell, she said.

When Hall talks about the incident, she sometimes jokes about how she will only fly over Virginia from now on and says other inmates sometimes throw things in her direction and say, "Watch out McMissile."

But in other moments, when she talks about the reality of a felony conviction, her expression goes blank. She was supposed to start nursing school the day after she was sent to jail, and she wonders what job she will be able to get once potential employers do a background check.

"Now people are going to see me as an angry, road rage, convicted felon. And it really upsets me," she said. "I must have been wrong . . . but seriously, God. Lesson learned. Lesson learned is one hour in this place."

Hornsby Indictments Revive Questions Of His Time As Yonkers Schools Chief (NYJN)

By David Mckay Wilson, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, February 18, 2007

Former schools chief Andre Hornsby burst on the scene in Yonkers nine years ago with a cadre of Texas educators, fresh from helping transform the Houston school system. He came east to boost test scores and bridge the digital divide in city schools.

With the aid of Cynthia Joffrion, the Texas technology maven who joined him in Yonkers, new computers flooded into classrooms while Hornsby's leadership helped raise test scores. Throughout his stormy 23-month tenure, however, Hornsby was dogged with questions about his dealings with technology vendors.

It turns out that Joffrion, assistant superintendent for technology support services under Hornsby, was among his accusers, according to an FBI affidavit obtained by The Journal News. Joffrion in 1999 told authorities that Hornsby had ordered Yonkers employees to send new computers to his relatives. But then-Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's investigation of those allegations never led to charges after Hornsby caught wind of the probe.

DOJ_NMG_0133455

In hindsight, Hornsby's Yonkers troubles seemed to presage what was to come following his hiring in 2003 as chief executive officer of the school system in Prince George's County, Md., the nation's 18th largest district. It borders Washington and has more than 130,000 students and a budget exceeding $1 billion. Hornsby now awaits trial on a 16-count federal indictment arising from a scheme in which prosecutors say he awarded lucrative technology contracts that benefited himself and close associates.

One of the case's key witnesses appears to be none other than Joffrion, who cooperated in Pirro's investigation as well as the FBI inquiry that led to Hornsby's downfall, according to documents and interviews.

Hornsby stepped down from his $250,000-a-year post in 2006 just before his indictment.

"What a travesty," said former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, who backed Hornsby's hiring in 1998 but then urged his firing less than two years later. "We got rid of him, then he goes to Prince George's, he rips those people off, and they finally catch him. They should have caught him here."

Joffrion, who played a central role in the Westchester and Maryland probes, left Yonkers in June 2000, two weeks after Hornsby was fired. She later worked on technology issues for the Mount Vernon school district before becoming a private consultant. Attempts to reach Joffrion were unsuccessful.

"I think she was in over her head," recalled retired Yonkers teacher Florence McCue, who worked with Joffrion on computer issues. "I think her position was more than she bargained for. But she was the technology person, and she was good at talking."

Details of the aborted Westchester investigation are included in an affidavit from the Maryland case, made by FBI Special Agent John Sheridan in 2005 as he sought a warrant to seize Hornsby's office computers.

The FBI affidavit does not identify Joffrion, but refers to her as a cooperating witness who worked on technology issues with Hornsby in Texas in the late 1990s and joined him as an assistant superintendent in Yonkers in the fall of 1998. Joffrion was hired in Yonkers on Sept. 28, 1998. It also identifies the cooperating witness as the complainant to Yonkers Inspector General Phil Zisman in 1999 regarding a questionable computer deal. Zisman said Joffrion made such a complaint.

Zisman said Joffrion came to his office in 1999 with allegations concerning the school district's deal with both Compaq and Apple computers, in which the manufacturers sold computers in bundles of 10 and provided one or two extra units as an incentive. Joffrion alleged that Hornsby told her to send the extra computers to his relatives, and threatened to fire her when she refused. The computers were sent, according to the FBI affidavit.

"We basically did some preliminary investigation and referred it to the district attorney," Zisman said. "We thought the information was accurate. I think there was criminality. He was not prosecuted. You can ask Mrs. Pirro about that."

During Pirro's investigation, Joffrion recorded about 40 telephone and in-person conversations with Hornsby, according to the affidavit. Before the issuance of search warrants in connection with the computers, Hornsby was informed of the search by a friend and two others whose names are blacked out in the affidavit.

"(They) notified Hornsby so he could dispose of the evidence," the affidavit stated.

Hornsby's attorney, Robert Bonsib, did not return phone or e-mail messages.

Pirro spokesman Michael Edelman said Pirro was unavailable for comment.

Pirro's successor, District Attorney Janet DiFiore, has cooperated with the U.S. Justice Department's investigation of Hornsby, sending material from the Westchester probe, which was conducted by Pirro's Public Integrity Unit, said DiFiore spokesman Lucien Chalfen.

"Not every investigation leads to a prosecution," he said.

Despite her attempt to blow the whistle on Hornsby in Yonkers, Joffrion maintained contact with him. After he was named CEO in Prince George's County in 2003, he awarded a lucrative contract to Erate Managers LLC, a Texas company operated by Joffrion to obtain low-cost technology services under the federal E-rate program.

According to the affidavit, Joffrion agreed to make kickbacks of $144,000 to Hornsby. At the time, she was cooperating with the FBI, and authorities in December 2004 recorded her giving Hornsby $1,000 as her first payment under the contract.

The indictment also charged Hornsby with mail and wire fraud in connection with a kickback scheme with his live-in girlfriend, who worked for the software company LeapFrog Enterprises Inc., which received a $1 million contract from the district. The indictment states his girlfriend split her $20,000 commission with him. She subsequently pleaded guilty to tax evasion.

No trial date has been set as federal prosecutors and Hornsby's legal team fight over whether Bonsib should be allowed to continue representing Hornsby because he may be called as a witness.

As Hornsby prepares his case, Yonkers residents have reflected on Hornsby's controversial tenure.

"People tend to forget what he accomplished here," said former school board Trustee Maria Chiulli. "We have very old schools, and he brought them up to par electricity-wise, and put computers in every classroom. It saddens me when I hear the bad news. It takes away from our success."

DOJ_NMG_0133456

But former Trustee Tom Weibrecht said Hornsby's legal problems were not unexpected.

"The fact that he was terminated here says it all," Weibrecht said. "His current problems don't surprise me in the least."

Trial In Error (WP)

By Victoria Toensing

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

If You're Going to Charge Scooter, Then What About These Guys?

Could someone please explain to me why Scooter Libby is the only person on trial in the Valerie Plame leak investigation?

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald charged Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff with perjury on the theory that Libby had a nefarious reason for lying to a grand jury about what he told reporters regarding CIA officer Plame: He was trying to cover up a White House conspiracy to retaliate against Plame's husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson had infuriated Vice President Cheney by accusing the Bush administration of lying about intelligence in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Fitzgerald apparently concluded that a purported cover-up was sufficient motive for Libby to trim his recollections in a criminal way. So when Libby's testimony differed from that of others, it was Libby who got indicted.

There's a reason why responsible prosecutors don't bring perjury cases on mere "he said, he said" evidence. Without an underlying crime or tangible evidence of obstruction (think Martha Stewart trying to destroy phone logs), the trial becomes a mishmash of faulty memories in which witnesses can seem as guilty as the defendant. Any prosecutor knows that memories differ, even vividly, and each party can be convinced that his or her version is the truthful one.

If we accept Fitzgerald's low threshold for bringing a criminal case, then why stop at Libby? This investigation has enough questionable motives and shadowy half-truths and flawed recollections to fill a court docket for months. So here are my own personal bills of indictment:

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES PATRICK J. FITZERALD with ignoring the fact that there was no basis for a criminal investigation from the day he was appointed, with handling some witnesses with kid gloves and banging on others with a mallet, with engaging in past contretemps with certain individuals that might have influenced his pursuit of their liberty, and with misleading the public in a news conference because . . . well, just because. To wit:

Â· On Dec. 30, 2003, the day Fitzgerald was appointed special counsel, he should have known (all he had to do was ask the CIA) that Plame was not covert, knowledge that should have stopped the investigation right there. The law prohibiting disclosure of a covert agent's identity requires that the person have a foreign assignment at the time or have had one within five years of the disclosure, that the government be taking affirmative steps to conceal the government relationship, and for the discloser to have actual knowledge of the covert status.

From FBI interviews conducted after Oct. 1, 2003, Fitzgerald also knew that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had identified Plame as a CIA officer to columnist Robert D. Novak, who first published Plame's name on July 14, 2003.

Â· In January 2001, Libby was the lawyer for millionaire financier Marc Rich, whom President Bill Clinton pardoned shortly before leaving office. Fitzgerald, who was then an assistant U.S. attorney in the southern district of New York, and U.S. Attorney James Comey spearheaded the criminal investigation of that pardon.

Â· Fitzgerald jailed former New York Times reporter Judith Miller for almost 90 days for not providing evidence in a matter that involved no crime. Yet the two were engaged in another dispute: Fitzgerald wanted Miller's phone records, contending that by contacting an Islamic charity, she had alerted it to a government search the day before it happened.

Â· Fitzgerald granted immunity to former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer without ever asking what he would testify to; he permitted NBC News bureau chief Tim Russert to be interviewed in a law firm office with his lawyer present, while Novak was forced to testify before the grand jury without counsel present.

Â· Armitage, like Bush adviser Karl Rove, forgot one conversation with a reporter. Fitzgerald threatened Rove with prosecution; Armitage bragged that he didn't even need a lawyer.

Â· In violating prosecutorial ethics by discussing facts outside the indictment during his Oct. 28, 2005, news conference, Fitzgerald made one factual assertion that turned out to be flat wrong: Libby was not "the first official" to reveal Plame's identity.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE CIA for making a boilerplate criminal referral to cover its derriÃ¨re.

The CIA is well aware of the requirements of the law protecting the identity of covert officers and agents. I know, because in 1982, as chief counsel to the Senate intelligence committee, I negotiated the terms of that legislation between the media and the intelligence community. Even if Plame's status were "classified"--Fitzgerald never introduced one piece of evidence to support such status -- no law would be violated.

There is no better evidence that the CIA was only covering its rear by requesting a Justice Department criminal investigation than the fact that it sent a boiler-plate referral regarding a classified leak and not one addressing the elements of a covert officer's disclosure.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES JOSEPH C. WILSON IV with misleading the public about how he was sent to Niger, about the thrust of his March 2003 oral report of that trip, and about his wife's CIA status, perhaps for the purpose of getting book and movie contracts.

Â· On July 6, 2003, Wilson appeared on "Meet the Press" hours after the New York Times published his op-ed "What I Didn't Find in Africa," which accused the administration of twisting intelligence to exaggerate the Iraq threat. The piece suggested that Wilson had been sent to Niger at the vice president's request to look into foreign intelligence reports of Iraqi efforts to obtain yellowcake uranium. Wilson told Andrea Mitchell, "The office of the vice president, I am absolutely convinced, received a very specific response to the question it asked and that response was based upon my trip there." But Cheney said he had no knowledge of Wilson's trip and was never briefed on his oral report to the CIA.

Â· Wilson has claimed repeatedly -- including on MSNBC's "Countdown" on July 22, 2005 and at the National Press Club on Oct. 31, 2005 -- that he was sent to Niger because of his "specific skill set" and not because of his wife. But Senate intelligence committee documents indicate that Plame suggested his name for the trip, as did a State Department report and a CIA official who briefed the vice president's office.

Â· Although Wilson has repeatedly claimed that neither his trip nor his oral report was classified, the CIA sent documents about the trip marked "classified" to the vice president's office and to date has not released the essence of the oral report. A source later identified as Wilson claimed in a Washington Post article on June 12, 2003, that documents related to an alleged Iraq-Niger uranium deal were forged because "the dates were wrong and the names were wrong." When Senate intelligence committee staff questioned that, as Wilson had never seen the documents, he responded that he may have "misspoken."

Â· Wilson has continually played coy about his wife's status. On July 16, 2003, David Corn wrote in the Nation: "Did senior Bush officials blow the cover of a U.S. intelligence officer working covertly in a field of vital importance to national security -- and break the law -- in order to strike at a Bush administration critic and intimidate others?" Corn acknowledged talking to Wilson but said that Wilson refused to talk about his wife. Yet Corn also published Wilson's rather unsubtle suggestion: "Naming her this way would have compromised every operation, every relationship, every network with which she had been associated in her entire career."

Plame was not covert. She worked at CIA headquarters and had not been stationed abroad within five years of the date of Novak's column.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE MEDIA with hypocrisy in asserting that criminal law was applicable to this "leak" and with misreporting facts to wage a political attack on an increasingly unpopular White House. To wit:

Â· Notwithstanding the fact that major newspapers have highfalutin', well-paid in-house and outside counsel who can find the disclosure law and even interpret it, the following publications called for a criminal investigation:

Â· The Atlanta Journal-Constitution called the appointment of a special independent counsel "absolutely necessary" because the allegations "come perilously close to treason" -- even though treason is a constitutional crime requiring two witnesses and the levying of war against the United States.

Â· The Boston Globe wrote: "This is a case that clearly calls for the appointment of an independent counsel."

Â· The New York Times naively approved the investigation if it "focused on the White House, not on journalists." It later applauded Fitzgerald's appointment, declaring that he must be allowed "to use the full powers of a special counsel."

Â· The Washington Post refrained from expressing shock at a "leak." But The Post had contributed to the fray by reporting on Sept. 28, 2003, that "two White House officials called at least six Washington journalists and disclosed the identity and occupation of Wilson's wife . . . to undercut Wilson's credibility." This article was the likely impetus for the other papers' editorials.

As recently as a week ago, the media were displaying their prejudice in this case. On "Meet the Press," journalists lamented that the Libby trial was revealing how government officials can use their relationships with reporters to plant stories that hurt their political enemies. Where was the voice at the table asking, "Didn't Wilson also use the media with his assertions in the New York Times and The Post?"

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES ARI FLEISCHER because his testimony about conversations differs from reporters' testimony, just as Libby's does. To wit:

DOJ_NMG_0133458

Â· The former White House press secretary testified before the grand jury and at the trial that he had revealed Plame's identity to two reporters -- John Dickerson, then of Time magazine, and NBC News's David Gregory. Dickerson denied it. Gregory won't comment.

Â· On cross-examination, Fleischer testified that it was "absolutely correct" that he did not tell The Post's Walter Pincus on July 12, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Pincus emphatically contradicted this, swearing that in the middle of a discussion, Fleischer "swerved off," asking, "Why do you keep writing about Joe Wilson and Joe Wilson's trip? Don't you know his wife worked for the CIA as an analyst for weapons of mass destruction and arranged for it?"

So indict Fleischer. He contradicted Pincus as materially as Libby contradicted Russert or Time's Matthew Cooper, the two witnesses who were the basis for the Libby indictment. Whoops! Can't do that. Fitzgerald gave Fleischer "pig in a poke" immunity. That's an old prosecutor's phrase meaning that Fitzgerald granted Fleischer immunity from prosecution without knowing what Fleischer would say. No problem -- indict Pincus. His testimony differed from Fleischer's and he didn't ask for immunity.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES RICHARD L. ARMITAGE with intentionally keeping silent about being the first person to reveal Plame's identity to reporters and with falsely telling the public that he did so at Fitzgerald's request because he did not want to be publicly embarrassed. To wit:

Â· Novak testified that Armitage told him on July 8, 2003, that it was Wilson's wife, "Valerie," who sent him on the Niger trip. Not until September 2006 did Armitage release Novak to reveal publicly that he had been the columnist's source.

Â· The Post's Bob Woodward testified that Armitage told him on June 13, 2003, rather colorfully: Wilson's "wife's a [expletive] analyst at the agency." When the FBI interviewed Armitage on Oct. 2, 2003, he apparently forgot about his taped interview with perhaps the most famous journalist of this generation. In November 2005 Armitage released Woodward from their confidentiality agreement -- but only to tell Fitzgerald, not the rest of us, how he had learned of Plame's identity.

Â· Armitage attributed his more than three years of silence to Fitzgerald's request that he not discuss the matter with anyone. But Fitzgerald was not appointed until Dec. 30, 2003, three months after Armitage now says he realized that he was Novak's source.

Â· Despite Armitage's claim as to why he kept silent, he yakked to his subordinate Marc Grossman about what he had said in his FBI interview -- conveniently, the night before Grossman's own FBI interview.

THIS GRAND JURY CHARGES THE U.S. JUSTICE DEPARTMENT with abdicating its legal and professional responsibility by passing the investigation off to a special counsel out of personal pique and reasons of ambition.

Â· Both then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and Deputy Attorney General James Comey not only had access to the law books but also the clout and clearances to demand that the CIA tell them whether Plame was covert.

Â· In the fall of 2003, Ashcroft, having learned that he would probably be replaced after the 2004 elections, had grown weary of taking flak for the president and threw the Libby investigation hot potato to Comey.

Â· In the fall of 2003, Comey, who hoped to replace Ashcroft as attorney general, in turn passed the hot potato to Fitzgerald, a former colleague and one of his best friends.

I rest my cases.

CIVIL LAW:

Drug Firms Accused Of Huge Fraud (TTNJ)

By Robert Cohen, Newhouse News Service

Trenton Times (NJ), February 18, 2007

Long line of pending cases involves Medicaid money

WASHINGTON -- The nation's big drugmakers have been systematically overcharging the Medicaid health-care program for the poor, reaping billions of dollars in illegal windfalls at the expense of the taxpayers, according to federal officials, members of Congress and a watchdog group.

Drugmakers are required by law to provide Medicaid with the same discounts they offer to big managed-care plans and hospital chains, but they have been disguis ing those prices, Ronald Tenpas, a U.S. associate deputy attorney general, told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform earlier this month.

"We are not seeing isolated instances of misconduct, but repeated practices within the indus try that have resulted in significant loses to federal health-care programs," he said.

The federal and state governments have had some success in recapturing money from the drug makers: During the last six years, government bodies have recouped about $3.9 billion in civil damages and criminal penalties stemming from 16 legal settlements involving Medicaid.

The settlements involve some of the biggest names in the industry, including Pfizer, Schering-Plough, GlaxoSmithKline, AstraZeneca and Bayer. Those cases dealt with overcharging the government for cancer, asthma, cholesterol, allergy and seizure medications.

But the scope of the problem could be much bigger. There are 150 pending federal investigations centering on Medicaid and two other government health-care programs that could find billions of dollars more in pharmaceutical company fraud.

Tenpas testified that those cases involve allegations of unlaw ful pricing and marketing practices related to hundreds of prescription drugs sold to Medicaid, Medicare and the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program.

"It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs," said Tenpas.

James Moorman, president of the nonprofit group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said public records show the pending inquiries involve other well-known companies, including Merck, Abbott, Novartis, and Johnson & Johnson. Based the history of past settlements, he said, the liability in the pending cases could amount to tens of billions of dollars.

'VERY SIMPLISTIC' The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the brand-name drug industry's trade group, declined comment on the al legations. Instead, it issued a statement asserting "the growth in spending on prescription medicines is at its lowest level in years."

Mike Moore, a Texas attorney who has represented Kenilworth- based Schering-Plough in drug- pricing litigation, said the pharmaceutical companies haven't de ceived the government on pricing. He said government regulators are aware of price differentials and, for a variety of policy reasons, have made decisions on reimbursement rates that some are now questioning.

Moore said the view offered by the Justice Department, some state attorneys general and members of Congress is "very simplistic and one-sided."

Medicaid, funded by the federal and state governments, provides health care to almost 50 million low-income beneficiaries. In 2005, the Department of Health and Human Services estimated that Medicaid purchased $41 billion worth of drugs, more than four times the $8.9 billion spent in 1994.

A 1990 law passed by Congress requires that drug manufacturers provide the Medicaid program, one of the nation's largest purchasers of drugs, with the same discounts they provide private purchasers.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the government reform panel, said the evidence shows Medicaid has been "repeatedly overcharged for essential medications" by pharmaceutical companies that have "deliberately crafted business plans to avoid giv ing Medicaid the proper discounts."

Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.) said he is baffled why there would be "so much wrongdoing going on" by a "group of very prestigious corporations."

EMPLOYEE-FUELED SUITS A majority of the investigations against the drugmakers have come through use of a provision of the federal False Claims Act, which allows people who have evidence of fraud involving government programs or contracts to bring suit on behalf of the federal government. The Medicaid cases stemmed from complaints by company employees, sales executives and pharmacies.

The cases are filed in federal court under seal, giving the Justice Department an opportunity to investigate the allegations and decide whether to intervene. If there is evidence of fraud, the Justice Department then ordinarily enters into lengthy negotiations with the companies, which can result in a monetary settlement instead of a trial.

Moorman said the 16 Medicaid- related cases settled since 2001 involved three types of schemes.

One common method, Moor man said, was for the manufacturer to conceal the best or lowest price it gave customers on brand-name drugs in order to avoid paying higher rebates to Medicaid. Nine of the 16 settlements were for cases using this scheme, he said, including a 2004 settlement after Scher ing-Plough was accused of hiding its best price on the allergy drug Claritin. Schering-Plough agreed to pay $345 million.

A second ploy involved manufacturers reporting inflated average wholesale prices to national reporting services, which were then used by Medicaid and Medicare to establish reimbursement rates.

Moorman said the inflated prices had no relation to the actual price paid by the pharmacists. But the pharmacists were allowed to keep the difference between the inflated Medicaid payment and the actual cost -- a scheme used by manufacturers as an incentive for pharmacies to purchase their drugs instead of ones made by competitors.

GlaxoSmithKline agreed in 2005 to pay nearly $150 million in a settlement of claims involving both Medicaid and Medicare, Moorman said, after being accused of engag ing in this type of inflated-pricing scheme to promote two drugs used to treat nausea associated with chemotherapy.

The third practice involved manufacturers unlawfully promot ing their drugs to physicians and others for unapproved uses, often accompanied by payment of illegal kickbacks.

Pfizer reached a $430million settlement with the government in 2004 after being accused of illegal off-label marketing of its anti-sei zure drug Neurotin.

"We can't afford to have these health programs if people are going to engage in this scale of fraud," said Moorman. "The whole thing is mind-boggling."

Moorman criticized the Justice Department for not being more aggressive in pursuing the pending False Claims Act cases. He charged the Bush administration has not committed enough resources and on average is settling only three cases a year.

"If they acted more forcefully, we might get the pharmaceutical companies to have a change in atti tude toward Medicaid and Medicare," he said.

Tenpas said the Justice Department takes the issue seriously. He told the congressional committee that the administration is moving as quickly as it can to resolve the inquiries and protect the health care programs from fraud.

"These are very complex cases," Tenpas said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Cruel And Unusual Punishment For Inmates? (HC)

By Steve Mcvicker, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Over the past 6 years, at least 101 inmates have died at the Harris County Jail

Harris County Jail inmate Calvin Mack lay sprawled on a cellblock floor, coughing up blood, bleeding profusely, his fellow prisoners yelling for guards to get help.

Mack, a homeless and hardened drug addict, continued to bleed, continued to die. "What do you want me to do, get a Band-Aid ... ?" a deputy quipped when he first appeared at the cellblock. Four hours passed before the officer called for medical help.

By then, Mack was all but dead.

By inmate standards, Calvin Mack's life was not unusual. A petty criminal who spent most of his time smoking crack under cover of the Fifth Ward shadow world, he had been arrested on minor drug charges almost every other year over the past decade.

His death, on the other hand, was anything but usual. But questionable care in the Harris County jail is not isolated to his case.

A Houston Chronicle review of state and county records reveals that from January 2001 through December 2006, at least 101 inmates — an average of about 17 a year — have died while in the custody of the Harris County Jail. In 2006 alone, after three consecutive years of failing to be in compliance with state standards, the jail recorded 22 in-custody deaths.

At the time of their deaths, at least 72 of the inmates — more than 70 percent — were awaiting court hearings and had yet to be convicted of the crimes that led to their incarceration.

Records and interviews show that almost one-third of the deaths involve questions of inadequate responses from guards and staff, failure by jail officials to provide inmates with essential medical and psychiatric care and medications, unsanitary conditions, and two allegations of physical abuse by guards.

In at least 13 cases, relatives or documents raise questions over whether inmates received needed medications prior to their deaths. Additionally, 11 of the deaths involve infections and illnesses suggesting sanitation problems. In 10 other cases, death reports suggest possible neglect, as in the Mack case.

None of the records reviewed, however, concludes that jail staff contributed directly to the 101 deaths since 2001. During the same period, the Dallas County jail recorded 70 deaths.

Harris County Sheriff Tommy Thomas declined the Chronicle's request for an interview. He did reply to written questions, though he would not comment on specific cases, citing confidentiality laws.

Overall, Thomas wrote, the Harris County Sheriff's Office "takes great pride" in the health care it provides to jail inmates. He pointed out that jail officials are charged with the massive task of conducting medical screening on the more than 9,100 prisoners housed in the jail each month.

The sheriff also noted that "delivery of health care to inmates is further challenged by the fact that many inmates lacked preventative health care in the free world, many suffered from substance abuse prior to incarceration, and many come to jail with chronic, untreated medical conditions."

"We feel that we are meeting the challenges of inmate health care delivery within those constraints, are committed to making ongoing improvements in all that we do, and are doing our best to exceed constitutionally mandated services to the inmate population," Thomas wrote.

Twelve years ago, prisoner litigation forced the county to spend more than $100 million in jail construction because of crowding. The money was meant to improve jail conditions and alleviate problems with safety, security and inmate care, many of which still exist.

The jail is struggling with a guard shortage and has budgeted more than $20 million on overtime in the past year to meet minimum staffing standards required by state law.

Custodial Death ReportTexas requires all law enforcement agencies to file a Custodial Death Report with the state Attorney General's Office any time an in-custody death occurs. However, the AG's office serves basically as "a repository of the reports," said AG spokesman Tom Kelley. "That's all we do."

The Texas Commission on Jail Standards keeps no records or figures on in-custody deaths. The commission does monitor county jail populations and determines whether the facilities are in compliance with the state-mandated ratio of one guard to every 48 prisoners — a standard that Harris County had failed to meet the past three years.

Most health care in the jail system is provided by the University of Texas Health Science Center at Houston. Health care cost the county more than $18 million in the past year.

Plans are under way to improve the jail's health care system. a Dr. Michael Seale, the jail's medical director, declined to comment for this article.

Thomas, in his letter to the Chronicle, said the jail is committed to becoming "the benchmark for the delivery of correctional medicine nationally" and "will provide efficient, effective and compassionate medical care within the constraints of the jail's security operations."

State records show Harris County's daily jail population averaged more than 9,100 inmates through the first 10 months of 2006. Sixteen percent of those inmates — more than 1,400 — have what the executive director of the Mental Health Association of Greater Houston describes as "a serious mental illness." Yet the county provides only 51 mental health beds at the jail. The rest are housed in the jail's general population, although some in solitary cells.

Dispensing medicationsExacerbating the mental and medical challenges of inmates are rules that ban inmates from bringing their own medicines into the jail. Instead, they must wait for a jail doctor to prescribe them and a staffer to hand them out. For some, that can mean delays in getting crucial care.

The Chronicle attempted to contact the relatives of every person who has died at the jail since 2001, and many of them claimed that inmates were not regularly receiving medications they had been prescribed before going to jail.

Travis McKinney, an epileptic, had not had a seizure in the eight months before his arrest for assault. During the four weeks he was in jail, he had two, the last one fatal.

The 21-year-old's body was discovered on the cell floor near toilets where investigators say he slept. His anti-seizure medication was on the floor near his blanket. Whether he was getting and taking the medication regularly is unclear, according to the records. Though jail nurses reported they saw McKinney take his pills the night before his death, medical examiner's records state that "he was not compliant with his medications."

McKinney had spent substantial time in county mental health facilities and had a known history of epilepsy, leaving his family members to wonder why he was not placed in the jail's mental health ward — instead of with the general population — where his condition might have been more closely monitored.

Similarly, Leamon Caldwell, 58, died in the jail in February 2006 from hypertension, or high blood pressure. Family members were told that Caldwell refused to take his medication. They suspect he wasn't receiving meds at all.

Thomas disputes many claims about health care problems as "anecdotal," adding, "While we would have little reason to question the sincerity of the families and friends in reporting what they have been told by the inmates, we do question the credibility of what the inmates themselves allegedly reported. Inmates will cast their jail experience in the worst possible light in an attempt to gain sympathy."

He told the Chronicle that every inmate undergoes "medical intake screening" when booked into the jail, and at least 1,000 each month are later assessed by doctors.

Bad conditions reportedPrisoners also claim they have been forced to sleep on mattresses on cellblock floors — sometimes next to toilets. They maintain that the crowded living conditions at the jail are ripe for disease and bacteria, particularly methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, or staph, a potentially lethal blood infection.

As a result, numerous inmates contend they have contracted staph infections while incarcerated. Jail records show that between January 2001 and April 2005, there were 60 medical quarantines at the jail. The records show at least two of the quarantines were related to staph infections. The causes of 11 other quarantines are not listed.

Many inmates come to the jail already fraught with myriad health problems. If they arrive with pre-existing medical conditions, as many do, conditions at the jail can make matters worse.

In October 2001, inmate Stacy Earl Matlock, 38, died from "complications of cirrhosis of the liver," according to the autopsy report. The report also notes that Matlock "developed multisystem organ failure secondary to a multi-resistant staph aureus bacteremia."

In July 2002, according to the autopsy report, prisoner Roland Oliva, 33, died of sepsis, a bacterial infection of the blood.

Concerns by inmates and family members, particularly about sanitation, also have been raised by the Texas Commission on Jail Standards, which found crowded conditions have created sanitation, safety and security issues.

These problems and others at the jail have provoked the scrutiny of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas, which is concerned about overpopulation, in part because of a slow-moving criminal justice system.

"The size of the Harris County Jail population makes it difficult for jail administrators to manage the (inmates) and provide the necessary level of care that not only is necessary for the inmates but protection of the correctional officers and other staff members," said Nicole Porter, the ACLU's jail-project director.

Richard Newby, president of the Harris County Deputies Organization, said overtime demands and manpower shortages force guards to "prioritze" their attention to inmates: "Unless you see something that makes you think there's something (serious) going on, the standard answer is to tell the inmate" to put it in writing.

Faster responseInevitably, some deaths are impossible to prevent. The question is whether some inmates might be saved with more rapid medical response or thorough attention.

David Whitlock, 46, fell from his bunk, collapsed on the floor and succumbed to heart failure three hours later. But records show attempts to treat him before he died might have been obstructed by the lack of proper medical equipment.

According to statements from Debra Alston, the jail's former head of nursing, an adult-sized breathing tube could not be found on the emergency crash cart, a factor that could have contributed to his death.

Jail officials disagreed with the nurse. She was fired 14 months after asking questions about the death for reasons "both related and unrelated to the allegations" about Whitlock, the sheriff said. Among other things, she was accused of "provoking disharmony," breaching confidentiality and dishonesty, records show. Alston told the Chronicle her firing was in retaliation for the Whitlock matter.

Thomas said the death was investigated internally by the Board of Nursing Examiners and "closed without recommendation."

The same, however, cannot be said for Calvin Mack, whose case was among the most troubling, even by the admission of jail authorities.

Final trip to jailMack was booked into the Harris County Jail for the final time May 30, 2005. Six days later, he was dead.

His older sister, Harriett Mack, said she tried for years without success to get her brother off the streets and off drugs. But nothing worked. He also had AIDS.

The AIDS diagnosis earned him a bed in the medical division on the second floor of the jail's 1200 Baker facility in downtown Houston. But five days later, when his condition turned critical, jailers did little to help him, records show.

According to inmate Clifford Olson, several prisoners noticed that Mack was in physical distress while sitting on the toilet. He soon began coughing up blood and bleeding from his rectum. Olson says Mack asked the other inmates to get the attention of the guards.

It was about that time — at the beginning of the overnight shift — that Phillip G. Balthazar came on duty to guard the medical cellblock. Olson and other inmates told him Mack needed medical attention.

"What do you want me to do, get a Band-Aid for his ass?" Balthazar asked the inmates, according to both Olson and a sheriff's office report obtained by the Chronicle.

During the next several hours, Olson and other inmates continued unsuccessfully to plead with Balthazar about Mack's deteriorating condition. Mack pulled himself into the showers, which also are used by the other inmates.

"So everybody could see a wide little river of blood going down the drain, being washed out of the shower, for about an hour," Olson said.

About 2 a.m. Mack began having seizures. It took another 40 minutes for medical personnel to arrive with a gurney — four hours after inmates first called for help.

Mack was taken to LBJ Hospital, where he died from "respiratory distress," according to the Custodial Death Report.

Three months later, Dr. Ana E. Lopez of the Harris County Medical Examiner's Office ruled that Mack's death was an "accident" caused from "intracerebral hemorrhage due to hypertensive cardiovascular disease and cocaine toxicity." In other words: a brain hemorrhage from high blood pressure and history of cocaine use.

DOJ_NMG_0133463

But investigators from the medical examiner's office were never informed by the sheriff's office about the delay in Mack's medical care, she said. Asked whether that might have made a difference in her ruling of an accidental death, she replied, "I'd have to think about that."

Lopez stressed that Mack's stroke was massive. She was not sure whether prompt medical attention would have saved his life. "The cause and manner of death would still be the same," Lopez said.

The sheriff's office's internal affairs division conducted its own probe of Mack's death. Detectives interviewed the 66 inmates who were housed in cellblock 2F1 with Mack, including Olson.

Of those inmates, 32 gave statements similar or identical to Olson's. Several were given polygraph examinations, which they passed.

"It is clear that Deputy Balthazar was notified by numerous inmates that an inmate under his control was experiencing a medical emergency," reads the internal affairs report. "It (was) his duty to evaluate and report such a condition in a timely manner. It appears Deputy Balthazar chose not to do so. ... This delay in effective intervention may have been a factor which contributed to catastrophic medical results for Mack."

Balthazar was dismissed Aug. 3, 2005. The termination letter accuses him of a "significant discrepancy" in his statement to detectives and of giving "deceptive" answers during a polygraph exam.

In a report on the incident that Balthazar filed with the sheriff's office, the deputy concluded that Mack "might be having a bad case of hemorrhoids" and that he immediately notified the medical clinic of the situation.

Contacted by the Chronicle, Balthazar said, "I was in charge of 133 people by myself. If I'd had some help, things might have been better." He added that he called the jail clinic and was told no one was available to help Mack.

He also denies making the "Band-Aid" statement.

Balthazar now serves as a reserve deputy for the Harris County Precinct 6 Constable's Office.

The Mack probe also resulted in the demotion of Lt. Christopher Y. Lee to deputy. In his disciplinary letter dated Aug. 9, 2005, Lee is accused of "failing to initiate any type of investigation into the events leading up to and surrounding inmate Mack's need for medical attention."

Lee did not return calls from the Chronicle.

Sheriff Thomas said the case was referred to the Harris County District Attorney's Office. The DA closed it with no action.

According to inmates, there also was little concern for decontaminating the cell after Mack had been taken to the hospital. It took more than five hours before workers arrived with supplies to clean the infected area.

Mack's sister Harriett expected more.

"I expected them to treat him like a human," she said.

Team May Revisit Cold Cases (BSUN)

By Jamie Stiehm, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 18, 2007

Attorney general wants unit to probe potential civil rights crimes

Cold-case investigations may heal wounds, supporters say

Maryland's attorney general is exploring the creation of a cold-case squad to investigate unsolved homicides, with an emphasis on racial crimes dating back to the civil rights era.

"Having a civil rights component to this office affords us the opportunity to look into current and past civil rights violations," said Douglas F. Gansler, who took office last month and has announced plans to increase prosecutions of environmental violators and gang members.

Gansler met Friday with top aides to discuss the idea of the new squad. The investigative unit would examine unsolved homicides from police files around the state, using modern forensic and DNA techniques, he said.

Compared to states in the Deep South, Maryland has fewer outstanding civil rights cases. Gansler said a survey is needed to count feasible cold cases with civil rights implications.

"If a lot of these people are still alive, witnesses and perpetrators, and if we have the ability to pursue them, the government has the onus to do so," Gansler said.

The investigations would include race-based homicides and cases of civil rights workers who might have been killed because they were identified with the movement. The unit's unsolved cases could also encompass desecrations of synagogues or other houses of worship.

DOJ_NMG_0133464

A handful of states have taken similar steps in establishing cold-case or civil rights divisions, including Florida. Alabama intends to add a cold-case unit this year that looks into civil rights crimes and review the fatal shooting in 1965 of a young black man, Jimmy Lee Jackson, that involved state troopers.

A bill before Congress, with co-sponsors including Rep. John Lewis of Georgia and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, both Democrats, would require the Justice Department and the FBI to create cold-case units dedicated to civil rights.

The legislation, the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, is named for one of the most notorious race crimes, left cold for half a century. A black Chicago youth, Emmett Till, was slain in 1955 while visiting family in Mississippi and tossed in a river, allegedly for whistling at a white woman named Carolyn Bryant.

A Mississippi grand jury will convene next month to hear allegations that Bryant was a party to the killing. Bryant's late husband and another man were acquitted by an all-white jury shortly after the slaying.

During the Democratic primary last year, Gansler was criticized by an opponent for pledging to take on crime-fighting initiatives historically left to local state's attorneys. One of his first efforts after taking office -- forming a group of attorneys to tackle gang crimes -- was met with resistance from many state's attorneys, who do not want him to probe gang crimes or prosecute them without the consent of the local jurisdiction.

In an interview, Gansler said he recognized the delicate ground he was treading.

"To set up a cold-case squad, we'd have to have a lot of stakeholders, including local and federal authorities, and a concerted effort throughout the state," Gansler said. "We'll determine the feasibility and try to understand the universe of those civil rights-era crimes that were unsolved."

Special Agent Michelle Crnkovich, a Baltimore FBI spokeswoman, said the bureau was not aware of Gansler's proposed squad. "The FBI is always receptive to requests for our resources," she said. "Civil rights is a very important priority to the FBI."

With only about 30 homicide prosecutions nationwide for cold civil rights cases since 1989, experts say laws and investigative squads may not always achieve their aims.

Mark Potok, a spokesman for the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala., said, "The bitter reality is that many witnesses have died and cannot recall key events, and there are fewer of them as time goes by."

Yet a statewide cold-case unit could help heal lingering scars of racial crimes, said Carl O. Snowden, director for civil rights for the attorney general's office. He compared the concept to the U.S. Justice Department division that hunts down aging Nazi war criminals to bring them to justice before they die.

The 1970 death of Ralph E. Featherstone is one case that deserves a second look, Snowden said. Featherstone, a 31-year-old black man and former organizer for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, died in an explosion in Bel Air.

State police ruled that Featherstone was carrying explosives on his way to a pretrial hearing for his friend, H. Rap Brown, a Black Panther leader, at the Harford County courthouse. Brown was charged with inciting a race riot in Cambridge in 1967.

"There are a lot of people still living who vividly remember the riots of Cambridge," Snowden said. "People who were teenagers then are now in their 50s and 60s."

A lawyer and native of Cambridge, E. Thomas Merryweather, said he didn't see the point in dredging up painful scenes from the past.

"Everybody would like to think those days are behind us and we're moving forward in the correct direction," Merryweather said.

Sherrilyn Ifill, a law professor at the University of Maryland, said, "This idea is part of a national movement in many ways, prodded by families of victims of crimes never brought to justice."

Author of On the Courthouse Lawn: Confronting the Legacy of Lynching in the 21st Century, Ifill has raised the idea of an investigative unit with Gansler's office.

"The community can become whole," Ifill said. "Complicity has the most corrosive effect, and this [model] helps to unburden the anger when society stands ready to use an authorized mechanism, the apparatus of justice."

Alabama Attorney General Troy King agreed.

"It brings peace and justice to the victims' families to have suspects brought before the bar of justice," King said. "They have a right to expect that we do that, whether they live in urban or rural areas. It shouldn't matter where they live."

Fact, Fiction Of Till's Murder (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, February 18, 2007

Legends abound regarding the events surrounding 1955 slaying

Few homicide cases in this nation's history have been shrouded by as much legend as the 1955 killing of Emmett Till.

Now, more than a half century after the 14-year-old's slaying, prosecutors are preparing to present the case to a Leflore County grand jury, separating fact from fiction, what's known from what may never be known.

"Because of its importance to the civil rights movement, it has this mythic quality like the Kennedy assassination," said David Beito, a University of Alabama professor who's an expert in the Till case. "You get all sorts of conspiracies."

Some of those legends took root not long after the black youth from Chicago was abducted, beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant at a grocery store in Money. Some have sprung up since.

Less than a month after Till's Aug. 28, 1955, slaying, an all-white jury acquitted her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam - only to see them confess their guilt months later to Look magazine. The half-brothers have since died.

In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's killing. A grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the case.

The FBI's more than 8,000-page report on the Till case sheds new light on the legends surrounding the killing, and in some cases, contradicts them.

Legend No. 1: Up to 14 people were involved in Till's abduction and killing, and five of them are still alive.

This idea surfaced at the time the Justice Department opened its probe.

Filmmaker Keith Beauchamp, who made the 2005 documentary, The Untold Story of Emmett Louis Till, said he found this information in his research. Those still living could be charged today, he said.

The FBI was unable to prove this claim.

Beito said the most people mentioned in 1955 news accounts were six - four white men and two black men.

In his testimony in 1955, Mose Wright said in the wee hours of Aug. 28, 1955, Milam and Bryant were not alone. He said someone in the truck with a "lighter" voice identified Till as the one. Some have speculated that someone was Carolyn Bryant, who has told relatives and the FBI she wasn't there.

Wright also described what he believed was a black man standing in the shadows. Wright's son, Simeon, said they believed that man, now dead, led Milam and Bryant to their house in the darkness.

The FBI report details an interview with Willie Reed, who testified in the 1955 trial. He saw five men with Till the morning of the slaying - three white and two black.

Reed since has identified the two black men as Levi "Too Tight" Collins and Joe Willie Hubbard. Collins is now dead, Beito said. "Another legend is that Collins committed suicide after this out of remorse. That's not true. He died of natural causes."

It is unknown if Hubbard is still alive, Beito said.

Some have speculated the third white man was Milam's brother, Leslie Milam, who managed a plantation and is now deceased. If a fourth white man were present, it's possible it could have been another brother, said Beito, who noted Bryant was a twin.

Alvin Sykes of Kansas City, president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign, said stating publicly how many may have taken part could hurt the case. "If the number is true, it could endanger the lives of potential witnesses," he said. "If it's not true, it may build false expectations."

According to the FBI report, none of those identified as being involved is still alive. The report goes on to urge District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville to take a closer look at Carolyn Bryant, the FBI's lone living suspect who could be charged with kidnapping.

Beauchamp said he found proof of other possible co-conspirators in author Carolyn Haines' 2003 book on Peggy Morgan, My Mother's Witness. In that nonfiction book, Morgan overhears her father, Gene Albritton, uncle and other unnamed white men discussing the case. "Now all we have to do is keep our mouths shut," she quotes her uncle, Bob, as saying.

When Morgan's mother, Inez, threatens to make public what she knows about Till's killing, Morgan's father beats her unconscious, telling her "if she ever spoke the name Emmett Till again, she would pay a terrible price," the book says. After that, he committed her to a mental institution.

"For some reason, the FBI is not believing" Morgan, Beauchamp said. "Their focus was to find enough evidence on one person to bring that person to court. That person was Carolyn Bryant."

Legend No. 2: Henry Lee Loggins took part in the killing.

The names of two black field hands, Collins and Loggins, emerged in 1955 news accounts as potential prosecution witnesses then-Tallahatchie County Sheriff H.C. Strider jailed to keep from testifying.

Loggins told reporters in 1955 and later repeated to Beauchamp that he had no role in the killing. "God help me, I knew nothing about it," he said.

In his interview with Beauchamp, Loggins describes in detail what supposedly happened to Till - repeatedly saying that was what he was told. He said the sheriff jailed him for six months without charges.

DOJ_NMG_0133466

News accounts from the time show Loggins was indeed in jail, but not during the trial, Beito said. "Loggins was accused of stealing iron."

The FBI concluded there was no proof Loggins had a role. Disabled by a stroke, he now lives with a sister in Ohio.

His son, Glendora Mayor Johnny Thomas, said he was "elated" to hear the FBI's conclusion.

Philip Dray, author of At the Hands of Persons Unknown: The Lynching of Black America, said black field hands coerced into helping hardly fall into the same category as vicious killers.

"Maybe they helped wash out a truck of blood, but in a way they're like the other victims," he said. "They're frightened and have to keep their mouths shut."

Legend No. 3: Emmett Till was castrated.

In the wake of Reconstruction, castration was part of the ritual of the lynchings of African Americans, Dray said. "It was a very elaborate procedure done for public consumption."

Not surprisingly, castration rumors persist in the Till case.

But in her book and in interviews, Till's mother, Mamie Till Mobley, said her son was intact when she viewed his body.

Till's autopsy shows no evidence of castration.

Beauchamp said a relative of Till's told him Till had been castrated: "That's something we'll never really know."

Legend No. 4: Mose Wright pointed at J.W. Milam and said, "Thar he."

The words "Thar he" (also written "dar he") have become a legend surrounding the case for more than five decades.

In the documentary, Eyes on the Prize, African-American journalist James L. Hicks, who reported on the trial for the Cleveland Call and Post, quoted Wright as saying the famous phrase.

Wright's son, Simeon, said his father was articulate and never spoke those words.

Beauchamp agreed. "He said, 'That's him,'" the filmmaker said. "It came from the media trying to make him sound country."

The 320-page transcript records Wright as saying, "There he is."

But Beito asked, "Would the transcript actually say, 'Thar he'?"

One of those present said Wright indeed spoke those words. "No question," said Betty Pearson of Sumner, who attended the 1955 trial. "People have tried to put words in his mouth, but that's what he said."

Some may feel such a quote denigrates Wright, she said, but she felt it merely reflected who he was - an African-American sharecropper who dared to stand up and identify a white killer in court.

"It almost looked like he was standing on his tiptoes when he pointed at (Milam)," she said.

Veteran journalist Bill Minor of Jackson, who covered the trial for the Times-Picayune in New Orleans, recalled Wright stood, pointed his bent finger at Milam and said, "thar's the one."

"It was the most dramatic thing I saw in my career," he said.

Mississippi writer Will Campbell immortalized the words, "Thar he," on his personal stationery.

"Mose Wright said, 'Thar he.' He didn't say, 'There's that gentleman,'" Campbell said. "He was a field hand, a proud man and, God knows, a brave man. Those are the two bravest words I think I've ever heard. Most of the people in that courtroom were hostile. He knew it, but it didn't stop him."

ANTITRUST:

Monsanto Deal Ruffles Seed Rivals (MCA)

By Jane Roberts Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 18, 2007

Six months after Monsanto Co. agreed to pay $1.5 billion for Delta and Pine Land -- the largest cottonseed company in the country -- the pot bubbles with intrigue.

Producers don't seem as worried as much as Monsanto rivals Switzerland-based Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., owned by DuPont.

Both have licensing agreements with D&PL and don't relish the idea of having to cooperate with Monsanto.

But what is really at stake is this: Monsanto owns more transgenetic cotton traits than any company in the world. If it also owns the largest cottonseed company, it would control the most cotton varieties, transgenes and -- in this case -- the herbicide Roundup, central to many recent biotech advances in agriculture.

"Farmers are not very happy unless they have stock in Monsanto," said Bill Meredith, longtime U.S. Department of Agriculture cotton breeder in Stoneville, Miss. "They fear they will have to pay more to get a product not as good as what they've got."

DOJ_NMG_0133467

The Department of Justice was expected to rule on the antitrust issue by Wednesday. Now, it looks like the deal will close by spring.

If the merger goes through, Monsanto will control 85 percent of the mainstream bloodlines of cotton and every kind of cotton planted in the Mid-South.

"The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anti-competitive," said Doyle Karr, DuPont spokesman. "We have serious concerns about the impact it would have on farmers, the agricultural industry and ultimately consumers."

While Syngenta says it is not engaged in a grass-roots effort to defeat the sale, it has told the Justice Department and others that it doesn't "believe it's in the best interest of the growers," said Anne Burt, spokeswoman.

"But for the time being, it's business as usual," Burt said. "We have an agreement with Delta and Pine Land to market and develop a particular trait, and that work is still proceeding."

The issue all comes down to transgenetics, the science of transplanting traits in seed to create crops resistant to pests and herbicides.

Monsanto, the first to enter the biotech field in agriculture, introduced a trait in 1996 that made cotton resistant to bud- and boll worms.

A year later, it introduced its Roundup Ready trait, which allows farmers to spray its trademark herbicide over the crop, killing the weeds but not the cotton.

Yields increased overnight. But the science also reduced labor, herbicide and petroleum costs so effectively, few farmers today plant anything but transgenes, particularly in the Mid-South where 98 to 99 percent of the cotton planted in 2006 was from transgenetic seed.

"Without transgenes, we wouldn't even be in the game of international competition in coton. We'd be completely behind because our costs would be so much higher," said Carl Anderson, agricultural economic professor emeritus Texas A&M.

DuPont and Syngenta both have agreements with D&PL to insert traits in its seed, giving farmers alternatives to Monsanto's monopoly on herbicide- and pest-resistance.

Last summer, for instance, D&PL paid DuPont $20.5 million to license its dual traits for herbicide resistance in cotton as early as 2011.

University researchers here praised the partnership, saying the genes would give farmers protection against stubborn weeds showing resistance to Roundup or glyphosate -- its generic equivalent -- plus provide an alternative to Monsanto.

Rivals worry that if they license their transgenetic traits to Monsanto, they won't get a fair shake in the marketplace because Monsanto would control the test plots and marketing.

Tom Jagodinski, D&PL president and chief executive, calls the rhetoric "sour grapes.

"They and anybody else could have bought Delta Pine, but they didn't step up," he said. "They are probably kicking themselves for not buying us. And they hope that if the U.S. Department of Justice were to block the deal, then they come and buy Delta Pine."

He says farmers will get new and better technology earlier than D&PL could do it alone, including cotton resistant to drought and nematodes, and varieties that use nitrogen more efficiently and produce better fiber.

"We've gotten a better understanding of what Monsanto is working on. Clearly, they have some interesting technologies farmers are going to like."

While Anderson agrees the R&D advantages of the merger could be significant, he worries that there will be no way to test Monsanto's claims.

"When you have a dominant industry where competition is not very strong, it's best to have some real good, effective guidelines," Anderson said. "I don't think we have that.

"When you buy a labeled variety of seed, you need to be able to check to see if the true variety is stated. There's no way to do that now."

Monsanto tried to buy D&PL in 1998 but scrapped the deal when a Justice review dragged on. D&PL sued Monsanto as a result.

The sides have spent millions fighting each other in court. If the deal goes through, the lawsuit would be settled as part of the sale.

If it doesn't, Monsanto would have to pay D&PL $600 million.

For a "little more money," insiders say, Monsanto can buy the whole company, get the market dominance that comes with it, plus derail its competitors.

Monsanto says the theory is simplistic and overstated.

"If you look historically at what we've done with trade technology, you see we have broadly licensed it to other cottonseed companies throughout the Cotton Belt," said Lee Quarles, spokesman.

"The whole reason is that farmers like the technologies, but they want it in the seed brands that mean the most to their farm."

ENVIRONMENT:

An Oil Reserve Right At Hand (WP)

By Gal Luft

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

In his State of the Union address last month, President Bush announced his intention to expand the Strategic Petroleum Reserve as a way to strengthen America's energy security. The 20-year effort to increase the emergency stockpile from its current capacity, 691 million barrels, to 1.5 billion barrels would provide enough oil to compensate for a loss of nearly 100 days of net oil imports, almost double today's reserve. (Since it is virtually impossible that all of America's suppliers would be cut off at once, the period would actually be much longer.)

This move reflects the president's belief that oil-rich regions such as the Middle East and Africa will continue to be unstable and that the United States is likely to become ever more vulnerable to terrorist attacks against oil facilities worldwide and to erratic weather patterns in the Atlantic Ocean.

In an increasingly unstable world, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is a much-needed insurance policy. But the way the president chose to expand it is ill-considered. First, his plan requires purchasing oil at a rate of 110,000 barrels a day -- every day -- for the next 20 years. Assuming oil prices average $60 to $80 a barrel in the next two decades, it would cost $48 billion to $65 billion just to buy the oil. Add the cost of building and maintaining storage sites, and the price tag could easily be as much as $82 billion. And this is only the beginning.

If the United States expands its strategic reserve, other major oil consumers will do the same. Emerging giants such as China and India, which import much less than America does, have barely 10 days' worth of stockpiles. When other consumers rush to buy oil for their reserves, the added demand will drive up prices on the already tight oil market. So in addition to the cost of expanding the reserve, Americans will pay extra at the pump.

The implementation of the plan also leaves much to be desired. The reserve is divided among four major sites in Texas and Louisiana. The Energy Department announced last week that the site for the expansion will be in Richton, Miss., and that it will be connected to refiners and marine facilities in Pascagoula, on the Gulf Coast, for oil distribution.

The Gulf states are highly vulnerable to destructive hurricanes, yet the administration aims to put all our eggs in one basket, rather than identify safer areas. The plan ignores the likelihood that violent storms could damage the pipelines that connect our economy with its emergency oil stockpile and that pumping stations might not have electricity.

For the United States to have a reliable emergency stockpile, new locations must be identified. This may not be easy. Geological formations such as the salt domes in the South that host the reserve are uncommon, and not-in-my-back-yard opposition is likely.

The administration should consider a radically different and much cheaper approach to boosting our security: make ANWR our strategic reserve. For many years, supporters of drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge have failed to open it for production. With the Democrats controlling Congress, the chances of drilling are slimmer than ever. President Bush didn't even bother to raise the issue last month. But reframing the issue to cast the refuge as an emergency stockpile rather than a source of production might well change the politics.

Defining the refuge as a strategic reserve would not provoke a rush by other countries to double their reserves (and thus would avoid spurring a rise in global oil prices). Further, the Alaskan oil is already in our possession; tapping it wouldn't require paying tens of billions of dollars to countries with which we are at odds. Congress could compensate Alaskans by leasing the oil for a predetermined period after which the state would be able to sell its oil, provided lawmakers approved. This might not generate the same per-barrel income Alaskans would receive if the oil were sold today, but it's much more than what they are getting now.

Treating the refuge as a reserve would not pose the same environmental problems as full-scale production. Drilling several wells and building the necessary infrastructure would have minimal impact on the surrounding wildlife. If America were ever hit by an oil shock and our way of life was at stake, the caribou would have to excuse us; until then, and under this plan, they could live in peace.

Disagreements on ANWR have led to a political gridlock that has prevented any major progress toward energy security. As a result, America is increasingly dependent on foreign oil, to the detriment of its national and economic security. By resolving this issue once and for all, we can finally begin to implement policies that move the United States toward increased energy security.

Editorial: Criminals, Guns Don't Mix (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, February 18, 2007

Cities need help, not hindrance, from federal authorities in tracking illegal sales

Earlier this month we wrote in support of an effort by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department to track the origin of guns used in crimes. The department had traced several such weapons to a gun shop in Sparks, just outside of Reno.

Such efforts are undertaken to determine whether gun shops are permitting "straw purchases" - those made with the intent of giving or selling the guns to criminals. Support for these investigations comes from the Mayors Against Illegal Guns Coalition, which counts 150 U.S. mayors in its membership, including Geno Martini of Sparks.

A co-founder of the group, New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, last year sent police investigators into many of his city's gun shops. As the requirement for gun shop operators to be vigilant against straw purchases comes under federal law, all Bloomberg could do was press civil suits against those found to be in violation.

He hoped the Justice Department would take it from there, and file criminal charges where the evidence was strongest. But not only did the Justice Department refuse to bring charges, it also warned Bloomberg about "potential legal liabilities" the city could face if it continued such investigations.

Straw purchases are a mounting problem in communities across the country. The federal government should assist cities as they try to protect their citizens from the danger presented by criminals who can easily obtain guns from seemingly legitimate purchasers.

IMMIGRATION:

Nafta Should Have Stopped Illegal Immigration, Right? (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

THE North American Free Trade Agreement, enacted by Congress 14 years ago, held out an alluring promise: the agreement would reduce illegal immigration from Mexico. Mexicans, the argument went, would enjoy the prosperity and employment that the trade agreement would undoubtedly generate — and not feel the need to cross the border into the United States.

But today the number of illegal migrants has only continued to rise. Why didn't Nafta curb this immigration? The answer is complicated, of course. But a major factor lies in the assumptions made in drafting the trade agreement, assumptions about the way governments would behave (that is, rationally) and the way markets would respond (rationally, as well).

Neither happened, yet Nafta remains the model for trade agreements with developing Latin countries, including the Central American Free Trade Agreement, passed by Congress in 2005. Three more Nafta-like agreements are now pending in Congress — with Panama, Columbia and Peru.

When Nafta finally became a reality, on Jan. 1, 1994, American investment flooded into Mexico, mostly to finance factories that manufacture automobiles, appliances, TV sets, apparel and the like. The expectation was that the Mexican government would do its part by investing billions of dollars in roads, schooling, sanitation, housing and other needs to accommodate the new factories as they spread through the country.

It was more than an expectation. Many Mexican officials in the government of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari assured the Clinton administration that the investment would take place, and believed it themselves, said Gary Hufbauer, a senior fellow at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington who campaigned for Nafta in the early 1990s.

"It just did not happen," he said.

Absent that investment, foreign factories congregated in the north, within 300 miles of the American border, where some infrastructure already existed. "Monterrey is quite good," Mr. Hufbauer said, "but in a lot of other cities the infrastructure is terrible, not even enough running water or electricity in poor neighborhoods. People get temporary jobs, but that is all."

DOJ_NMG_0133470

Meanwhile, Mexican manufacturers, once protected by tariffs on a host of products, were driven out of business as less expensive, higher quality merchandise flowed into the country. Later, China, with its even-cheaper labor, added to the pressure, luring away manufacturers and jobs.

Indeed, despite the influx of foreign-owned factories, total manufacturing employment in Mexico declined to 3.5 million by 2004 from a high of 4.1 million in 2000, according to a calculation of Robert A. Blecker, an American University economist.

As relatively well-paying jobs disappeared, Mexico's average wage for production workers, already low, fell further behind the average hourly pay of production workers in the United States, and Mexicans responded by migrating.

"The main thing that would have stemmed the flow of people across the border was a rapid increase in wages in Mexico," said Dani Rodrik, an economist and trade specialist at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "And that certainly has not happened."

Something similar occurred in agriculture. The assumption was that tens of thousands of farmers who cultivated corn would act "rationally" and continue farming, even as less expensive corn imported from the United States flooded the market. The farmers, it was assumed, would switch to growing strawberries and vegetables — with some help from foreign investment — and then export these crops to the United States. Instead, the farmers exported themselves, partly because the Mexican government decided to reduce tariffs on corn even faster than Nafta required, according to Philip Martin, an agricultural economist at the University of California, Davis.

"We understood that the transition from corn to strawberries would not be smooth," Professor Martin said. "But we did not think there would be almost no transition."

A financial crisis also dashed expectations. One expectation was that the Mexican economy, driven by Nafta, would grow rapidly, generating jobs and keeping Mexicans home. The peso crisis of 1994-95, however, provoked a steep recession, and while there was some big growth later, the average annual growth rate over Nafta's lifetime has been less than 3 percent.

The financial crisis struck just months after Nafta came into existence, undermining, early on, the Mexican government's ability to spend money on roads, education and other necessary government functions.

"We underestimated Mexico's deficits in physical and human infrastructure," said J. Bradford DeLong, an economist at the University of California, Berkeley, and a Treasury official in the Clinton administration.

But, he says, without Nafta the migration would have been even greater. For instance, he says, there would not have been as much investment in the north of the country.

Finally, the steady flow of Mexicans to the United States has produced a momentum of its own — what Jeffrey Passel, a demographer at the Pew Hispanic Institute, calls a "network effect," in which young Mexicans travel to the United States in growing numbers to join the growing number of family members already here.

The upshot is that Mexican migration to the United States has risen to 500,000 a year from less than 400,000 in the early 1990s, before Nafta, Mr. Passel estimates. Roughly 80 percent to 85 percent of immigrants are here illegally, he says.

The peso crisis, recession, the network effect — their impact may have been beyond anyone's control, but not the assumptions about how the market and the government would act.

"We have indeed had one disappointment after another on this score," Mr. Rodrik said, noting that the same assumption about government spending is part and parcel of the agreements, now before Congress, with Columbia, Peru and Panama.

While there is opposition to these proposals, it is mainly from Democrats who want a better safety net for American workers who might be hurt.

The European Union, in contrast, assumes little about government spending on the part of economically weaker nations joining it. The union itself has hugely subsidized the improved services needed by entering countries like Portugal, Spain, Greece and Poland, rather than leave financing to the relatively meager resources of entering countries.

The money is used not only for public investment, Mr. Rodrik noted, but also to subsidize companies setting up operations in the new countries and to support government budgets.

"I am not saying Nafta was a bad agreement," Mr. Rodrik said. "But more than a trade agreement is required for countries to converge economically. And Nafta has been viewed as a shortcut to convergence without having to do all the other stuff."

Georgia Revisits Legal Restrictions On Illegal Aliens (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

ATLANTA (AP) -- There have been no protests on the steps of the Georgia Capitol like those that greeted the state's sweeping immigration legislation last year. But quietly, and in piecemeal fashion, state lawmakers have been working around the edges to crack down again on aliens in the country illegally.

Georgia made international headlines last spring when it passed some of the toughest laws in the U.S. targeting illegal aliens within its borders. Those laws included provisions to sanction employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens and deny some state services -- such as nonemergency medical care and unemployment checks -- to adults who can't verify that they're in the country legally.

A flurry of smaller proposals has been moving through the state legislature this year, including several that would make it tougher for illegal aliens to drive in Georgia.

"This is an issue that I hear from my constituents all the time about," said state Rep. Timothy Bearden, a Republican from Villa Rica, who wants to require all state forms to be in English only.

"The federal government has been derelict in their duty, and until they do something, I guess it's going to be left up to us here in the states," he said.

State Sen. Chip Rogers was the author last year of the Georgia Security and Immigration Compliance Act. Most provisions of that law aren't set to take effect until July, and Mr. Rogers said he doesn't foresee another comprehensive immigration bill until the effects of that legislation can be judged.

"But there is still room to do other things," said the Republican from Woodstock, a north Atlanta suburb.

Last week, a proposal by Mr. Rogers coasted through the state Senate that would require Georgians to obtain a valid state driver's license before they can get their car licensed. To get a Georgia driver's license, residents must already verify that they are in the country legally.

Mr. Rogers portrayed it as a public safety measure but acknowledged that it would make it harder for people in the country illegally to get behind the wheel, because their vehicles wouldn't have valid plates and would be easy for law enforcement to spot and stop.

The measure passed unanimously without debate. It moves to the House, which like the state Senate is controlled by Republicans.

Jerry Gonzalez, executive director of the Georgia Association of Latino Elected Officials, said the measures are little more than a backhanded way to go again after illegal aliens.

"In some ways, it's worse than last year because it's sneakier," he said.

Mr. Gonzalez said the measures under consideration would drive the state's growing Hispanic population deeper underground and discourage them from cooperating with law enforcement.

But Republican backers of the new proposals say they are needed to close loopholes.

The crackdown is coming not just from the state legislature. Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican, announced during his re-election bid that 10 new investigators would be placed at driver services centers -- where driver's licenses are issued -- that are thought to be at the highest risk for receiving forged documents.

They Are America (NYT)

Almost a year ago, hundreds of thousands of immigrant workers and their families slipped out from the shadows of American life and walked boldly in daylight through Los Angeles, Washington, Chicago, New York and other cities. “We Are America,” their banners cried. The crowds, determined but peaceful, swelled into an immense sea. The nation was momentarily stunned.

A lot has happened since then. The country has summoned great energy to confront the immigration problem, but most of it has been misplaced, crudely and unevenly applied. It seeks not to solve the conundrum of a broken immigration system, but to subdue, in a million ways, the vulnerable men and women who are part of it. Government at all levels is working to keep unwanted immigrants in their place — on the other side of the border, in detention or in fear, toiling silently in the underground economy without recourse to the laws and protections the native-born expect.

The overwhelming impulse has been to get tough, and tough we have gotten:

Border enforcement. What little the last Congress did about immigration was focused on appeasing hard-line conservatives by appearing to seal the border. President Bush’s new budget continues that approach, seeking 3,000 more Border Patrol officers and another $1 billion for a 700-mile fence, adding to the billions spent to militarize the border since the 1990s. That still isn’t enough to build the fence and it hasn’t controlled the illegal flow; you need more visas and better workplace enforcement to do that. It has directed much traffic into the remote Southwest desert, making more immigrants vulnerable to smugglers and leaving many people dead.

Federal raids. In December federal agents stormed a half-dozen Swift meatpacking plants, rounding up hundreds of suspected illegal immigrants and exposing the secret that is no secret: America’s dirtiest, hardest jobs are done by people too desperate to shun them and too afraid to complain. The raids have been replicated in other states and industries, on day-labor street corners and in homes from Connecticut to California. In immigrant communities, the undercurrent of fear has been replaced by terror, and employers are jittery, too. The immigration agency says it singles out only fugitives in Operation Return to Sender, but the sweeps are broad and panic is indiscriminate.

Local crackdowns. State, county and local officials have picked up where they left off last year, introducing bills to get tough on illegal immigrants. They cannot control federal policy, so they try other ways to punish those they see as unfit neighbors, to stifle their opportunities, extract money, expose them to legal jeopardy and otherwise inflict suffering, in the deluded hope that piling on miseries will make them disappear. In suburban Long Island, where resentment over an influx of day laborers has festered under a hapless and intolerant county government, lawmakers are considering banning workers from county roadsides. Texas legislators are mulling a bill to reject the 14th Amendment and deny the benefits of citizenship to children born in this country to undocumented parents. Local officials all over are trying to deputize police officers as immigration agents, causing overburdened police forces and prosecutors to bristle. Some bills are symbolic, most are simply spiteful, and their effect is a chaotic patchwork, not a sane national policy.

Gutted due process. Laws enacted a decade ago and tightened after 9/11 distance even legal immigrants from the protection of the law. Immigrants are routinely detained without bond, denied access to lawyers, deported without appeal and punished for one-time or minor infractions with a mechanistic ferocity that precludes a judge's discretion or mercy. Several of the immigration bills that Congress has considered seek to heighten the efficiency with which immigrants who run afoul of the authorities can be railroaded out of the country. This gums up another aspect of the legal system, which deals with refugees and asylum seekers. A much tighter web for immigrants has been erected, and it catches many blameless victims.

The web of suspicion. The Justice Department wants to expand routine DNA collection to include detained illegal immigrants, creating a vast new database that will sweep up hundreds of thousands of innocent people. DNA, far more than fingerprints, is a trove of deeply personal information. Its routine collection from law-abiding citizens is considered an outrageous violation of privacy rights. In the belief that illegal immigrants lack such rights, DNA swabs and blood would be collected even if a detainee is not suspected of a crime. This reinforces the notion that immigrants should be treated as one huge class of criminal suspects.

The bureaucratic trap. The federal bureaucracy, notorious for backlogs and bad service, wants to charge more to immigrants who want to become Americans — an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers. Such steep and arbitrary increases would create a means test for citizenship, an affront to our national values.

The rise of hate. The Anti-Defamation League, acutely sensitive to the presence of intolerance, has detected an increase in Ku Klux Klan activity around the country, much of it focused on hatred of new immigrants. This virus in the bloodstream usually erupts amid national ferment and fear, and according to a report available at www.adl.org, hate groups like the Klan have moved quickly to exploit the simmering debate over immigration.

Hopelessly fixated on toughness, the immigration debate has lost its balance, overlooking the humanity of the immigrant. There is a starkly diminished understanding that hospitality for the stranger is part of the American ethos, and that as much as we claim to be a nation of immigrants, we have thwarted them at every turn. We must do better.

The new year began with renewed optimism for the chances of sensible immigration reform in Washington. The hope is justified, but time is short and real change will still require boldness and courage. Citizenship must be the key to reform. The idea of an earned path to citizenship for illegal immigrants was missing from President Bush's State of the Union address this year, though he has continued to say his usual favorable words about reform. The new Democratic Congress and moderate Republicans cannot be afraid to stand up to the anti-amnesty demagogues and lead Mr. Bush to a solution.

Enforcement of laws cannot be ignored. Punish immigrants who enter illegally, make them pay back taxes and fines, restrict their ability to get work through deceit and false identities. But open a path to their full inclusion in the life of this country.

The alternative — the path of immigrant exploitation, of harassment without hope — will only repeat the ways the country has shamed itself at countless points in its history.

Republican Poe Helped Elevate Border Agents' Case (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Congressman from Humble says 2 ex-border agents got bad rap

WASHINGTON — Flip on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight show these days and chances are pretty good you'll see Texas Congressman Ted Poe lamenting the fate of two ex-Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker.

For months, the Republican from Humble has relentlessly championed the agents' case on cable-TV shows and behind the scenes, helping foment public outrage directed at the White House and President Bush's appointees in the Justice and Homeland Security departments.

Poe, who spent 22 years as a hard-nosed criminal court judge in Houston and eight years before that as a Harris County prosecutor, seems an unlikely choice to be carrying the banner for two convicts.

"It surprises some that I am seen to be on the side of the defendants," Poe acknowledged in an interview.

But the lawmaker, in his second term, said his stance stems directly from his experiences on the bench and at the prosecution table.

"I know the power of the prosecution and how powerful they are," said Poe, who argues that the Justice Department went to extraordinary lengths to prosecute ex-agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos for wounding the drug trafficker in a 2005 border altercation.

Though the two men were duly convicted in a jury trial in El Paso, Poe contends the game was rigged against the defendants because of "back-room deals" given by the prosecution to get the trafficker and other involved Border Patrol agents to testify. He also questions whether information was withheld from the jury.

And Poe is uneasy about what he views as Mexican interference into the case, citing letters written by Mexican consular officials seeking prosecution.

Asked whether he ever worries that he may be defending rogue officers, which is what prosecutors insist Ramos and Compean were, Poe expresses no uncertainty.

"They are not rogue border agents," he said.

But Poe also has no patience with fellow conservatives whose rhetoric has soared to broach the possibility of impeachment of Bush if either of the ex-agents is killed in prison. Ramos was attacked by six inmates at his Mississippi prison recently after they saw his case air on TV.

"That's an absurd answer," Poe said of the impeachment talk.

Cornyn on a quest for campaign cashTexas Sen. John Cornyn will have to get down to some serious fundraising in preparation for his re-election run in 2008.

The Republican raised $3.3 million during the past two years and began 2007 with a little more than $3 million in the bank. Considering he spent $15 million in campaign contributions on his 2002 election, he's got a ways to go in the quest for campaign cash.

"I'm working on it," Cornyn said, predicting he will have banked at least $6 million by next January's filing deadline.

Cornyn estimated he'll need about $20 million if he has a serious Democratic rival. Among those who may be eyeing the race: former Comptroller John Sharp, former Dallas mayor and 2002 Senate nominee Ron Kirk and Houston Mayor Bill White, though many think he is far more inclined to make a gubernatorial run in 2010.

Houston Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky, who unsuccessfully challenged Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison last year, also is in the mix.

"I'm just going to try to be ready for whatever comes," Cornyn said.

Measure honors civil rights figuresThe Senate voted last week to add the names of former Houston Congresswoman Barbara Jordan and three other prominent civil rights figures, including fellow Texan Hector P. Garcia, to the title of the 2006 law reauthorizing portions of the Voting Rights Act.

The measure now moves to the House.

TAX:

Senators Set Sights On Overseas Tax Havens (WP/BLOOM)

By Mark Drajem, Ryan J. Donmoyer, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Three senators proposed legislation that would target what they say is $100 billion a year in tax revenue lost each year because of overseas tax havens, in part by forcing hedge funds to track their foreign investors.

The measure would impose tougher requirements on U.S. taxpayers using offshore secrecy jurisdictions, give the U.S. Treasury the authority to take action against foreign jurisdictions that impede tax enforcement, stiffen penalties against abusers and close offshore trust loopholes, according to a summary of the bill released by Michigan Democrat Carl M. Levin.

The legislation would require hedge funds to establish programs to combat money laundering and better track offshore investors, under guidance from the Treasury Department. The measure would also prohibit the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office from issuing patents for accounting strategies intended to "minimize, avoid, defer, or otherwise affect liability for federal, state, local, or foreign tax."

"We cannot tolerate tax cheats offloading their unpaid taxes onto the backs of honest taxpayers," Levin said in a joint statement with co-sponsors Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). "Offshore tax havens have declared economic war on honest taxpayers by helping tax cheats hide income and assets that should be taxed in the same way as other Americans."

The Treasury Department and top lawmakers in both houses of Congress have made a priority this year reducing the so-called tax gap, the difference between what individuals and companies owe and what they pay. The IRS said a study of 2001 tax returns shows the tax gap is about $345 billion a year, only $55 billion of which is recovered.

The legislation is a "strengthened" version of a measure introduced in 2005 by the senators, Levin said, and is the product of a four-year probe by the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Action On Health Insurance (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — President Bush urged Congress again Saturday to create a tax break that would help people buy private health insurance outside the workplace.

Repeating points made in his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush said that he wanted to create a standard tax deduction for health insurance and that he would “continue to reach across party lines to enact common-sense health care reforms.”

“Health care costs are rising rapidly, more than twice as fast as wages,” Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address. “These rising costs are driving up the price of health insurance.”

Mr. Bush said he was pleased to receive a letter this week from 10 senators — 5 Democrats and 5 Republicans — who wanted to work with him on the nation’s health care system.

Gov.'s Health Plan Leaves Some In Bind (LAT)

By Jordan Rau, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Its subsidies wouldn't cover nearly 1 million middle-class workers.

— Shannon Corona had stomach surgery in 2004, but she has not been back to her specialist for a checkup in two years.

Her employer, a landscape architectural firm where she is a drafter, doesn't offer health insurance, and she says she can't afford it.

"I have too many bills: two student loans, a car payment and car insurance," said Corona, a 23-year-old from San Dimas.

Corona is the kind of Californian who Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger says would be helped by his proposed overhaul of the state's healthcare system. But compelling everyone to obtain insurance — the linchpin of his plan — may not work for many Californians in need of aid, according to health policy experts.

Under the governor's plan, nearly 1 million middle-class people would be caught in a tough bind, those experts say: They earn too much to qualify for the insurance subsidies Schwarzenegger wants the state to provide but not enough to afford comprehensive coverage.

Only those whose yearly earnings are less than 250% of the federal poverty level — about $25,525 for individuals and $51,625 for families of four — would qualify for the proposed subsidies.

People earning more would be required by law to have, at a minimum, a high-deductible catastrophic insurance plan. Such policies, which the administration says cost about $1,200 per person a year, would not pay for anything until a patient's annual medical costs exceeded $5,000.

And families could owe as much as $5,000 more in co-payments before insurers absorbed further medical bills.

Those who earn more than Schwarzenegger's subsidy threshold but are hardly affluent can include fitness trainers, retail sales workers, child-care workers, actors, dental assistants, artists, social workers, construction workers and legal assistants. Many retired people and those in part-time jobs also routinely earn just a little more than the cutoff amount.

"I think the biggest weakness is just not addressing where people 2 1/2 times poverty are going to go if they want something more than catastrophic coverage," said Jonathan Gruber, an economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who analyzed the governor's proposal at Schwarzenegger's request.

Democratic leaders in the Legislature, which must approve any healthcare overhaul and is weighing several proposals, have been skeptical of requiring coverage without regulating how much insurers can charge.

E. Richard Brown, director of the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research, told a Senate panel Thursday that 917,000 of the 2 million uninsured who earn more than Schwarzenegger's threshold would have difficulty affording the coverage the governor wants to require.

The administration says many components of Schwarzenegger's plan would help lower premiums, although they have no estimates of how much. One provision would limit how much insurers and hospitals could use for things other than medical care, specifically profits and administration. At least 85% of premiums would have to be spent on care.

But both the administration and independent experts say Schwarzenegger's plan would need the mandatory insurance element in order to work. The mandate would ensure that the healthy and the young, who pay more in premiums than they spend on care, sign up for insurance.

"There will be a larger risk pool that will lower the individual premiums," Schwarzenegger told a gathering of healthcare professionals in Los Angeles on Thursday.

Massachusetts is the only other state that requires health insurance coverage. Even though its mandate doesn't kick in until July, the initial experience has been dispiriting.

When a state board created to help arrange coverage sought bids, insurers proposed premiums far above state projections: between $3,000 and $6,000 a year, depending on a person's age. Massachusetts is soliciting new bids, for less comprehensive coverage than originally planned.

Dr. Mark Smith, president of the California Health Care Foundation, an Oakland nonpartisan group that is analyzing the various proposals being considered in the Capitol, said any workable plan would have to "have some credible evidence that costs will be controlled." That, he said, "is the most questionable part of all the plans I've seen so far."

The minimum insurance policies that Schwarzenegger wants to require would cost less than those in Massachusetts, because in California they would be reserved for catastrophic illness or injury.

But the limited uses of those policies make them unappealing to some who would be required by law to buy them.

"I don't want to be forced to buy [health] insurance like I buy auto insurance," said Nick Trasente, a bartender and aspiring actor in Burbank.

Schwarzenegger acknowledged that high-deductible plans are not "the ideal situation," but he said they could help protect people from the kind of medical bills that cause bankruptcy. "I guarantee you," he said at a news conference last month, that an uninsured family hit with $150,000 in medical costs "would have been happier with the $5,000" deductible of a catastrophic policy.

But some people who already hold such policies say they are of little help when it comes to routine medical care, the kind that can help identify health problems before they become financially overwhelming.

Kari Picolla, a 28-year-old assistant to two actors in Glendale, purchased catastrophic insurance from Blue Cross of California after her regular coverage became too expensive. It costs $85 a month and pays for four doctor visits a year.

"I can definitely afford the premium. What I can't afford is healthcare, going to the doctor" after exceeding the visit limit. "It's $120 a pop if I go more than four times a year. Getting those bills is tough."

Catastrophic plans are even less attractive to older people and those who require regular medical care.

Jim Thompson, a 61-year-old musician from Santa Monica, wanted to retire early with his 54-year-old wife, Mara. But the cost of buying a comprehensive insurance policy would have been $1,300 a month.

"She has gone back to work full time for one reason only: healthcare," he said. Though the couple's financial picture is "rosy," he said, "our entire well-being is under threat, because without health insurance you can be wiped out."

On average last year, annual premiums in California cost $4,548 for individuals and $11,856 for families, according to a survey of employers by the California Health Care Foundation. Premiums rose 8.7% in 2006, more than twice the state's rate of inflation.

The state's Managed Risk Medical Insurance Board runs a last-resort insurance program for people private insurers won't take. But its offerings are not cheap: For the least expensive plan, families of three or more in Los Angeles County must pay between $10,050 and $14,245, depending on age.

Robin Corona, Shannon Corona's mother, looked into the program for her daughter, who makes more than the threshold. But the family determined that even the cheapest plan she could buy would be too much at $2,681 a year. .

Both parents are retired and said they want to help. But they have their own financial challenges, including the care of Shannon Corona's 91-year-old grandmother and her medical expenses. And Robin Corona said the insurance rates for her and her husband just went up.

"We can't help her, and that's where I feel terrible," Robin Corona said. "I'm not Rockefeller. Nobody can afford those prices.

In Majority, Democrats Run Hill Much As GOP Did (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Democrats pledged to bring courtesy to the Capitol when they assumed control of Congress last month. But from the start, the new majority used its muscle to force through its agenda in the House and sideline Republicans.

And after an initial burst of lawmaking, the Democratic juggernaut has kept on rolling.

Of nine major bills passed by the House since the 110th Congress began, Republicans have been allowed to make amendments to just one, a measure directing federal research into additives to biofuels. In the arcane world of Capitol Hill, where the majority dictates which legislation comes before the House and which dies on a shelf, the ability to offer amendments from the floor is one of the minority's few tools.

Last week, the strong-arming continued during the most important debate the Congress has faced yet -- the discussion about the Iraq war. Democrats initially said they would allow Republicans to propose one alternative to the resolution denouncing a troop buildup but, days later, they thought better of it.

"It sounds like we're not doing what we said we would do -- I understand that," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Tuesday. "Here, however, we believe we are very justified in one of the most important issues confronting the country, which clearly was a huge issue in the election and which got bottled up in the Senate."

Republican leaders have been complaining daily about being pushed to the margins. "It's hypocritical because they campaigned on openness and bipartisanship," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.), adding that shutting out the minority hurts Congress. "It stifles debate and ideas and also manipulates the outcome."

And yet, significant numbers of House Republicans have voted along with Democrats on the legislation passed so far -- a fact that somewhat mutes criticism about iron-fisted tactics.

Some say Democrats risk being accused of the same abuse of power that Republicans were charged with when they were running Capitol Hill. Republicans became notorious for tactics such as prolonging a roll call vote for three hours in order to round up enough Republicans to pass a bill or failing to notify Democratic members of committee meetings or negotiating sessions.

"They're on thin ice now," Norman J. Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said of the new Democratic leaders. "I'm getting uneasy about this lack of amendments. . . . They're getting to the point where you're past the initial period where you've got an excuse to operate with a firm hand. It's going to be increasingly difficult to rationalize."

In May, months before her party won control of Congress and she became speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said "bills should generally come to the floor under a procedure that allows open, full and fair debate consisting of a full amendment process that grants the minority the right to offer its alternatives, including a substitute." After the election, Pelosi told the Associated Press: "The principle of civility and respect for minority participation in this House is something we promised the American people. It's the right thing to do."

In the first weeks of the new Congress, however, Democrats bypassed the usual legislative committees, refused to allow any amendments and took their agenda straight to the floor for passage. They said they needed a clear path to pass a handful of popular measures that were the basis of their successful November campaign, including expanded money for stem cell research, an increase in the federal minimum wage and implementation of recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Democrats said they would impose "regular order," the rules that permit the minority to participate more widely, in short order.

But even after passing their domestic agenda, Democratic leaders have continued to marginalize Republicans, preventing them from having a voice in legislation such as a bill to withhold federal pensions from lawmakers convicted of ethics felonies and a $463 billion bill to fund the federal government for the rest of this fiscal year.

"This is the legislative equivalent of 'the check is in the mail,' " said Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, referring to repeated promises by the Democrats to open up the legislative process to Republicans. "The Democrats are paying lip service to principle, but it's the same old high-handedness, except with a friendly face."

After watching the Senate stall over competing war resolutions and tangled discussions over the terms of debate, Hoyer and Pelosi said they wanted to prevent similar "confusion" in their chamber.

Republicans hoped to introduce a bill similar to one written by Rep. Sam Johnson, a Texas Republican who flew combat missions in Korea and Vietnam and was a prisoner of war in Hanoi. It says Congress would not cut off money for soldiers in the field. But Democrats worried it would place some members of their party in a difficult position.

The only way to avoid that was to limit discussion to one narrowly worded resolution, Hoyer said.

He said it left no room for "Well, I don't like that 'whereas' " or "I don't like that 'therefore.' " "It's very simple," Hoyer said. "If you've seen the resolution, you can read it in about 60 seconds. We support the troops, we're going to protect the troops, we disagree with the president's proposal."

Last week's debate on the Iraq war, culminating in its passage Friday by a vote of 246 to 182, was conducted under a "closed rule," which means Republicans could not offer alternatives. "I understand what they did on their agenda," said Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho). "But to do a closed rule on something like this is a huge mistake. We're talking about war and peace. You don't play politics with war."

In the closely divided Senate, Republicans made similar accusations when Democrats announced plans to introduce an Iraq resolution without permitting Republican alternatives.

"If this is allowed, this is the second bill in a row where no amendments were offered to the 49-member Republican minority," Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) said, referring to the $463 billion bill to fund the federal government as well as the Iraq resolution. "I've been here a couple of decades and I have a hard time recalling anything like this. It's inappropriate in a body that thrives on deliberation. . . . That's simply not acceptable on this side of the aisle."

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) suggested that McConnell had a short memory. "On a multitude of issues when we were in the minority, we had no opportunities to offer amendments or anything," Reid said.

And the Democrats are not completely running roughshod over Republicans, as the GOP did to the Democrats when they controlled Congress.

While they did not allow amendments on the Iraq debate, the Democrats gave every member of the chamber five minutes to speak on the resolution -- an unprecedented amount of debate on a nonbinding resolution, according to Thomas E. Mann, a scholar at Brookings Institution. He said that is more than the Republicans offered Democrats when the GOP passed a resolution last spring supporting the war in Iraq.

"So far the Democrats have had a rationale for each cluster of these votes," said Mann, who co-wrote a book about congressional dysfunction with Ornstein. "And they never said they were going to disarm. But they better pretty quickly find matters which they care about but allow reasonable deliberation in committee and amendments on the floor, or they're not going to be able to sustain this over time without damaging the institution."

Leftward, Ho? (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

THESE are balmy days on the American left — genuine, uncharacteristic sunniness unpolluted by some fluky political climate change. There is even talk of a — stutter, clear-throat, perish-thought — liberal resurgence.

Or, treading gingerly, a “liberal moment.”

“Hell, ya, this is a liberal moment,” exults Thomas Frank, author of “What’s the Matter With Kansas?” — and yes, he even calls himself a “liberal” writer, eschewing the sleeker “progressive” stage name that many lefties are preferring these days. He declares this “liberal moment” loud and proud. Until the inevitable qualifier comes.

Oh, snap. Liberal optimism, thy name is caution and caveat.

But it is optimism nonetheless, and well-founded, too, say Mr. Frank and a broad spectrum of political thinkers and leaders. And, they say, the evidence goes beyond the obvious indicators — the ascendance of Democrats in the House and Senate, President Bush’s second-term belly-flop and poll numbers showing the Democratic Party trending left and the nation’s political center trending Democratic.

The chicken-egg riddle is how much this alleged “liberal moment” bespeaks genuine momentum for the left and how much stems from anti-Bush, antiwar, anti-Republican fervor.

In other words, liberal moment or conservative slump?

Both, presumably, for reasons that could be explained in part by the “mommy party/daddy party” cliché — that is, that voters typically favor Democrats (“mommy party”) on social issues and Republicans (“daddy party”) on national security.

“At the moment, daddy seems to have messed up the war in Iraq,” says Rich Lowry, editor of the conservative National Review magazine, “so people are much more willing to listen to mommy, which helps Democrats.”

But beyond the time-worn parental paradigm, it’s clear that issues once largely walled off to the liberal hinterlands have suddenly gained mainstream acceptance and urgency. “There does seem to be momentum around a set of issues that have traditionally been the property of the left,” says David M. Kennedy, the Stanford University historian.

Presidential candidates, for instance, can now safely utter "universal health care" without being tarred as supporters of "socialized medicine." Polls show increasing support for raising the minimum wage, stem-cell research, gay and lesbian civil unions, alternative-energy initiatives and increased financial aid to offset the escalating cost of college.

Republicans can no longer blockade the cause of global warming to the wild-haired left. Once derided as "Ozone Man" by the former President Bush, Al Gore is now up for a Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar (while California's non-Oscar-nominated Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, has been hailed as an environmental action hero for introducing stringent emissions standards).

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, posits that President Bush's abortive attempt in 2005 to privatize the New Deal totem of Social Security helped usher in what he agrees is "a liberal moment."

After the 2004 election, "there was reason to think we were in the midst of a conservative moment," said Mr. Frank (no relation to Thomas Frank). He recalls that there was concern, at first, that Mr. Bush — stout from his re-election — would win the support of young voters and prevail easily on Social Security.

But the foray "flopped totally," Mr. Frank said, and it became a "powerful affirmation of the public sector."

A few months later, Mr. Frank says, the Terri Schiavo case repudiated what he calls "the Republican moral agenda" and became a seminal event in the dawning of a "liberal moment."

"Republicans thought this was a great issue for them," Mr. Frank remembers. But then, all of a sudden, he said, "people realized that 'Hey, those guys are trying to come into my life.' "

A Gallup survey last month found that Democrats led Republicans by 34 percent to 31 percent in party affiliation — the largest Democratic advantage since the Clinton administration (34 percent of respondents identified themselves as independents).

By the same token, voters aged 18 to 25 are far more Democratic than previous generations, according to a 2006 survey by Pew Research. And the ratio of Democratic voters who describe themselves as "liberal Democrats" (32 percent) has risen steadily while the share of "conservative Democrats" has dropped (23 percent). Four years earlier, 27 percent of Democrats identified as conservatives, 26 percent as liberals.

The right is seen as divided, demoralized and possibly saddled with a top duo of Republican presidential candidates — John McCain and Rudy Giuliani — who could be unnervingly palatable to moderates and even liberals on certain issues (climate change and campaign finance for Mr. McCain; abortion and gay rights for Mr. Giuliani). A third, Mitt Romney, was just four years ago elected governor of a state — Massachusetts — that many Republicans regard as the political equivalent of a Superfund site.

Conservatives are quick to maintain that while these may indeed be (vegan) salad days for liberals, it's more likely a phase than an era — and not necessarily anything that portends a blanket repudiation of conservatism. They are much quicker to blame the Republican Party — and President Bush — for their current troubles.

"Republicans basically have a shattered brand right now," said Rep. Tom Feeney, a Republican of Florida and outspoken "movement conservative." He mentions one poll in which voters overwhelmingly trusted Democrats over Republicans on matters of fiscal discipline, a finding he called "scary."

Ultimately, Mr. Feeney said, any "liberal moment" will ultimately rest on the left's ability to govern. He says the early wave of legislation passed by the new Democratic majority in the House — the so-called "six-for-'06" — dealt with easy, popular issues like supporting stem-cell research and raising the minimum wage.

"Democrats might have an edge on health care right now," Mr. Feeney said. "But let's see what happens when they put something forward that scares the bejeezus out of everyone."

Mr. Feeney's conservative confidence mirrors the inherent ambivalence of many liberals — especially when it comes to internalizing their own successes.

Even in the sweetest of times, liberals tend to be congenitally averse to walking tall, as if they're always half-expecting to be one step away from getting decked by a falling piano.

Years of ridicule, battering and electoral defeat will do that. The liberal imprint has been trashed by generations of conservative candidates and commentators drilled in every unbecoming association ("tax and spend liberal," "big government liberal," "ivory tower liberal," "limousine liberal," "commie, hippie, purple haired, weak kneed, bleeding heart, limp-wristed, weepy eyed, take your choice liberal").

It's also an open-question as to whether the "liberal moment" could survive a truly "daddy party" event — like a domestic terrorist attack.

"We're at a moment where I think the disasters of the Bush administration's domestic and foreign policies are being appreciated," said Bruce Ackerman, a professor of law and political science at Yale University and author of "Before the Next Attack."

DOJ_NMG_0133479

These failures constitute what Mr. Ackerman calls "an opening" for American liberals, but hardly a triumph.

"This is a moment of relative calm," he says. "We'll see where it leads."

White House: Moles Taken From Bush's Face Benign (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Two moles President Bush had removed from his face Friday were benign, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Saturday.

Dermatologist Steve Krivda from Walter Reed Army Medical Center/ National Naval Medical Center and Bush's regular doctor, Richard Tubb, removed the moles from Bush's left temple using a local anesthetic, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Bush has a 1-inch scab on his left temple that is expected to heal in a week to 10 days, but he does not have a bandage, Stanzel said.

He said Bush noticed one mole and had Tubb examine it Monday. Tubb then noticed the second mole and suggested they both be removed. Tests indicated they were not cancerous, according to the White House.

Bush had lesions removed from his face in December 2001 and December 2004. His most recent physical was in August 2006, the White House said.

Warnings Over Privacy Of U.S. Health Network (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — The Bush administration has no clear strategy to protect the privacy of patients as it promotes the use of electronic medical records throughout the nation's health care system, federal investigators say in a new report.

In the report, the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress, said the administration had a jumble of studies and vague policy statements but no overall strategy to ensure that privacy protections would be built into computer networks linking insurers, doctors, hospitals and other health care providers.

President Bush has repeatedly called for the creation of such networks, through which health care providers could share information on patients. In 2004, Mr. Bush declared that every American should have a "personal electronic medical record" within 10 years — by 2014. With computerized records, he said, "we can avoid dangerous medical mistakes, reduce costs and improve care."

In response to the president's plea, federal officials have developed elaborate plans for what they describe as "a nationwide health information network." Mr. Bush has said: "One of the things I've insisted upon is that it's got to be secure and private. There's nothing more private than your own health records."

But in the report, issued this month, the G.A.O. said the administration had taken only rudimentary steps to safeguard sensitive personal data that would be exchanged over the network.

Senator Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, who requested the investigation, said it showed that "the Bush administration is not doing enough to protect the privacy of confidential health information." As a result, Mr. Akaka said, "more and more companies, health care providers and carriers are moving forward with health information technology without the necessary protections."

In written comments on the report, Jim Nicholson, the secretary of veterans affairs, who supervises one of the nation's largest health care systems, said, "I concur with the G.A.O. findings."

But Dr. Robert M. Kolodner, who coordinates work on information technology at the Department of Health and Human Services, disputed the findings. Dr. Kolodner said his department was "very committed to privacy and security as it works toward the president's goal" of switching medical records from paper to electronic files.

Mark A. Rothstein, the chairman of a panel that advises the government on health information policy, essentially agreed with the accountability office. "Health privacy has not received adequate attention at the Department of Health and Human Services," said Mr. Rothstein, a professor of law and medical ethics at the University of Louisville School of Medicine. "A sense of urgency is lacking."

Mr. Rothstein said "time is of the essence" because "the private sector is racing ahead" to establish medical record banks and health information exchanges. In December, he noted, Wal-Mart, Intel and other companies announced they were creating a huge database that could store the personal health records of more than 2.5 million employees and retirees. The companies promised they would have "stringent privacy policies and procedures."

Mr. Rothstein said Congress should not provide more money for a nationwide health information network unless the administration did more to protect the privacy of electronic medical records.

Dr. William A. Yasnoff, a physician and computer scientist who worked at the Department of Health and Human Services from 2002 to 2005, said he too had found that "the department does not have a comprehensive approach to privacy."

Explaining why he saw a need for stronger privacy protections in the digital age, Dr. Yasnoff said: "Anything you do to make information more accessible for good, laudable purposes will simultaneously make it more accessible for evil, nefarious purposes. People intuitively understand that, and they are worried."

The accountability office said doubts about privacy could slow the adoption and use of electronic medical records. Professor Rothstein offered a similar prediction, saying: "If privacy protections are not built into the network, people will not trust it. They won't participate, or they will opt out if they are allowed to."

Legislation to encourage the use of health information technology has broad bipartisan support but died in Congress last year, partly because of disagreements over privacy protections.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, lawmakers said, it is not clear how much control people would have over their electronic medical records.

Several members of Congress have drafted legislation to clarify consumers' control over such data. One proposal, by Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Representative Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, both Republicans, would establish health data banks in which people could store electronic copies of their medical records. Under the bill, a consumer would "maintain ownership over the entire health record" and could control access to it.

By contrast, under existing federal rules, hospitals and other health care providers generally do not have to obtain a patient's consent to use or disclose information for "treatment, payment or health care operations."

Should There Be A Hispanic Caucus? (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

As Latinos become a large minority, political alliances may turn out to be liabilities.

YOU GO, Loretta Sanchez. Just keep walking away from that Congressional Hispanic Caucus. No, not just because of the nasty name caucus chief Rep. Joe Baca allegedly called you. But because you'll be undermining a political practice that will increasingly hurt Mexican American statewide candidates in the most politically powerful states in the nation.

From all accounts, Rep. Sanchez's public feud with Baca is highly personal. (She says he called her a "whore.") Nonetheless, the moment provides an opportunity to ponder whether Latino legislative caucuses haven't outlived their usefulness. I say it's time to abolish them.

It's not because I stand in principled opposition to the idea of ethnic solidarity. It's just that both the demographic calculus and the political rationale that gave rise to Latino caucuses have disappeared. And as Latinos move toward becoming the largest ethnic group in the two most populous states, such caucuses become a political liability to statewide candidates vying to represent all constituencies.

Latino caucuses emerged in the 1970s when Hispanics made up a small percentage of the U.S. population. Founded in 1976 on the model of the Congressional Black Caucus, the Congressional Hispanic Caucus sought to unify regional political movements — primarily Mexican Americans in the Southwest and Puerto Ricans in the Northeast — into a single, cohesive national voice.

However, since 1970, the Latino population has grown by a whopping 267%, and today Latinos make up more than one-third of all Texans and Californians. Given the ethnic political lag, it will take Latinos at least a dozen years to constitute a third of California voters. But once they become a majority of the state's population, within 25 years, won't it be a bit unseemly to have a California Latino Legislative Caucus?

Political scientists tend to stress the symbolic rather than the substantive importance of these state and federal caucuses. "It stands for Hispanic presence and unity," says Harry Pachon of USC's Tomás Rivera Policy Institute. But symbolism can cut both ways, and the idea of a soon-to-be-majority group maintaining an ethnic-specific caucus is likely to rub future minority voters the wrong way.

Tidy multiculturalist theories notwithstanding, most diverse, modern nations rely on unspoken compromises that ease tensions between a country's parts and its whole. We can all understand how troubling the formation of a white caucus in the Senate would be.

While not entirely analogous, the Scottish experience in contemporary British politics may hold a lesson for Latino politicians. Recent polls indicate that the Scottish ancestry of Tony Blair's heir apparent, Gordon Brown, is becoming a liability among English voters. It seems that the formation of a Scottish parliament in 1999 is raising questions among English voters about their tradition of accepting Scottish politicians as their own. British voters now regard Brown as Scottish (the part) and not British (the whole). And that bodes ill for the Labor Party candidate.

Of course, a caucus is not a parliament but a group in which co-ethnics or like-minded politicians can hash out ideas and formulate a unified stance. Yet other than a few targeted issues, Latino politicians have had a hard time finding common ground. Once bipartisan, in the 1990s the Congressional Hispanic Caucus lost its Cuban-American Republican contingent after then-caucus head Rep. Xavier Becerra took an ill-advised trip to Cuba. Likewise, scholars are finding that the Latino electorate is not a cohesive ethnic vote.

"The idea of the caucus was to present ethnic unity back when people thought that was the only way they could be important," says Columbia University's Rodolfo de la Garza. "Those days are over." Indeed, as the number of Latino elected officials has multiplied, so has the number of voices, and unity has become something of a chimera.

But don't mistake the absence of unity and the abolishing of Latino caucuses as a form of retreat. Most observers would agree that American Jews have considerable political influence. Today there are 30 Jewish House members and 13 Jewish senators. But historically, Jewish members have resisted the idea of establishing a formal caucus, in part because they have not wanted to invite a backlash.

It might also help to know that New Mexico, the only state that has a Mexican American governor, does not have a Latino legislative caucus. "With Hispanics making up 43% of the population and represented in all walks of life, there is no perceived need to organize as a political interest group," says Jose Zebedeo Garcia, who teaches politics at New Mexico State University.

We're not there yet in California and Texas, but we had best be prepared for the day.

Rudy Giuliani As Foreign Policy Guru? (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

THE NORMAL rule in American politics is that if you run for president and your experience comes at the state level, most people will assume that foreign policy is your weak point. You can overcome that political vulnerability — as George W. Bush, Bill Clinton and other governors did while getting elected. One would presume that this applies even more to presidential candidates whose highest office reached is mayor. And yet we have the strange case of Rudolph Giuliani.

Giuliani's presidential campaign is starting to win a cult following among conservatives. It's not his position on domestic policy that's doing it — he has nothing to say about that. Lord knows it's not his social issue positions, which even his strongest backers acknowledge are his political weak point. No, he has somehow built a record as a foreign policy guru despite having no experience beyond the municipal level.

What are Giuliani's credentials? Everybody knows the basics. On Sept. 11, 2001, he rolled up his shirt sleeves and gave reassuring speeches. He has a tough guy persona. He expresses extremely strong disapproval for enemies of the United States. (For instance, Giuliani has bragged about asking President Bush to let him personally execute Osama bin Laden.)

All this makes Republicans swoon. Sometimes literally. Conservative pundit Danielle Crittenden recently penned a Valentine's Day poem to Giuliani. One section summarized his foreign policy skills thusly:

"A man who's locked out Arafat/And thrown vagrants into prison

Won't cringe before a Democrat/ Or allow Iran nuclear fission."

I'm no poetry critic, but I do know that a tough policy against the homeless is not a good proxy for the conduct of foreign policy.

If having a macho swagger and talking tough about bad guys were enough to make a good commander in chief, we wouldn't have the worst foreign policy disaster in U.S. history on our hands right now in Iraq. And, need I remind anybody, one of the reasons Giuliani hasn't been able to fulfill his Bin Laden execution fantasy is that Bush allowed the Al Qaeda leader to escape at Tora Bora by using Afghan proxies instead of U.S. ground troops.

As I noted in this space last week, conservative foreign policy consists increasingly of abstract notions divorced from reality. In preparing for last week's House debate over the Iraq troop surge, the Republican leadership instructed its members in a memo: "The debate should not be about the surge or its details. This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date, mistakes that have been made or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

So they're strong on foreign policy, except insofar as it involves actual policy. They tend to be much better, however, at comparing themselves to figures such as Winston Churchill or Abraham Lincoln. They make such comparisons incessantly. Last week, Giuliani said that Lincoln had "that ability that a leader has — a leader like George Bush, a leader like Ronald Reagan — to look into the future."

DOJ_NMG_0133482

A few days later, the New York Times revealed that the 2002 postwar plan for Iraq envisioned a broadly representative Iraqi government, an intact Iraqi army and just a handful of U.S. troops remaining. I would say this is not a good job of looking into the future.

I'm sure Giuliani and his fans would dismiss such slip-ups, and there have been many, as mere detail. The important thing to them is leadership — Bush has it; Giuliani has it.

Giuliani raked in millions after 9/11, appearing at motivational seminars, where anybody with $49 could listen to him recount his 9/11 heroics and also take in speeches by such foreign policy titans as Zig Ziglar and Goldie Hawn. Giuliani also wrote a book promising to show "how the leadership skills he practices can be employed successfully by anyone who has to run anything."

But if anybody who buys his book can acquire the same leadership skills, why do we need Giuliani?

A Man With A Mission (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Mitt Romney spent last week on a presidential candidate announcement tour, speaking in Michigan and Iowa on Tuesday, then hitting South Carolina, New Hampshire and Boston before heading to Florida. Today, in the second installment of Outlook's occasional series on the presidential candidates, classmates, colleagues and competitors from the past remember Romney and his journey from former governor's son to former governor. Also inside: a crash course on the Mormon faith and public life.

Mitt Romney had about the same success as a Mormon missionary in France as most people had: not much.

I served with him in Bordeaux and Paris off and on for 18 months, and for several months we worked as a pair, canvassing the countryside together. A very common way of making contacts is by knocking door to door. We would try to make our approach as interesting as possible. We would introduce ourselves as missionaries from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, say that we had a message about Jesus Christ and his appearance on the American continent. Could we have a moment of their time?

Usually the answer was: " Non, merc i."

It was an exercise in humility in the face of rejection. But Mitt always knew how to encourage us to keep going despite the many doors slammed in our faces. Primarily, he led by example. During our service, some of the missionaries had begun to feel that in keeping with their ministerial calling it was not appropriate to laugh out loud very much. Mitt always had a strong laugh and at the time of the proposed laughing ban, he was the top leader in the mission, assistant to the mission president. So he really dispelled the anti-laughing crowd, mostly with his humor.

In the middle of his service in France, he was the driver in an automobile accident in which a woman who was very dear to us was killed. He could have been much more morose, but he led us through that difficult time and returned to his cheery self.

While we were there, we read the book "Think and Grow Rich!" by Napoleon Hill. Some of our church leaders recommended that we use those concepts of positive thinking to overcome doubt and discouragement so we could perform at a higher level. They meant it as applied to our missionary work, but of course it could be applied to business as well. I've often said that Mitt and I read that book at the same time but he read it better than I did.

-- Dane McBride, served as a missionary in France with Romney

Mitt's father, George, was the governor of Michigan all the years that I knew Mitt at the Cranbrook school. This meant that a Michigan state police detail was at their home all the time. Mitt befriended some of the officers and they left police gifts with him: a shirt, a faux badge, a light, a police belt, among other tokens. Mitt had an innate wackiness, and after we all turned 16 and could drive, he, our friend Butch McDonald and I hatched a plot to use some of those gifts to frighten our unsuspecting dates from Kingswood, Cranbrook's sister school.

The school policy was that the girls could sign out until 11 p.m. on weekends. Earlier in the afternoon of our date, we planted empty beer bottles in the trunk of Butch's car. We agreed that at the appointed time, 10:45 p.m., our car would slowly approach a secluded section of dirt road near the school, and that we would pull over and turn out the lights. Mitt, driving a dark '65 American Motors vehicle (his father had revived that ailing car company before running for governor) topped with a revolving red light, and dressed in his goofy police uniform with a U.S. Air Force hat and dark glasses, came up behind us and approached the driver's window. In a gravelly voice, he asked the two of us to exit the vehicle and open the trunk. The bottles were discovered and rattled for effect. "Step back into the car, boys," the "officer" said, and returned to his vehicle. We expressed mock alarm, peeled out on the dirt road and rushed the girls into the school parking lot just in time. Minutes later, at the local drive-in, we three perpetrators reveled in our success.

Mitt Romney and I were members of the Cranbrook pep squad -- also called cheerleaders. We were un-coached and only barely organized. We did lead the occasional cheer, drawing on whatever we could remember from television or movies. Someone gave me a domesticated duck and suggested that I bring it to one of our football games as the unofficial school mascot. We were the Cranbrook Cranes, and the school mascot, an elegant, regal, long-legged crane, is emblazoned in many places around campus, including on every chair in the dining hall. So I thought it was quite the joke for the pep squad to show up with a squat, fat pseudo-crane mascot to cheer on the football players. The problem came at the end of the game. We had no place to keep the duck. Giving it to a restaurant was all I could think of. Then Mitt stepped forward and volunteered to take charge of our little mascot. He'd put it at his parents' house, where there was a small pond and it could live in a natural, duck-friendly setting until the next game.

The next week, however, as I carefully set up the duck pen on the sidelines, Mitt showed up at the game sans duck. It seems that when he went to get the duck to bring it to the game, all he could find was a small patch of feathers. A fox had gotten there first. Mitt could have laughed this off, as probably the rest of us would have. But he didn't. It was quite obvious that he not only felt sorry for the duck, he also felt sorry that he had let us down. We tried to let him off the hook as best as we could, but I suspect that to this day, he still feels bad about that duck. In fact, as the years went by, it was one of those things you knew not to bring up.

-- Gregg Dearth, Cranbrook classmate

I will never forget Mitt calmly rattling off and quantifying the different financial problems of the Salt Lake City Olympics. He had been running the operation for a few weeks, and the magnitude of the issues was coming into focus. Tens of millions here, tens of millions there, and the media and sponsors riveting their attention on the scandals he had inherited. I asked how I could help. Because his Bain Capital had been my first institutional investor at Staples and he had been a member of our board for 15 years, he said he knew full well that I was too cheap to buy an Olympic sponsorship for $10 million or so. A few months later he called with a different opportunity. He had personally solicited Office Depot and Office Max to be Olympic sponsors. Both had turned him down. Thus, he could now offer me an opportunity to become an official Olympic "supplier." Much less money, but the ability to use the rings and tickets. I jumped at it. However, for weeks his normally crackerjack staff did not follow through with our marketing department.

Then Mitt called. "Tom, I am terribly sorry. Right around the time of our meeting, IMG persuaded the brand new Office Depot CEO to take a major sponsorship. You are out. I feel terrible given my history with you and Staples, but I have to respect what is best for the Games versus my personal relationships. I will get you guys some tickets, but unfortunately they will not be great. " I wasn't happy, but I knew it was how Mitt operated: he did the right thing, whether his friends liked it or not.

-- Tom Stemberg, founder and former president and chief executive of Staples Inc.

When Mitt assumed leadership as president and CEO of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee, everybody saw our Olympic Games as having a very black mark on them. The Justice Department was considering indicting us as an organizing committee. Finances were in very troubling condition. We simply didn't have the money to put on the Games. Mitt immediately worked on raising revenue and on cutting costs. Before he arrived, the organizing board used to have elaborate lunches accented with elegant decorations. I wasn't there, but that high-end catering was the stuff of rumors. For Mitt's first meeting, he served pizza and charged a dollar a slice. The message was clear: be responsible about how you spend money.

However, the budget challenge was nothing compared with the obligation to keep people from 83 nations safe at the Olympics just five months after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

I will never forget the Opening Ceremonies of the Olympic Games and watching Mitt, President Bush and Jacques Rogge, the president of the International Olympic Committee, standing at attention as the flag from the World Trade Center was brought in to the stadium by several athletes. A hushed, reverent crowd, more than 50,000 strong, listened as our national anthem was played.

Mitt and I were in Torino, Italy, together. I hope we'll be in Beijing together next year. He may have some other plans for the summer of 2008, but I know he would love to go.

-- Fraser Bullock, chief operating officer and chief financial officer of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee

After we were sworn in as governor and lieutenant governor in Massachusetts, Mitt and I received some very sobering news: The true budget gap was more than $3 billion (out of a $23 billion budget), up from the projected $1 billion gap. We had campaigned during the fiscal crisis of 2002-03, when many states, including Massachusetts, saw their tax revenue collapse and vowed to close the gap without raising taxes. Mitt asked his managers to accomplish the same work, with fewer resources, by developing new approaches. So instead of inspecting wetlands from the ground, the new leaner environmental affairs office increased enforcement actions by taking regular aerial photos of endangered wetlands. A plane could cover more ground more cheaply and effectively than a bureaucrat in a car. Two parks departments (one a legendary haven for no-show patronage positions) were merged despite the howls from legislators on both sides of the aisle who counted on securing well-paid summer jobs by the public pool for kids of their friends and relatives. Mitt provided leadership in tough times, spurred innovation, honored the work behind each tax dollar and respected families -- that's the Mitt Romney I worked with for the past four years.

-- Kerry Healey, lieutenant governor of Massachusetts during Romney's term as governor

I had known Mitt Romney for more than 20 years when I went to speak to him in his campaign office in early 1994. We attended the same church and I know a couple of his children quite well and they're all lovely people. But there's a difference between being a lovely family and being a knowledgeable leader. When I went to see him, he had recently announced that he was running against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and I thought it would be important for him to hear from someone who'd been active in women's politics in Massachusetts.

I congratulated him on taking a pro-choice position, one of the reasons I had been open to working with him. I remember his response was something like: "Well, this is Massachusetts. I realized I had to take this position," which was the first indication to me that what I had understood to be his personal view was a stance he was actually taking pragmatically. He went on that day to talk about an aunt of his who had died during a botched abortion and how he thought legalized abortion was important. But those around him, and people who knew him closely in the ward, knew that it was a position he had taken because he thought he had to in order to win.

I watch with interest as Mitt Romney courts the conservative wing of the Republican Party with his antiabortion message. It reminds me of a pivotal moment in the 2002 campaign for governor of Massachusetts. In the final few weeks before the election, the polls indicated that although I had enjoyed a lead over Romney after I won the primary, the barrage of negative ads was helping to narrow the margin heading into the general election. In preparing for the final debate of the campaign, one strategy was to expose Romney's record of waffling on the issue of abortion, an important topic for a majority of voters in Massachusetts. I pointed out that, in his 1994 race against Sen. Ted Kennedy, Romney had accepted the endorsement of a pro-life group, and that when he was living in Utah while running the Olympics, his close friend and adviser had written a letter to the editor stating that Romney was not pro-choice and had taken on that label only to run against the senator. Romney responded that his support for a woman's right to an abortion was deep and long-held, dating to the early 1970s. He stated that since the 1970s, he had agreed with his mother, an unsuccessful candidate for the U.S. Senate, that to support abortion reflected an important belief in the separation of church and state. He was angered by my statements. He chastised me for being "unbecoming" because I was trying to scare the voters on this important issue, and insisted that he was truly pro-choice and "devoted and dedicated to honoring [his] word" on this issue. In that exchange, he was able to not only solidify his image as a strong pro-choice advocate, he was also masterful in spinning the story afterward that I was overly aggressive and indeed "unbecoming," because I had insisted that he was not telling the truth.

-- Shannon O'Brien, former Massachusetts state treasurer and Romney's 2002 opponent

Mitt had hired me as a young associate at Bain & Co. in 1978, and we worked together occasionally between then and 1983, when we laid the foundations for the creation of Bain Capital. We started with a vision but virtually no experience in the realm that is now known as private equity. For six months, we traipsed around the United States, Europe and Latin America, seeking investors to back our plan, getting plenty of "no, thank yous" along the way.

One potential investor was concerned that we would spend lavishly on fancy offices and needless expenses. I could tell that this bothered Mitt, because he is very careful about spending. Finally, I told the gentleman: "You need to understand how frugal Mitt is. When he and Ann go to the movies, they pop their own popcorn in advance. Mitt figures the home-popped Orville Redenbacher costs him only 62 cents, which is a whole lot cheaper than $4.50 for the big tub at the movie counter."

-- Coleman Andrews, co-founded Bain Capital with Romney in 1983.

When Mitt was at Bain Capital, I referred a couple of deals to him. In that business, you have to be a vacuum cleaner and amass more facts about the investment than anyone else in the world. That's a skill set that serves him well. Romney was so successful as a private equity investor that he was able to command a 30 percent share of the profits for Bain as general partner. That figure normally would be 20 percent. He was the most successful private equity investor in the country and with his track record, people were happy to give a 30 percent share to Bain. If you pay sufficient attention to detail you have less risk. And with him, nothing is left to chance unless it has to be. He is running his campaign that way -- marvelous planning at all levels.

Debate Over Iraq Follows McCain To Iowa (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Crowd's Questions Indicate Senator's Presidential Bid May Be Tied Closely to War

DES MOINES, Feb. 17 -- The war in Iraq followed Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) to Iowa on Saturday, as the Republican presidential candidate faced a series of skeptical questions about the lack of progress in the conflict and whether he or anyone has a plan for success.

It became clear from the opening minutes of his first meeting of the day just how much the presidential aspirations of the senator, who is one of the leading advocates of President Bush's troop-increase policy, may be tied to events in Iraq.

During the hour-long town hall meeting, McCain drew questions about the cost of the war, the prospects for success, the dangers of failure, the treatment of veterans and the new threats from Iran.

Throughout, he walked a line between strong advocacy for the troop buildup as the best chance to avoid a bloodletting in Iraq and defensiveness over the lack of progress and the growing impatience on the part of the public over what he said has been a badly mismanaged war effort dating back years.

"I know how tough it is for the American people," he told an audience of several hundred people. "I know how frustrated Americans are. I know how saddened we are when we lose our most precious treasure. I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I could not be honest with you without telling you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic and there would be genocide and chaos."

McCain's visit was his first to Iowa since establishing his presidential campaign committee. On a day when Democratic presidential candidates were tearing up their schedules to return to Washington for the unsuccessful Senate vote to begin debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop buildup, McCain chose to go ahead with a full day of events in Iowa.

McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade.

He ridiculed the action as a "purely political stunt" that was "insulting to the public and our soldiers" in Iraq. "This may be how Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi construe their responsibilities, but it's not how I construe mine," he told reporters.

Still, there was no escaping a debate over the war, even before a largely Republican audience that included veterans of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan, and their relatives.

McCain advisers think Republicans likely to vote in next year's Iowa precinct caucuses, which will kick off the presidential nominating contests, generally support Bush's, and by implication McCain's, position on Iraq. But McCain noted Saturday that he is aware that his views are at odds with those of a majority of Americans nationally.

"I don't know the views frankly of caucus-goers on this particular issue," he said. "But I unfortunately know the views of a majority of Americans."

The first question in Des Moines came from a veteran of two tours in Iraq and a tour in Afghanistan who said Americans are not being told about the progress in Iraq. McCain said progress has been overshadowed by the violence there -- and said Americans are understandably frustrated because of overly optimistic expectations raised by defenders of the war.

"We raised people's expectations -- 'mission accomplished,' 'few dead-enders,' 'last throes' -- all of those comments that made Americans believe that we were on the verge of getting this thing done," he said. Instead, he added, the war has been a "long, tough struggle that we should have told the American people about."

McCain said he has no fallback plan if the policy of sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq fails. "We live in a democracy, and when the American people don't support -- as we learned in Vietnam, as we learned in Beirut, as we learned in Somalia -- then we are not able to maintain a foreign endeavor. I can give you lots of options, but I'm hard-pressed to find one that will have the support of the American people."

A man who said his son had served in Afghanistan and Iraq challenged McCain to explain what it would cost the country to succeed in Iraq. McCain said he didn't know, other than to say it will take a long time before it is clear whether the United States is succeeding militarily.

"In terms of dollars and lives, I can't give you an estimate, except to say, sir, I think it's going to be very expensive," he said, "but not as expensive as the bloodletting, the killing fields that will take place in Baghdad if we just left."

Also Saturday, McCain won the endorsement of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), whose popularity among social conservatives could help McCain here in Iowa and elsewhere.

Thune said he recognizes that McCain has taken some positions that are not popular among conservatives but added that he extracted a promise from the Arizonan that he would appoint conservative jurists to the federal bench.

DOJ_NMG_0133486

Without identifying them by name, Thune said McCain's rivals have questionable records on the issue of abortion. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani supports abortion rights, while former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney has changed his views and now opposes abortion. "Whether you like him or not, McCain has been consistent on issues," Thune said.

No Retreat On Iraq Stance, McCain Insists (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

DES MOINES, Feb. 17 — Senator John McCain arrived in Iowa on Saturday to begin testing one of the biggest questions so far of the presidential campaign: Can he win as an all-out supporter of the war in Iraq?

Almost from the moment he took the stage at his first event here since forming his presidential exploratory committee, Mr. McCain made clear that he was not backing down when it came to the war, and that in political terms, he might see an advantage in presenting himself to the first Republican voters in the nominating process as an unapologetic advocate for the war in Iraq.

He attacked Senate Democrats for what he called "a political stunt" in trying to join the House in passing a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad. He warned of catastrophic consequences if the United States abandoned its effort in Iraq.

He belittled the White House for falsely raising hopes by asserting early American successes in the war. And he spent nearly 60 minutes fielding questions and challenges from an audience of Republicans, many of them clearly with Mr. McCain on the issue but others anguished over the war.

"I know how tough it is for the American people, I know how frustrated Americans are, I understand your frustration," Mr. McCain said. "I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic."

To be here, Mr. McCain skipped the debate in the Senate — he called the rare Saturday session in the Capitol "insulting to the public and our soldiers" — but the war was as omnipresent in the Des Moines hotel ballroom as it was in Washington.

It brought to life what has become a central strategic gamble for the McCain campaign: that his support of the war in Iraq would help him among the select groups of Iowa Republicans who will caucus here next January. It is a position that gives him an opportunity to reassure Republican activists here who have not forgotten or forgiven his frequent criticisms of the administration in the earlier years of Mr. Bush's presidency, according to state party officials.

"Even if it's not popular in the general election, everybody in the Republican primary process is supporting the surge," said Mark McKinnon, one of Mr. McCain's senior advisers.

In many ways, Mr. McCain finds himself in the opposite situation of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. He has embraced a position that may lift him through the primaries, but that could complicate his prospects against an antiwar Democrat in the general election, his own advisers said.

Mr. McCain's aides could barely contain their frustration, as Mr. McCain sailed off on this maiden voyage of his campaign, at the extent to which perhaps the most important factor in determining the 2008 race was beyond of their control. One aide, who was granted anonymity in order to offer a rather gloomy appraisal of Republican hopes for holding the White House in 2008, said that if the situation Iraq deteriorated or even stayed the same, it would be a major liability for the Republican who won the presidential nomination.

"Republicans are in a tough spot — there's nobody running for president who controls the destiny of what happens there," the aide said. "I do think as Republicans we have to get to a difference place on Iraq or we are in trouble as a party."

Mr. McCain's first stop Saturday suggested just how torn Americans are about this war, regardless of party. A questioner who introduced himself as a veteran of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan drew an ovation that lasted nearly 60 seconds. But moments later, Mr. McCain faced skeptical questioning from Marty Baddeloo, a business coach who lives in West Des Moines and who said he had a son who served in Iraq, about how much money — and how many lives — would be needed for Mr. McCain to accomplish his mission.

"I'd like to know what it's going to cost to be successful in Iraq," Mr. Baddeloo said. "Assuming you are elected president, if your plans are implemented, what is it going to cost in terms of time and dollars for us to be successful in Iraq?"

Mr. McCain, holding a wireless microphone and wearing a loose-fitting brown leather jacket, answered with a subdued tone. "I'd like to be able to give you an answer, sir," he said. "And you reflect the frustration that many Americans feel."

While the war in Iraq looms as a political liability for the major Republican contenders — Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, have also expressed support for Mr. Bush's war policy — none have been as closely identified with the war effort as Mr. McCain. And Mr. McCain showed no signs of walking away from a war that, his advisers said, he arguably owns as much as Mr. Bush does.

"I don't know what the other options are," Mr. McCain said when one questioner asked what would happen if this escalation of 21,500 troops — fewer than Mr. McCain had advocated — failed to work. "Because if we fail here — I'm going to give you very straight talk here — it's not going to maintain the support of the American people. I can give you lots of options, but I'm hard-pressed to find one that will get the support of the American people."

And he was disdainful of Senate Democrats, mocking them for pushing through a procedural vote in the Senate on a Saturday. "I'm more than willing to discuss Iraq and my views, but I think it's insulting to the public and our soldiers to pretend we are discharging our responsibilities in any meaningful way."

Mr. McCain said again at a news conference on Saturday morning that political factors played no role in his views. "I've said all along I cannot be concerned or will not be concerned if it helps me or hurts me with anyone," he said. "Its an issue that transcends any political ambitions I might have."

Still, that is something that Mr. McCain's advisers — thinking about both the primary battle and a general election fight — have given much thought to. Mr. McCain's advisers said they thought that he could be insulated to some extent by a failure of American policy in Iraq because of the fact that he has long been critical of the way the war was handled; he called for an increase in troop strength there long before Mr. Bush acted.

"The fact of the matter is McCain has been saying this for three years and maintained from Day 1 that we don't have enough troops there," said Dave Roederer, the Iowa chairman of Mr. McCain's campaign.

And Mr. McCain was openly scornful of the White House for raising expectations among the American public by making statements that conveyed that the effort in Iraq was far more successful than it actually was.

"We raised people's expectations: mission accomplished, a few dead-enders, last throes," he said. "All those comments that made Americans believe we were on the verge of getting this thing done when in reality on the ground, as you saw, it was a long, hard struggle that we should have told people that it is."

Mr. McCain's aides said they saw one upside for Mr. McCain now: that his position on the war could help him through the months ahead.

"In the Republican primary, this is going to be good for Senator McCain," said Russ Schriefer, Mr. McCain's media adviser. "It makes him more of a Republican. To those who might have been uneasy about him not being enough of a team player it shows him as very much a team player on this issue."

"Amen" To Brownback (TSSC)

By Lee Bandy

The State, February 18, 2007

Three weeks ago, an estimated 350 Republican Party activists attended a luncheon in Columbia for GOP presidential hopeful Sam Brownback.

Many came out of curiosity.

The U.S. senator from Kansas, viewed as an "ideologue," is considered by many the leading "Christian right" candidate in the race.

Brownback certainly didn't disappoint his audience, made up mostly of religious conservatives. Members punctuated the air with shouts of "amen" and "praise the Lord." It sounded more like a revival service than a political gathering.

Many conservatives and religious leaders view Brownback as a serious candidate to succeed President George W. Bush.

Whether Brownback does, there's little doubt he will become a major figure in U.S. public life and an increasingly critical player in its governing coalitions.

On the stump, Brownback preaches the gospel of the Christian right, stating his strong opposition to abortion and gay marriage.

Like Ronald Reagan, Brownback believes "America must be that 'Shining City on a Hill,' where faith, moral values and respect for life are celebrated."

He tells audiences, "I am unequivocally pro-life and believe in upholding the sanctity of marriage between one man and one woman."

Brownback says his stance on moral values will distinguish him from others vying for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

To that end, he and his staff have gone out of their way to portray former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's position on abortion as highly questionable.

They charge that Romney — who supported abortion rights before, more recently, opposing them — is no true-blue conservative.

DOJ_NMG_0133488

"I think there's room in the field for someone with full-scale conservative values," Brownback recently told a Spartanburg audience.

And he made it clear he was that individual.

Religious conservatives, an important voting bloc for the GOP, comprise about a third of the Republican vote in S.C. primaries.

Brownback is one of the most conservative, religious, politicians in America today. A born-again Christian, he is engaged in humanitarian causes abroad. If there were any doubts that Brownback is a member of the Christian right, they were removed recently with the appointment of Nashville gospel-recording artist Michael W. Smith, as national co-chairman of the Brownback campaign.

But just when he thought he was home free as the Christian right's candidate, Brownback picked up competition for that vote with Monday's entry into the race of former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

An ordained Southern Baptist preacher, Huckabee has a big following in the evangelical community. He also has written a fun new book that should give him a bit of a national platform, according to "The Hotline," a Washington, D.C.-based political Web site.

Huckabee could be the break-out candidate in Iowa. But he lacks money and organization, says Drew McKissick, a Christian Coalition board member from Columbia.

South Carolina might be easier for Huckabee, Hotline said. But if he's not careful, Brownback might sew up the state's remaining social conservative endorsements before Huckabee can build any momentum.

Clinton Gives War Critics New Answer On '02 Vote (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

One of the most important decisions that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton made about her bid for the presidency came late last year when she ended a debate in her camp over whether she should repudiate her 2002 vote authorizing military action in Iraq.

Several advisers, friends and donors said in interviews that they had urged her to call her vote a mistake in order to appease antiwar Democrats, who play a critical role in the nominating process. Yet Mrs. Clinton herself, backed by another faction, never wanted to apologize — even if she viewed the war as a mistake — arguing that an apology would be a gimmick.

In the end, she settled on language that was similar to Senator John Kerry's when he was the Democratic nominee in 2004: that if she had known in 2002 what she knows now about Iraqi weaponry, she would never have voted for the Senate resolution authorizing force.

Yet antiwar anger has festered, and yesterday morning Mrs. Clinton rolled out a new response to those demanding contrition: She said she was willing to lose support from voters rather than make an apology she did not believe in.

"If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from," Mrs. Clinton told an audience in Dover, N.H., in a veiled reference to two rivals for the nomination, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

Her decision not to apologize is regarded so seriously within her campaign that some advisers believe it will be remembered as a turning point in the race: either ultimately galvanizing voters against her (if she loses the nomination), or highlighting her resolve and her willingness to buck Democratic conventional wisdom (if she wins).

At the same time, the level of Democratic anger has surprised some of her allies and advisers, and her campaign is worried about how long it will last and how much damage it might cause her.

"Some of her many advisers think she should've uttered the three magic words — 'I was wrong' — but she believes it's self-evident that the Senate Iraq resolution was based on false intelligence and never should've come to a vote," said Richard C. Holbrooke, the former United Nations ambassador and an adviser to Mrs. Clinton on foreign policy.

Navigating the antiwar anger, and toughing it out for 11 months until the primaries, is now perhaps Mrs. Clinton's biggest political challenge. Indeed, in many ways at this stage, Iraq has overtaken her and other candidates' campaigns, as was evident yesterday as she rearranged her schedule to appear briefly in New Hampshire before returning to the Senate for a debate on Mr. Bush's war strategy.

The campaign began a push yesterday to deal with its Iraq challenge. Besides her remarks in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton submitted a bill in the Senate to block sending more troops to Iraq, though she would not cut off financing. In a new video on her Web site, she called for starting to redeploy troops within 90 days — or else, she threatened, Congress should revoke authorization for the war.

"She is in a box now on her Iraq vote, but she doesn't want to be in a different, even worse box — the vacillating, flip-flopping Democratic candidate that went to defeat in 2000 and '04," said one adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "She wants to maintain a firmness, and I think a lot of people around her hope she maintains a firmness. That's what people will want in 2008."

Indeed, Mrs. Clinton believes that reversing course on her vote would invite the charge of flip-flopping that damaged Mr. Kerry or provoke the kind of accusations of political expediency that hung over Al Gore in 2000 and her and her husband, President Bill Clinton, in the 1990s, several advisers said. She has argued to associates in private discussions that Mr. Gore and Mr. Kerry lost, in part, because they could not convince enough Americans that they were resolute on national security, the associates said.

Mrs. Clinton's image as a strong leader, in turn, is critical to her hopes of becoming the nation's first female president. According to one adviser, her internal polling indicates that a high proportion of Democrats see her as strong and tough, both assets particularly valuable to a female candidate who is seeking to become commander in chief. Apologizing might hurt that image, this adviser said.

Mrs. Clinton's belief in executive power and authority is another factor weighing against an apology, advisers said. As a candidate, Mrs. Clinton likes to think and formulate ideas as if she were president — her "responsibility gene," she has called it. In that vein, she believes that a president usually deserves the benefit of the doubt from Congress on matters of executive authority.

Yet some Democrats are surprised that the Clinton campaign, which is widely regarded as a ferocious political operation, has not lanced this issue. After all, they said, a majority of Democrats tell pollsters they are against the war, and many Americans want a firm deadline to leave Iraq. Mrs. Clinton has called for capping the troop level, but has opposed a deadline.

"For the life of me I don't understand why she can't say, 'I made a mistake, I was misled, the country was misled, the intelligence was manipulated,' " said Robert M. Shrum, a senior adviser to Mr. Kerry in 2004. "I think there's this tremendous desire in her campaign not to get into a position where you're identified with traditional Democratic views. But this is now a party that is strongly antiwar, and is desperate for change on big issues like Iraq and health care."

Yet Mrs. Clinton's refusal to apologize yesterday in Dover drew support from some voters, and she also won strong applause for saying her priority now is to end the war.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have been split for some time about whether she would be better off if she apologized for the vote. Mark Penn, her chief strategist, who was also Mr. Clinton's pollster, carries considerable influence within the campaign, and he agrees with her that she should keep the "mistake" onus on Mr. Bush and turn her attention to finding "the right end" to the war, as she says.

Foreign policy advisers say they have made similar arguments: look to the future, not the past, and stand by a vote that was based on military intelligence that was widely accepted at the time.

The campaign faction that was more comfortable with an apology included advisers with war-room instincts who wanted to deal proactively with the attacks that would come. Yet they were torn, too. They argued that she should talk about the future, yet also deal decisively with her 2002 vote — either by saying it was wrong, or acknowledging that others saw it as wrong, or making a speech on Iraq.

The internal campaign debate concluded in December when Mrs. Clinton decided not to apologize or give a speech. Instead, she went on the "Today" show and, in a little-noticed remark, simply said she would not vote for the Senate Iraq resolution again.

By comparison, to the annoyance of Clinton advisers, Mr. Edwards has proved able to short-circuit questions about his own Senate vote for military action in 2002 by repeatedly calling it a mistake. He took a hard line against Iraq in 2002, then veered sharply in 2005 when he said he was wrong on the vote, and he has not suffered much politically.

A leading Republican candidate, Senator John McCain of Arizona, has defended the current war plan with language that could appeal to primary voters but perhaps hurt him in a general election. Mrs. Clinton is running, in part, a general-election strategy — taking positions on Iraq that might appeal to independents and some Republicans.

Yet her motivation not to apologize goes deeper than that, advisers said.

Her approach to leadership and national security was forged during her eight years in the White House: She believes in executive authority and Congressional deference, her advisers say, and is careful about suggesting that Congress can overrule a commander in chief.

"She thinks she will be president and will have to negotiate on the nation's behalf with world leaders," said one Clinton adviser. "She thinks we're likely to still be in this mess in 2009, and coming onto the campaign trail and groveling and saying at every opportunity that you made a mistake doesn't actually help you solve the problem."

GOP Hawks Circling Clinton's Campaign (LAT)

By Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Old enemies of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are out in force. Just weeks after she joined the Democratic Party's flock of presidential contenders, Clinton is being targeted by conservative and Republican-allied activists intent on derailing her campaign before the start of next year's primaries.

They have surfaced with a flurry of planned projects: a Michael Moore-style documentary film, book-length exposes, and websites such as StopHerNow.com and StopHillaryPAC.com.

Conservative admirers of the Swift Vets and POWs for Truth media blitz that helped torpedo Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004 are now agitating to "Swift-boat" Clinton.

"People are doing what they're doing because they want to defeat her before she has a chance to win. You can't hold off your silver bullet to the end," said veteran Republican operative David N. Bossie, who is involved in the film project with Dick Morris, a former advisor to Bill Clinton.

The emerging moves against Hillary Clinton reflect the accelerated pace of the 2008 race and conservatives' growing conviction that she poses a formidable threat that requires fast and early footwork.

The New York senator has been publicly bracing for "Republican machine" attacks from the moment she launched her exploratory committee last month.

Whether she can strike back quickly may prove crucial to winning over Democratic primary voters looking for assurance that she can survive a bruising general election and Swift-boat-style attacks.

"For Democrats, there's a strong sense this time around that they can't allow those same tactics to define Democratic candidates," said Democratic media consultant Jim Margolis.

At a recent Democratic National Committee gathering in Washington, Clinton told party officials, "I know how they think, how they act and how to defeat them" — a battle call echoing her 1998 evocation of a "vast right-wing conspiracy" during the furor over her husband's affair with intern Monica S. Lewinsky.

Every presidential candidate is scrutinized by opponents. But conservative antipathy toward Clinton is especially deep and long-standing — inflamed in part by her husband's two terms in the White House, her steady rise from first lady to senator, and the widespread belief on the right that the Clintons evaded justice during the nonstop investigations of the 1990s.

Clinton's foes on the right openly tell their supporters she is a ripe target for a campaign reminiscent of the challenge of Kerry's Vietnam War record.

"Those Swift Boat Veterans for Truth were the real heroes of the 2004 election," one online exhortation reads. "We at the StopHillaryPAC want to do the same thing to Hillary."

That group's website, headed by former Rep. John LeBoutillier (R-N.Y.), collected enough early funding to launch a round of negative television ads on Iowa stations timed to Clinton's visit there in late January.

StopHerNow.com mocks her with cartoon skits. And several books marketed as exposes are in the works, in addition to at least six other anti-Clinton books already hawked on conservative talk radio and blogs.

Bossie's film, scheduled for release by year's end, is being funded through appeals from Citizens United, a conservative interest group.

Bossie, a blunt-spoken opposition researcher who has mined Clinton controversies since Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, said that the film would mimic the hard-edged partisan style of left-wing filmmaker Moore and that camera-carrying "trackers" would tail Clinton during campaign events.

Bossie is delving into Hillary Clinton's roles in the Whitewater real estate deals, her $100,000 profit from cattle futures and the firing of White House travel officials — controversies that Clinton aides dismiss as old news. He and GOP allies are convinced new nuggets will turn up —and they also see new opportunities in contrasting Clinton's avowed centrism with what they call her "polarizing liberalism."

"Conservatives believe she's more dangerous today as a potential president than when she tried to take over the healthcare plan and root it in socialism," said public relations man Greg Mueller, who handled media appearances for anti-Kerry veterans in 2004.

Bossie and his Citizens United partners have long vexed the Clintons and Democratic presidential contenders. Morris — the architect of Bill Clinton's mid-1990s political revival until he was fired in August 1996 after revelations he consorted with a prostitute — declined interview requests from The Times, though he has discussed the movie on Fox News. Bossie said his partner's past "is an acceptable risk we'll take because of Dick's personal knowledge of Hillary Clinton."

Citizens United's chairman is Floyd G. Brown, a GOP media consultant who worked on the 1988 "Willie Horton" ad that blamed Democratic presidential candidate Michael S. Dukakis for the weekend furlough of a convicted murderer who went on to commit a rape. Democrats charged that the ad exploited racial fears.

Bossie worked with Brown in the 1992 presidential campaign and later served as chief investigator for a House investigation of Clinton administration fundraising scandals. Bossie was fired from that post in 1998 for releasing transcripts of prison conversations involving Hillary Clinton's convicted former law partner, Webster L. Hubbell.

Several people behind the upswing in anti-Clinton activity say there is no coordination among the groups.

"We're doing our own thing," said Dick Collins, a Dallas businessman who gave $135,000 in StopHerNow.com seed money. The site is a spinoff from a PAC originally aimed at Clinton's Senate reelection by New York GOP strategist Arthur Finkelstein.

Collins, who has also donated $10,000 to GOP presidential hopeful Rudolph W. Giuliani's political action committee, said the site was starting out with "light humor," featuring Clinton as a cartoon character: the host of an imaginary left-wing talk show. But he added that the site — organized, like the Swift-boat group, as a "527" organization that can raise unlimited "soft money" donations — would "try other things."

Collins hopes for financing from heavyweight Texas GOP donors like oilman T. Boone Pickens and Houston real estate developer Robert Perry. Multimillion-dollar donations from the two businessmen underwrote the Swift-boat group's campaign against Kerry.

"The Swifties played hardball," Collins said, "but the Clintons play the game a lot tougher than anybody else."

Hillary Clinton's longtime spokesman, Howard Wolfson, dismissed the early GOP moves with characteristic terseness: "One thing people know about the Clintons is they know how to fight back."

When a thinly sourced report from a conservative Web magazine falsely claimed last month that Clinton researchers had uncovered evidence showing that presidential rival Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) had been educated at an Islamist madrasa in Indonesia, Clinton's team moved swiftly to dismiss the story.

Clinton's allies criticize Kerry's response to the 2004 Swift-boat ads as inconsistent and slow. And though Kerry used surrogates to repeatedly counter the attacks, he didn't personally respond until the ads had sown deep doubts among voters.

"She's going to face the same choices," warned one former Kerry aide. "It's not just how fast you respond, it's choosing the right time to unload your big guns."

Advertising her toughness poses a delicate problem for Clinton as she tries to temper her reputation for ambition and political calculation. "She wants to make clear she won't be a punching bag," said a prominent Democrat who requested anonymity because of past relations with several contenders. "But you don't want to reinforce the very thing you're trying to soften."

Clinton campaign insiders say Web-savvy staffers are immersed in monitoring suspected enemy blogs and websites and conservative cable TV and radio talk shows.

Clinton also reportedly spent lavishly to hire a large team of opposition researchers headed by Judd Legum, previously research director for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank headed by former Clinton White House chief of staff John Podesta.

Clinton allies say she helped launch Podesta's group in 2003 and played a key role in starting Media Matters for America, which describes itself as "monitoring, analyzing and correcting conservative misinformation in the U.S. media." Run by David Brock, a former right-wing muckraker who once targeted the Clintons and now defends them, Media Matters was a latecomer to the Swift-boat volleys of 2004 but now has a full staff of researchers.

Brock said the emerging conservative efforts targeting Hillary Clinton operate as an "organized defamation industry" using "the same tactics in mutually reinforcing ways, often with the same funding, with a vast media echo chamber at their disposal."

L. Brent Bozell III, who heads the conservative Media Research Center, said Brock's group did the same, only as "part of the Clinton machine." Bozell has more than a passing interest in Clinton's campaign. He is working on his own Clinton book, aiming to expose "media complicity in Hillary's attempted makeover as a centrist."

Clinton intimates said she would also eventually rely on veterans of her husband's administration such as James Carville and Paul Begala to run interference on television, and on the street-fighter instincts of longtime political aide Harold M. Ickes for behind-the-scenes advice.

"We tend to think the blogs will drive a lot of the news," Ickes said recently.

"Even if you think it's completely false or outlandish, you ignore it at your peril."

While Reid Stays Out Of '08 Fray, Sen. Clinton Signs His Son (WP)

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) has pledged not to pick among his many friends running for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, choosing instead to focus his time and energy on making Nevada's new early caucus as successful as possible.

With Reid not committing, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) found the next-best thing -- signing his eldest son, Rory, as both the chair of her campaign in the Silver State and an adviser on Western issues.

Rory Reid currently serves as the chairman of the Clark County Commission -- that's Las Vegas's county -- and is a past chairman of the Nevada state party. He is the only one of Reid's four sons in elected office.

In landing him, Clinton strikes the first major blow of the Nevada caucus contest, newly added to the party's early nominating calendar by the Democratic National Committee last year. The caucus is set for Jan. 19, sandwiched between Iowa's Jan. 14 caucuses and New Hampshire's Jan. 22 primary.

So is it like father, like son? Not necessarily. Harry Reid's allies insist he is committed to staying neutral in the race, regardless of Rory's decision. Even so, The Fix bets that Reid -- Harry, that is -- will be fielding calls from Barack Obama (Ill.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joe Biden (Del.) in the very near future.

Obama Takes First Campaign Trip South (WP)

Democratic Candidate Tailors Message to Reflect a Connection to Civil Rights Struggles

ORANGEBURG, S.C., Feb. 17 -- Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) took his presidential campaign to the heart of the Deep South for the first time this weekend, tailoring his campaign message to associate himself with the civil rights movement.

With a Kenyan father who was not descended from African slaves, Obama is unlike Southern black candidates, steeped in the slavery and civil rights struggles that tore at the region for more than a century. Neither is he like the white politicians, whose skin color automatically disqualifies them from the black experience.

And so, on his maiden presidential visit to South Carolina and Virginia, Obama was greeted with not only enthusiasm but also a bit of curiosity.

"Not only people in the black community, but people in the white community are going to be looking at this man and trying to figure out: Is he one of us? Does he understand what we've come through? What we're still confronting now?" said Vivian A. Glover, an assistant vice president at Claflin University, a historically black school in Orangeburg. "He's not bringing that with him. He's going to need to present it in some form or fashion."

It was Orangeburg where three black college students were gunned down in 1968 as they pressed to integrate the small town's only bowling alley. Speaking Saturday at Claflin to residents of the town and a new generation of students, Obama brought the primarily black crowd of about 2,000 to its feet by evoking that era.

"At every juncture in our history, there's been somebody that's said we can't. There's been somebody's said you can't overcome slavery. There's been somebody who said you can't overcome Jim Crow," Obama told the South Carolina crowd. "If I have your support, if I have your energy and involvement and commitment and ideas, then I'm here to tell you, 'Yes we can in '08.' "

Later Saturday, Obama and his wife, Michelle, traveled to Richmond and accepted the endorsement of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D). Obama told reporters that his presidential campaign is a symbol for improving race relations in America.

"Here we are in the heart of what was the Confederacy," Obama said, looking out over the Virginia statehouse, which housed the Confederate Congress during the Civil War. "For me to be able to stand here as an African American reflects the enormous progress this country has made."

He then continued a busy day by addressing more than 4,000 Democratic activists at the state party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner.

A Democrat has not won Virginia's electoral votes in decades. But Kaine, in becoming the first sitting governor to make a 2008 endorsement, said that could change with Obama as the party's nominee. He called the Illinois senator "a proud American but also a citizen of the world."

In both states, audiences greeted Obama more like a celebrity than a politician looking for their vote. In Orangeburg, cellphone cameras snapped pictures the moment he entered the gymnasium and did not stop during his speech, which was cut short to a half-hour because of Saturday's Senate vote on a resolution on Iraq.

"I like his message of togetherness," said Frank Loadholt, 56, a social worker from Orangeburg who said he will "absolutely" vote for Obama. "I look at him as the best candidate out there with the best message."

South Carolina state Rep. Gilda Cobb-Hunter (D) said it is "totally ludicrous" to worry about Obama's lack of a history in the civil rights movement. "Look at the man's record," she said. "It shows he has an understanding of issues like that."

DOJ_NMG_0133493

But many in the crowd seemed more hesitant and said they were not yet certain they will vote for Obama next year.

"I believe in listening to all of the candidates," said Wilhemina James, 58, from Florence. "This old gut hasn't failed me yet."

South Carolina has one of the nation's first presidential primaries, and African Americans make up about half of the state's Democratic electorate, so black support here is particularly critical.

Obama is vying with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former North Carolina senator John Edwards for that backing. All three camps are wooing prominent black politicians and courting black religious leaders, with varying degrees of success.

That push seemed reflected not only in Obama's Orangeburg speech but also in one he delivered to a more racially diverse crowd of almost 3,000 in Columbia on Friday.

"When folks were saying we're going to march for our freedom, somebody said, 'You can't do that.' And we did," Obama said Friday, sparking raucous applause. "And somebody said, 'Don't sit at the lunch counter.' . . . We did. When somebody said, 'Women belong in the kitchen, not in the boardroom,' they said we can't do that. Yes we did!"

Carol Singletary, 55, a retired social worker from Columbia, said that part of Obama's speech was important to her.

"I was raised in the civil rights era," said Singletary, who is black. "We came through a lot of ups and downs. South Carolina is one of those places that really did struggle. And still does struggle."

But she said Obama's background should not be a barrier to African Americans like her. "I don't hold that against him," she said after watching his speech. "I thought he was wonderful."

Edwards came to Charleston last week, and Clinton is scheduled to visit South Carolina on Monday.

Kaine Endorses Obama For '08 (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

RICHMOND -- Standing within eyeshot of the former Confederate capitol, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday endorsed Sen. Barack Obama for president.

"I am very happy to say it is a very simple decision for me in terms of what I think is important in my assessment of where the nation is to endorse Sen. Barack Obama as our nation's next president," Mr. Kaine said, standing outside the governor's mansion in Capitol Square.

Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, was joined by his wife, Michelle. He said he was "honored" to have Mr. Kaine's early public support.

"For Tim Kaine to step forward as the first governor outside of my home state of Illinois to endorse my candidacy is an extraordinary honor," he said. "I am absolutely determined that the confidence he has placed in me will be reflected in the hard work over the next several months ... to win the presidency."

Mr. Kaine, a Democrat, said his early endorsement was a sign of his enthusiasm for Mr. Obama. His endorsement of the first-term senator made Mr. Kaine the first governor to publicly endorse any presidential candidate.

Mr. Obama yesterday said it was "humbling" to stand in the heart of the Confederacy and receive the backing of the Virginia governor.

"Here we are in what was the heart of the Confederacy, and for me to be able to stand here as an African-American reflects the enormous progress that this country has made, and I think to some degree represents not the perfection of the union, but a whole lot of progress in perfecting this union," he said.

He said that he was "standing on the shoulders" on many black leaders who have paved the way for him.

"It is worth noting that the trajectory of America is to include more people and bring more people together," he said. "We have stumbled at times. It's been a rocky path and we still have a long way to go, but part of my campaign I hope is to remind people of the capacity for this nation to change and that has always been one of our strengths."

Mr. Kaine, standing next to his wife, Anne, said the two men shared similar life experiences.

Both graduated from Harvard Law School, married lawyers and practiced civil rights law before entering politics.

"The thing that cemented our relationship early on is when we found out that our [mothers] grew up in the very tiny town of El Dorado, Kansas, and there are just so few people that can claim that," Mr. Kaine said.

Mr. Obama was in Richmond last night to headline the Jefferson-Jackson dinner, the Virginia Democratic Party's annual fundraising event, which each year showcases key national Democratic figures and this year drew 4,000 people.

Mr. Obama, the son of a Kenyan immigrant, campaigned in Virginia last fall for Sen. James H. Webb Jr. and received a rock-star ovation alongside Mr. Webb and former Gov. Mark Warner at a rally in Richmond.

He also appeared at a fundraiser for Mr. Kaine in July 2005 and donated $10,000 to Mr. Kaine's gubernatorial bid.

Redefining "Black" (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0133494

By Louis Chude-Sokei

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

ALTHOUGH NOT quite able to pass for white, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has been able to pass for African American. He is biracial, but not white; black, but not African American; American but not African. What has entranced the country more than his somewhat vague policies is Obama's challenge to conventional racial and cultural categories.

Among African Americans, discussions about his racial identity typically vacillate between the ideologically charged options of "black" versus "not black enough" or between "black" and "black, but not like us."

But there is a third side to Obama — and also to the politics of racial passing in America.

The population of African immigrants in the United States is rapidly growing. Since 1990, about 50,000 Africans have come to the United States annually, more than in any of the peak years of the international slave trade, which was abolished in 1807. They add to the steady influx of black immigrants from other continents and the Caribbean, and those who have been in the United States for generations but who don't racially and culturally define themselves as African American.

These blacks feel cramped by the narrowness of American racial politics, in which "blackness" has not just defined one's skin color but has served as a code word for African American. To be heard and to be counted, these black immigrants must often pass as African American, sometimes against their will.

Obama is not the first prominent black to defy conventional American racial and cultural categories. People identified former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's Jamaican ancestry as the quality that made his blackness different. When in the mid-1990s it seemed possible that he would run for president, the pride of the Caribbean immigrant community was nearly palpable. He emboldened Caribbean immigrants to resist African American pressures to erase their own cultural and historical distinctiveness.

In such distinctions between black immigrants and African Americans lay buried a history of competitive intra-racial tensions and cultural differences that have never been resolved.

In addition to black immigrants' need to hold onto their own identities, many whites have historically tended to regard black immigrants as a model minority within a troublesome native-born black population. A good proportion of immigrants tend to be better educated than African Americans, don't have the "chip" of racial resentment on their shoulder and exhibit the classic immigrant optimism about assimilation into the mainstream culture. Many whites, however, exploit these differences to magnify the problems of African Americans while avoiding charges of racism. And because these differences often result in greater employment and more educational opportunities for immigrants and their descendants, they also feed tensions between native and immigrant blacks.

The complex history of black immigrant and African American interaction and distinction has been masked by a tendency in American politics to treat "black" and African American as interchangeable categories. It is further masked by an African American cultural politics that arrogates to itself the official word on racial matters. For black immigrants, African American culture can be as alien and as hostile as mainstream America.

Because Powell didn't run for president, the intra-racial differences and historical tensions between immigrant and native-born blacks that his candidacy might have brought to national attention remain largely unknown. "Black" effectively continued to mean African American.

But, from a black immigrant perspective, Obama's run for the presidency carries the promise of spotlighting this "category crisis" at long last. There is the possibility of a conversation in which Africans in the U.S., along with other black immigrant groups, may emerge distinctly from the all-consuming category of "black."

These issues have been present in scholarship and education for some time. Tensions between native and foreign-born blacks are rising in higher education because universities are reputedly using black immigrants, at the expense of the native-born, to diversify their student bodies. In this case, black immigrants are the primary beneficiaries of the blanket category of "black."

Add to this a shifting academic terrain in which traditional black studies are threatened by increasingly popular courses and programs that have a diaspora or Africana slant and do not put African American history or experiences center stage. It's now not uncommon to hear African American scholars and students complaining about the increasing presence of Caribbean and African blacks in black studies departments. Indeed, these kinds of tensions erupted at UC Berkeley two years ago and reflect the continuing struggle over the redefining of "black" in American life and thought.

As the numbers of black immigrants and their progeny grow to challenge the numerical supremacy of the native black minority, can a challenge to African Americans' cultural dominance, racial assumptions and politics be far behind? Especially because black immigrants generally and increasingly differ from native-born African Americans in their views on race, racism and political affiliations. They also are less responsive to American racial traumas, which helps explain why some civil rights leaders are unsure of Obama's loyalties to African American causes. Because his political "blackness" is independent of their sanction and emerges from outside their histories, it threatens their cultural and political authority.

So Obama does not transcend race, as some might dream. Instead, he represents a set of tensions that go beyond black and white. On one hand, there is America's complex and still unresolved relationship with African Americans and, on the other, an emergent black immigrant presence that is less willing to politically or socially pass for "black" and that has unresolved and unspoken issues of its own.

In Obama, we witness how one set of tensions works with and against the other. Immigrant status is deployed not against race but against the messy and unresolved tensions of domestic American racial relationships. And in this, whether he wins or loses, Obama is definitely a sign of the country's future.

Presidential Hopeful Edwards Discusses Health Plan In Las Vegas (AP)

By Ryan Nakashima

AP, February 17, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards took his plan for universal health care to union-strong Las Vegas on Saturday, visiting the local branch of the electrical workers labor group to which his brother belongs.

The stop was the ninth the former North Carolina senator has made to the Silver State since he lost as Democrat John Kerry's running mate in 2004, including five times last year before swinging by again in December to announce he was running for president.

Although no seeker of the Democratic nomination has strong roots in Nevada, Edwards told about 300 people at the local office of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers that his brother Blake, a journeyman electrician, benefited from their help.

"Thank you to IBEW and thank you for what the union has done for my brother and his family," Edwards said.

The Edwards campaign is hoping his ties to the labor movement will help him gain support in the state, which has taken on new importance in the Democratic nomination calendar having recently won the No. 2 spot between Iowa and New Hampshire.

"His support in Nevada is strong," said Edwards' spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield. "He has enjoyed an enormous amount of support every time he's visited."

Edwards's health care plan, which he unveiled two weeks ago, requires employers to cover their workers or pay into a fund to help them. It also mandates that health care providers decrease administrative costs, switch to using electronic records and would create a market for individuals and small businesses to shop for coverage providers.

"It creates market power for people who don't have it, competition that doesn't presently exist," Edwards said.

Judy Woolston, a 65-year-old housewife, said her daughter-in-law's uninsured mother required emergency $80,000 surgery last year for lung cancer. After her daughter-in-law and husband paid out of pocket for more than three months of care, luckily, the family found a medical grant which paid the rest.

"It was a wake up call to all of us. We do like Edwards and we like what he said" but it was too early to decide on a candidate, Woolston said.

The stop was one among many in Nevada by presidential hopefuls as the race for the Democratic nod heated up less than a year before the Jan. 19 presidential caucus in Nevada.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois is to visit Las Vegas on Sunday, while on Wednesday, seven other announced or expected Democratic candidates, including front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, are to participate in the first candidates forum of the 2008 campaign in Carson City.

Rick DeVoe, a Las Vegas insulation installer who volunteers for a local branch of Edwards' "One Corps" movement of community service, said Edwards' health care stance is one of the reasons he supports the candidate.

Clinton failed in her health care reforms as former President Bill Clinton's first lady, he said. "They didn't get it done," DeVoe said. "Instead of taking a firm stand on what they think is right, it got so watered down and complicated that it wound up completely falling apart."

Richardson, Clinton Continue Working The State (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 18, 2007

CONCORD – On his second day in office, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday he would shut down Guantanamo Bay detention camp for suspected terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0133496

"The first day I would get us out of Iraq," the New Mexico governor said, adding he would also close Abu Grab prison where Iraqi prisoners were tortured. Richardson told about 65 people at the Concord City Democrats' 3rd Annual Washington Birthday Social that Abu Grab is "one of the reasons this country has so many problems in the Muslim world."

The receptive Concord crowd was one of three that turned out yesterday to hear from Presidential candidates -- or in one case a spouse -- a year before Granite Staters caste their votes. In Dover, Hillary Clinton vowed to end the Iraqi War, while in Nashua, Cindy McCain, wife of Arizona Sen. John McCain, said her husband would make the best President.

In Concord at the IBEW hall, Richardson joked about his low profile compared to other Democratic hopefuls, but seriously called for all Democratic candidates to pledge not to attack each other.

He touted his experience both in foreign policy and at home as governor. Speaking of the current administration's foreign policy problems, Richardson said "We can't afford to have a President without foreign policy training."

Asked about the security fence Congress approved for the border between the United States and Mexico, Richardson said there is a problem with border infiltration that should be dealt with through the use of technology and additional border patrol agents, which the federal government is not now willing to pay for.

As governor, he said, he has dealt with the issue. "I did it, that's my point. I did it. I deal with these problems every day," Richardson said.

Eileen Keim of Concord said she was an Eisenhower Republican who worries that money going to the military shortchanges children. Richardson said there is a need to rebuild the military, but stressed greater efficiencies and eliminating out-dated systems.

"The military contracting system is totally out of control. Why is it Haliburton gets all the contracts?" he asked about the company Vice President Cheney headed before running for the nation's second highest office.

After Richardson's speech, Keim said she was satisfied with his answer, but has not yet ready to support him. "He's a very capable man, I wish him well," she said.

Tom St. Martin of Candia was encouraged by Richardson. "He's the first candidate I've seen that I want to support," he said, noting he saw both New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama last week.

In Dover, where her husband, then Presidential candidate Bill Clinton, promised supporters in 1992 "If you stick with me, I'll stick with you until the last dog dies," Hillary Clinton refused to apologize for her Senate vote authorizing the Iraqi War, but repeated her response that had she known then what she knows now, she would never have voted to authorize the war.

"I take responsibility for my vote," she said. "It was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances we had at the time."

Clinton spoke to about 500 at Dover High School yesterday morning before flying back to Washington to vote on the Senate resolution repudiating President Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq. The Portsmouth house party scheduled for yesterday afternoon was cancelled due to the vote.

At the Dover event, Clinton said the focus now should be on ending the War in Iraq. "If (Bush) does not end this war before he leaves office, when I am President, I will," she said.

She touted her proposed legislation to limit the number troops in Iraq as the best way to end the war. The small Democratic majorities in both the House and Senate make any major step, like ending funding for the war, impossible, Clinton told the crowd.

She criticized Bush for shutting out hostile nations, particularly recent negative overtures about Iran. "It would be a historic mistake if the President took action against Iran," Clinton said.

The former First Lady said she does not favor gay marriage, but added "It is clear to me that we should stand for equality and against discrimination." That part of her speech received only scattered applause, unlike her statements supporting education, affordable health care and lifting Americans out of poverty, which were better received.

In Nashua, Cindy McCain returned to the Crowne Plaza Hotel, where she and her husband stayed the night they won the 2000 Presidential primary, for an event hosted by the Nashua Republican City Committee and the Nashua Area Federated Republican Woman.

"I'm happy to be back. My husband is in Iowa doing three Town Hall meetings. I think I got the better deal," McCain said.

She asked voters to take another look at her husband, saying he is still a straight talker, although some may not always like what he says. "My husband is not only the best candidate, but will make the best President for many, many reasons," McCain said.

McCain also answered questions about immigration, trade relations, health care costs and pork-barrel spending.

Today the Presidential parade continues as Democratic candidate and Ohio Congressman Dennis Kucinich makes appearances in Barrington, Hanover, Concord and Laconia.

Dodd: "Give Me A Chance" (TSSC)

By Lisa Michals

DOJ_NMG_0133497

The State, February 18, 2007

U.S. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., got a warm response Saturday morning from S.C. Democrats when he brought up the issues of predatory lending, the war in Iraq and public vs. private education.

"People are expressing that sense of urgency about what we need to do at home and abroad," Dodd said during a Columbia stop in his 2008 presidential campaign. "I wanted to get out and be part of this debate."

Dodd, chairman of the Senate's committee on banking, housing and urban affairs, spoke about the importance of curtailing predatory lending. He touted his commitment to helping public schools improve, rather than paving the way for more students to attend private schools.

"We aren't going to solve the problem of public education by financing two systems," Dodd said.

He also favors getting U.S. troops out of Iraq — a position that is among the qualities Paulette Gujer of Conway said are important to her.

"For me, it's Iraq, Iraq, Iraq," said Gujer, who attended the Dodd breakfast at Mac's on Main with her sister, Opal Brown, of Columbia after seeing presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., Friday night.

Dodd's rousing speech — as local Democrats drank coffee and dined on grits, eggs and bacon — often circled back to his 30 years of experience as a lawmaker. "We've done six years of on-the-job training" with President Bush, Dodd said.

Dodd's South Carolina trip was abbreviated by a rare Saturday vote in the Senate. More than 65 people attended the Dodd event, which doubled as the Richland County Democratic Party's monthly breakfast meeting.

The audience included former Gov. Jim Hodges, Richland County Councilman Paul Livingston and Richland 1 school board member Dwayne Smiling.

Carly Ingram, 16, will turn 18 in time to vote in the 2008 presidential election, and she's already throwing her heart into becoming an educated voter. The Blythewood High School student volunteered to work in Dodd's campaign.

"He's a family guy," Ingram said. "He really understands that the kids who are in high school now are the future."

Dodd acknowledged that his potential path to the presidency could be a long one, given the strong competition for the Democratic Party nomination.

"I want you to give me a chance," Dodd said. "I'm not as well known as some of the other candidates."

But, he said, he has more than a year to make his impact felt.

Political Markets In Action (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Two Democratic presidential candidates with national campaign experience are stumbling. A Republican candidate who has run only municipal campaigns is confounding expectations, calling into question some assumptions about Republican voters.

John Edwards has learned -- surely he did not know it when they were hired -- that two women employed by his campaign have Internet trails of vitriolic anti-Christian, and especially anti-Catholic, rants. One of them wrote a profane screed about God impregnating Mary and said the Catholic Church opposes the morning-after birth control pill in order to "force women to bear more tithing Catholics." The other woman, who sprinkles her commentary with a vulgar term for female genitalia, referred to George W. Bush's "wingnut Christofascist base."

When the women's works became known, it was reported that they had been, or were going to be, fired. Thirty-six hours later, after left-wing bloggers rallied to their defense, Edwards's campaign said they would be retained. Edwards explained that the women had assured him that "it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

He really does? The two women -- both of whom have resigned, pronouncing themselves, of course, victims of intolerance -- are what they are and are unimportant. But a prospective president being so pliable under pressure and so capable of smarmy insincerity -- what does he think were the women's intentions? -- is very important.

In New Hampshire recently, Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Now that we have a Democratic president . . ." Quickly correcting this slip, she said she meant "a Democratic Congress," but added: "If we had a Democratic president, we would end the war."

Well. She and others say they can "end the war." That phrase is a flinch from facts. They mean they can end U.S. involvement in the war. No one believes the United States has the power to prevent the war from raging on.

But if a Democratic president would implement withdrawal, the Democratic Congress could, by forbidding further spending to sustain forces in Iraq. So why is Clinton, who says that a Democratic president would properly withdraw U.S. forces, not voting for a policy she considers proper?

Congress has used denial of funds to express itself on, and influence, conflicts in Vietnam (1973) and Nicaragua (1982 and 1984). Also, on Nov. 2, 1983, two weeks after the bombing that killed 241 Americans in the Marine barracks at the Beirut airport, the House of Representatives voted on a measure to force the withdrawal of the Marines by March 1984 by cutting off funds for the Lebanon operation. The measure was defeated by a vote of 274 to 153, but the 153 included 18 Democrats who are still in the House, nine of whom are committee chairmen.

A question for the 18: If they believed defunding the Beirut operation was proper, why is it not proper to defund U.S. involvement in Iraq? One answer insistently suggests itself: They think that withdrawal would be too risky. Does Clinton agree?

Regarding the Republican race, for many months commentators have said that when the Republican base learns the facts about Rudy Giuliani's personal life (an annulled first marriage, a messy divorce, then a third marriage) and views on social issues (for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, in each case with limits), support for him will evaporate. But such commentary is becoming self-refuting. The insistent reiteration of it during Giuliani's coast-to-coast campaigning is telling activist Republicans -- the sort of people who read political commentary -- the facts about Giuliani. And so far those facts are not causing a recoil from him: According to the USA Today-Gallup poll, his lead over John McCain has grown from 31 percent to 27 percent in November to 40-24 today.

This does not mean that the social issues have lost their salience. People for whom opposition to abortion is very important might, however, think that in wartime it is not supremely important. Or they might reason, correctly, that presidents can change abortion policy only by changing the Supreme Court, so Giuliani's pledge to nominate justices like Antonin Scalia, Samuel Alito and John Roberts is sufficient.

Furthermore, California's primary is being moved up to Feb. 5, and New Jersey's and some other states' might be moved to that date, so Giuliani's views on social issues might become, on balance, advantages. And suppose Giuliani convinces Republicans that he can become the first Republican since George H.W. Bush in 1988 to be competitive for California's (now 55) electoral votes.

Markets are mechanisms that generate information. The political market is working: Americans are learning much about the candidates, and themselves.

Early Primary -- Too Much Too Soon? (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 18, 2007

Tom Vilsack, a Democratic candidate for president, doesn't want to deliver bad news to Californians, but he said it's time for a reality check: A February 2008 presidential primary here would not substitute for the lunch counters in Iowa, the house parties in New Hampshire and the barbecues in South Carolina where presidential nominations are really decided.

"Retail politicking is essential in this process," said Vilsack, the first declared Democratic presidential candidate and former governor of Iowa. In his state, he joked, locals are so impassioned about the state's early caucuses that "you can't tell the reporters from the voters" at packed campaign events because of all the notebooks.

The intensive and personal vetting of candidates that has developed for generations in states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, Vilsack said, is one reason why mega-media states such as California, New Jersey and Illinois may not get the clout they hope for by moving up in the presidential primary schedule.

"If the goal is to lessen the impact of those early states," Vilsack said, "I don't think you're going to succeed."

Nevertheless, the state Senate handily passed legislation last week to move California's presidential primary from June 2008 to Feb. 5, 2008. The measure is expected to land soon on the desk of Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has been joined by Democratic leaders in showering praise on the measure because of the windfall in political clout -- in theory -- it would bring to the state.

But Phil Trounstine, who heads the San Jose State University Survey and Policy Research Institute, said an early California primary could deliver some unintended consequences to the 2008 presidential race.

"It may actually increase the importance of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada," said Trounstine of the four primaries and caucuses scheduled in January 2008 before California's primary, "because the person who has momentum coming out of those races will have a huge advantage coming into Super Duper Tuesday."

So "you give enormous advantage for the people who have huge amounts of money available to organize" in media-saturated states such as California, he said.

That's an exclusive crowd, he noted: on the Democratic side, front-runners New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. And on the GOP side, it's Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Right now, the presidential nominating schedule will start with Iowa, which holds the first caucuses on Jan. 14, followed in short order by Nevada's Democratic caucuses, the traditional first presidential primary in New Hampshire and South Carolina's primary. Already, those states have become a battleground among almost two-dozen candidates vying for attention -- a year before the first votes are cast.

It looks as if those contests will be followed by what pundits have labeled "Super Duper Tuesday" -- Feb. 5. Along with California, other states that have scheduled or are considering primaries and caucuses for that first Tuesday in February are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, New York, New Mexico, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota and Utah.

In addition to California, delegate-rich states such as New Jersey, New York and Illinois traditionally have fallen much later on the primary calendar, giving hope to challengers that there was time to overtake the front-runner for the nomination.

If the new super-sized primary goes through, Americans are looking at "the longest, day-in-and-day-out general election campaign in American history," in which "the party nominees might be determined in the blink of an eye, with no chance for buyer's remorse," according to Larry Sabato, a political science professor at the University of Virginia considered among the nation's top political analysts.

Sabato, in his "Crystal Ball" column last week, argued that the increasing drive by a whopping 30 states to squeeze their presidential primaries into January or February 2008 is nothing short of "courting disaster" by creating an oversized, speeded-up contest.

"If the job of scheduling the presidential nominating contests were assigned to an insane asylum, this is pretty much what the patients would come up with," he wrote.

Insanity or not, the speculation already has candidates swarming into California -- just in case.

As Giuliani recently ran from Sacramento to Silicon Valley to the Central Valley, he repeatedly endorsed an early California primary, saying it would put the presidential race more quickly onto a diverse, vibrant stage that represents America as a whole.

"It would be a very good thing if the California primary were moved up, because you are ... a microcosm of the United States," Giuliani said. "You're bigger than most countries; you do kind of represent a sort of cross section of America. You're Democrat, Republican, liberal, conservative, you're all different races, religions."

Presidential candidates, sooner or later, he said, are "all going to have to contest in a place that is kind of similar to what we're eventually going to have to do -- which is to run in the entire country," he said.

Rick Jacobs of the Courage Campaign agreed. His progressive nonprofit organization has pushed for an early state primary because, he argued, it would give California voters the kind of attention they deserve -- and could provide a boost to candidates who can't capture the attention in Iowa and New Hampshire.

But Trounstine said a "slingshot effect" is more likely.

"The danger with all these states moving forward is that the process itself may wind up limiting the field -- and an insurgent candidate who needs time to develop and grow may get squashed like a bug," Trounstine said.

He cited presidential candidates such as Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, as those who could be hurt by the front-loaded primary schedule.

Allan Hoffenblum, publisher of the California Target Book, a nonpartisan look at state election races, warns that all this talk about California's clout in the presidential nominating season masks the real issue at hand.

"It has everything to do with term limits -- and nothing to do with presidential politics," he said.

Legislators want the early primary so they can get voters to cast ballots for an initiative to extend legislative term limits -- just in time for the lawmaker to sign up to run for another term before the June state primary election for their offices.

As for the effect of an early California presidential primary, Hoffenblum pointed toward a previous time when the state moved its presidential primary to March with little noticeable effect on the outcome.

"No one really knows for sure what kind of clout California would have under Feb. 5 primary -- any more than they accurately assessed it the three times they had it in March."

While "it's fun to sit around and say what will happen (with an early primary), we have no historic data to fall back upon," Hoffenblum said.

No matter your opinion about the early primary, he added, "we're going to have one -- whether we like it or not."

Q&A: The Spat Over Presidential Primaries (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Every four years, Americans pick a president. And every election cycle, political insiders fight about the presidential nominating process.

For decades, Iowa and New Hampshire have cast the first votes, giving their residents enormous influence — and greatly annoying people in much bigger places, including California.

DOJ_NMG_0133500

This time, politicians in California, Florida, Illinois, New Jersey and Texas are taking action to push their primaries up to Feb. 5 to try to boost their clout. The heavy front-loading means the nominating fight could be over by Valentine's Day, giving the nation a nine-month general-election campaign.

How do the two main parties determine their presidential nominating calendars?

Last summer, Democrats set aside January for caucuses and primaries in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina. The rest of the states are supposed to wait to hold their contests between Feb. 5 and June 10, 2008. The GOP voted at its 2004 convention to give states a window between Feb. 5 and July 28 to hold their events.

Where do the 2008 calendars stand today?

For Democrats, the voting is supposed to start on Jan. 14, with the Iowa caucuses, followed by caucuses in Nevada on Jan. 19, the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22 and the South Carolina primary Jan. 29.

But New Hampshire officials are unhappy about Nevada's placement just three days ahead of their state's primary. The state is determined to preserve a week's distance between its vote and other contests to avoid diluting its impact, which means New Hampshire is likely to ignore the preference of the national party and schedule its primary earlier. That would probably lead Iowa to push at least a week ahead.

The Republican calendar is in flux, but the GOP contests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina are likely to fall on the same day the Democrats vote.

What happens if states disobey the rules established by the national parties?

Probably nothing. They could face sanctions, reducing the number of their delegates to the national nominating conventions or, in the case of Democrats, denying officials such as the governor and members of Congress their delegate status. But in reality, neither party seems likely to run the risk of alienating voters, much less the elected officials they would need to carry big states such as California and Florida in the fall.

Why do Iowa and New Hampshire always go first?

Tradition. New Hampshire has been first in the nation since 1920. For decades, few cared. Then a 1949 law passed, allowing citizens to vote directly for candidates, instead of delegates to the national nominating conventions. In 1952, all eyes turned to New Hampshire for an early gauge of voter sentiments. A political institution was born.

The Iowa caucuses took off 20 years later, when then-Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota used a strong showing to push past better-known rivals and win the Democratic nomination. Four years later, another Democratic dark horse, former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, won Iowa and, ultimately, the White House.

Given that history, few presidential candidates want to alienate voters in Iowa or New Hampshire by criticizing their privileged status.

What's the difference between a primary and a caucus?

In a primary, the polls are open throughout the day, and people can show up whenever they wish, step into a private voting booth, cast a ballot and be done.

A caucus is more akin to a town hall meeting. It starts at a set time and can last for hours. Participants must publicly state whom they support. Others might argue with them, or try to change their minds. If a candidate fails to achieve a certain threshold of support, he or she is eliminated from consideration, and backers must choose another candidate or go home.

Why does it matter which states go first?

The candidates invest enormous amounts of time, money and energy in the early states, hoping victory or a strong showing will provide momentum heading into the rapid-fire series of contests that follow.

With all that focus, home-state issues, such as ethanol in Iowa, receive enormous attention, as do home-state politicians, who have come to expect the intense courtship.

What's the difference between campaigning in places like Iowa and New Hampshire as opposed to larger states?

Iowa and New Hampshire have relatively small populations. The voters there demand a highly personal style of campaigning that is impossible to replicate in a state the size of California, where expensive TV ads are the only effective means of communication.

It is routine for presidential candidates to submit to hourlong grillings by voters who won't tolerate pretense or evasions.

If anything, they find sport in humbling the mighty, which presidents and vice presidents have learned the hard way.

"Voters want to see you; they want to hold you up to the light, tip you upside down. They want to get a very good, hard look before they make a decision," said New Hampshire Republican activist Fred Bramante.

How would it affect the race if states like California move forward?

Candidates would have to scramble to raise more money and cover extensive ground in what may effectively shape up as a national primary on Feb. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0133501

Ironically, by moving ahead on the calendar and creating such a compacted schedule, bigger states could invest Iowa and New Hampshire with even greater import because candidates who stumble there would have little time to recover.

Are there any advantages or disadvantages to the parties' settling quickly on their nominees?

The advantage is the nominees would have plenty of time to bind any wounds suffered in the primary season.

The disadvantage is that voters, unaccustomed to an accelerated contest, may have barely paid attention by the time the nominees are selected.

Also, candidates would have to step up their fundraising to keep their campaigns afloat from the early end of the primary season until the vote on Nov. 4, 2008.

What's the most important thing to remember in all this?

No one really knows what will happen, even after the dates are set. The one inviolable rule of politics is the law of unintended consequences. Something surprising will happen in the 2008 campaign, guaranteed.

Nev., Candidates Taking Bold New Step With Forum (NHUL)

By Dan Tuohy

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 18, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. – Democrats running for President will be on unfamiliar political ground when they arrive here Wednesday for their first joint forum of the 2008 campaign.

For the first time, the state that popularized quickie marriages, built a global reputation for its casinos and gave free range to places like the Bunny Ranch plans a caucus between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire's leadoff Presidential primary.

Critics complain about calendar frontloading, but Nevada is making no apologies. People are proud, though some are still trying to make sense of it all, said Guy Louis Rocha, Nevada's state archivist and a member of the forum's sponsor, the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

"They're starting to see that Nevada is a player," Rocha said outside the silver-colored dome of the Nevada State House. "All roads now head through Nevada. The fact is, Nevada's always been a backwater."

Nevada Democrats are marketing their state as "second in the nation" to cast votes with their Jan. 19 caucus. New Hampshire has traditionally bristled at any perceived loss of clout, but Nevadans have a different take, said Clark Dumont, a long-time Granite State public relations executive and broadcast journalist who is now vice president of communications and public affairs for the Nevada Cancer Institute.

'New Hampshire should stop whining.' That's what I hear," he said.

Dumont said Democrats in the Silver State -- led by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid -- executed a brilliant move in scheduling an early caucus to focus Presidential debate on Western issues such as immigration, water resources and land management.

"Just as New Hampshire has seen it, it is a way to spotlight some of the issues important to the state," he said.

Though the DNC says the Granite State's primary will be Jan. 22, New Hampshire Secretary of State William Gardner will not set the date until late this year. State law requires the primary to be a week or more before a "similar election."

Is the Nevada caucus a similar election? State Rep. Jim Splaine, a Democrat from Portsmouth, does not think so. However, he has sponsored a bill to give the secretary of state the authority to interpret the term "similar election" as he sees fit. New Hampshire has held the first Presidential primary since 1920, and the first by state law since 1976. Splaine sponsored that law.

Obama's not at forum

Dumont, speaking from his office in Las Vegas, said it is difficult to compare the Nevada caucus to New Hampshire's role as a proving ground for Presidents and a place where all candidates can participate regardless of how much money they have. "New Hampshire has nothing to worry about," he said. "It's a caucus, not a primary."

The DNC and Nevada's Democratic Party sought the early caucus as a way to address regional issues and embrace diversity and union members. About a quarter of the state's population is Hispanic or Latino.

"You're talking about a very diverse electorate," said Jamal Simmons, president of New Future Communications, a firm the Nevada Democratic Party hired to help organize and prepare for the caucus.

Simmons, who worked in New Hampshire for Sen. Bob Graham and Gen. Wesley Clark during the 2004 election cycle, said the activist-organized nature of a caucus would make Nevada distinctly different from New Hampshire with its tradition of grassroots, retail politics. He said it would complement the leadoff primary.

"We really see this as a Western caucus," Simmons said. "People are really taking ownership of it."

Rocha said the New Hampshire primary is secure, but he expects the Nevada caucus to divert some attention. "For a little while the whole nation will be watching, and probably curious because we're the new kid on the block," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0133502

Long a Republican stronghold, Nevada is increasingly a swing state. While Nevada Democrats hope the caucus gives them an edge, that remains to be seen in a state where population estimates -- 2.5 million people last year -- are readjusted on a monthly basis. It is one of the fastest growing states in the country, and the running joke is that everybody here is from someplace else.

"It's tough reading the tea leaves here because the tea leaves are constantly changing," said Rocha, who did grow up in Las Vegas.

In New Hampshire, candidates see bucolic towns. In Carson City this week, candidates will see dazzling casinos and ads for legal brothels, both of which are just down the road from the Presidential forum's venue.

But the states share some common ground. Dumont, who still has a house in New Hampshire, said he noticed the independent streak when he arrived in 2005 after serving as regional communications director for Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield based in Manchester. He found it oddly reminiscent of New Hampshire.

Rocha said most Nevadans, especially those in the northern part of the state, would be proud to have "Live Free Or Die" on their license plate. "If a Granite Stater met a Nevadan in a bar they would get along fine," he said. "They'd be buying each other drinks before long."

Wisconsin Primary Could Be A Spoiler (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 18, 2007

Washington - In exactly one year and one day, Wisconsin will hold its presidential primary.

Whether it turns out to be a big deal or an empty, anticlimactic ritual is anybody's guess.

But at this point either outcome seems plausible.

With several huge states poised to move up their own contests to early February, the fate of Wisconsin's Feb. 19 primary is threatened by the prospect of a massively "front-loaded" nominating calendar, a schedule that critics fear will further abbreviate the process of selecting the parties' standard-bearers.

In short, both nominations could be effectively wrapped up after only a few weeks of voting - and before the campaign even gets to Wisconsin.

"A year from today, there is a nominee. It's over. This is the fastest calendar we've ever had," former Democratic National Chairman Terry McAuliffe said the other day on National Public Radio.

But that's not the only possible scenario.

In the most wide-open presidential election in decades, with two or three politically robust, big-name contenders in each party backed up by a bevy of respectable long shots, a quick outcome is not guaranteed.

There is a minority view among insiders that envisions a slugfest rather than a first or second-round knockout.

"It's more likely to take more time than any race in modern memory to sort out the nominee, which may very well make Wisconsin relevant," said Paul Ryan, the GOP congressman from Janesville.

If the race doesn't peter out before Wisconsin, then a very different dynamic could come into play, one that might give the state a more meaningful role than it has had in many years. How it might matter

Under this scenario, Wisconsin once again has its mid-February date all to itself (as it did in 2004), meaning that for six or seven days it becomes the exclusive venue of the 2008 campaign. All the remaining candidates and the national political media descend on the state, whose primary is now strategically sandwiched between two multistate "Super Tuesdays," one on Feb. 5 and one on March 4. Wisconsin becomes a natural place for non-front-runners to make their stand, because it's inexpensive (candidates have to advertise in only one midsize state with five TV markets), "open" (any voter can vote in either party's primary), and has a reputation for giving underdogs and insurgents a shot.

"If one of the candidates just sweeps through California, Florida (both possible Feb. 5 states), then it's all over by then," said Gov. Jim Doyle, a Democrat. "But if you get a few split decisions, then Wisconsin could end up in the center of it."

One reason the outlook is murky, aside from the unpredictability of both races a year out, is that the calendar isn't set yet. Iowa and New Hampshire will kick off the GOP race in January 2008 (or possibly December 2007, if New Hampshire moves up its own primary). On the Democratic side, Nevada and South Carolina will join those two states in the critical opening phase, a change the party is making for the sake of political and ethnic diversity. Undetermined dates

But the next wave of primaries is unsettled.

California, New Jersey, Florida, Illinois and others are thinking of moving their primaries up to Feb. 5 to get a piece of the presidential action. They would be joining an already crowded group of states slated to vote that day, creating the biggest, earliest "Super Tuesday" in history.

DOJ_NMG_0133503

That would have two potential effects. One is to accelerate the awarding of delegates needed to win the nomination. The other is to abruptly nationalize the nominating fight, forcing candidates to simultaneously compete in a giant cluster of expensive states, overwhelming contestants who have neither huge treasuries nor early momentum from victories in the smaller January states.

"That just shortcuts the debate and the process for really getting to know the candidates," said Linda Honold, the former Wisconsin Democratic chair, who in 2005 served on a national Democratic panel that studied the calendar.

But the calendar alone won't determine how long the race lasts. That also depends on the dynamics of the field, the performance of the candidates and whether the early states produce a series of split decisions or a juggernaut, as happened in 2004 with Democrat John Kerry.

"If one candidate has won both Iowa and New Hampshire, forget it," says Harold Ickes, a veteran of Democratic politics and a Hillary Clinton supporter.

But in both parties, there is a perceived "big three" of co-favorites: Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards on the Democratic side; John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney on the Republican side. If they turn out to have different strengths in different states and have the money to survive a few setbacks, that could prolong the competition.

Guiliani, for example, would appear to benefit if states such as New Jersey and California move up to Feb. 5, possibly making up for what might be weaker showings in Iowa or the South, where his liberal stands on social issues might hurt him.

"On the Republican side, because you have candidates with different strengths, it's going to be interesting to see," says GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio, who believes the front-loaded calendar doesn't automatically make the race shorter.

Wisconsin's party leaders are hopeful things work out that way.

"It's hard for me to imagine that in a field that appears to be as wide open as this one, both parties are going to have their nominations locked up by (Feb. 19)," said Mark Jefferson, executive director of the state GOP.

"Unless this becomes a Hillary juggernaut, I don't see this thing being over that fast," said state Democratic Chairman Joe Wineke.

Political scientist Larry Jacobs of the University of Minnesota said that while "the conventional wisdom right now is it will probably be over by early February," he is not entirely convinced, given the potential for leading contenders to draw from different support groups and prosper in different places.

"If there are two that do reasonably well that Super Tuesday," he said, "it may not be such a clear verdict."

Former Gov. Tommy Thompson would figure to play a large role in a GOP primary in Wisconsin, but to get that far he would have to beat the odds and achieve major breakthroughs in the preceding states.

While Wisconsin's primary was somewhat anticlimactic in 2004, that election suggested the kind of the role the state could play under different circumstances. John Kerry was the all-but-inevitable nominee by the time he got to Wisconsin in advance of its Feb. 17 primary. The first polls in the state showed Kerry with a 30-point lead. But because the candidates ended up focused on just one state for nearly a week (that hadn't happened since the New Hampshire primary) there was space and time for a small campaign to unfold. Edwards surged from behind and almost caught Kerry, losing the primary 40% to 34%. A more personal forum

At a Harvard symposium after the campaign, Edwards campaign manager Nick Baldick explained what it meant for Kerry's rivals to compete in a stand-alone primary, where the outcome wasn't reduced to simply TV spending and momentum, but where the candidates' messages and campaign skills came back into play.

"The difference between a one-week, one-primary race in Wisconsin, and a one-week, five-state primary (on) February 3 was immense for us, because we could plop John Edwards into a state and he was great," said Baldick.

Whether the 2008 Wisconsin primary will be more or less significant than it was in 2004 remains to be seen.

Matthew Dowd, who was a top Bush strategist in '04, said Friday that he views a quasi-national primary in early February as one of at least two fundamental changes in the nominating process this time around.

The other is the early intensity of the pre-election-year campaign, as candidates jockey for money, the support of local activists, the passions of the rank-and-file, and sustained media attention. Dowd believes that struggle will begin winnowing the field even before the actual voting starts in December or January.

The early caucuses and primaries, said Dowd, are "now the end of the process, rather than the beginning of the process."

Mayors Urge 2008 Hopefuls To Address Urban Issues (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

The nation's mayors say they will press the 2008 Democratic presidential hopefuls to address the needs of cities by crafting urban agendas early in their campaigns, but some candidates could already have an edge based on their records.

DOJ_NMG_0133504

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has the strongest record working with urban black mayors -- both as a senator and as first lady when her husband, Bill, was president, said Douglas H. Palmer, mayor of Trenton, N.J.

"Hillary Clinton was pushing a domestic agenda and for the bulk of homeland security money to go to cities ... after September 11," said Mr. Palmer, president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

"The candidate who forges a relationship and partnership with the nation's mayors will be the one who sees a rise in their numbers," he said, adding that he is undecided about whom he will support in 2008.

Part of forging that relationship is addressing the group's 10 working priorities, including crime prevention, funding federally mandated programs for cities and restoring funding for Community Development Block Grant programs to 2003 levels.

Mr. Palmer and others said that crime has spiked since cuts to Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), a federal grant program that helps cities hire and retain police officers. The increase in crime has been coupled with an economic decline in many urban areas.

Democratic candidates will have to work hard to generate voting support, particularly among their most loyal voting bloc: blacks. Nearly 50 percent of those votes can be found in urban areas.

Black Democratic mayors such as Detroit Mayor Kwame M. Kilpatrick have said that crime and poverty are destroying America's cities.

Mr. Kilpatrick said he has met with three of the Democratic presidential candidates, including Mrs. Clinton, whom he also touted as a strong contender. He also met with Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who Mr. Kilpatrick said is a strong advocate for eradicating poverty, a major problem in urban centers.

"Some of what I have heard is a real focus on poverty and bringing the new emerging markets and finance to the cities," he said. "And it is not just the policies of welfare, not a handout but a hand up."

Mr. Kilpatrick credited the Clintons for the creation of new policies such as welfare-to-work, which he said helped cities get more residents off the poverty rolls.

But he said cities need flexibility to put money into job training and retraining for new high-tech jobs, more affordable-housing funds and more input on how No Child Left Behind policies are implemented.

"We need to have America's mayors sitting at the table when this discussion is being made and not allow it to become an insular, inside-the-Beltway sort of thing," Mr. Kilpatrick said.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, who officially announced his candidacy for president Feb. 10, has the thinnest political record among those in the Democratic field and lacks many of the personal relationships with mayors that others have in abundance.

He also did not attend the mayors' conference last month, missing an opportunity to make a first impression. But he has other experience that many mayors say could be useful in crafting policy that focuses on the urban agenda.

"I do like the fact that Barack has been on the ground and done social work and has a hands-on perspective in Illinois," said Michael B. Coleman, mayor of Columbus, Ohio.

"Frankly, I suspect he is able to deal with many of these issues from personal knowledge, not from a book, and that is essential in the development of a policy that is effective," Mr. Coleman said.

He said the candidates' records will be important, but how they address the 10-point plan in the campaigns will be a deciding factor.

"There has to be a scramble by these people about their agenda, and then you will likely see a lot of support from me and other mayors across the country," Mr. Coleman said.

Narrowing The Religion Gap? (NYT)

By Gary Rosen

The New York Times Magazine, February 18, 2007

Try a quick political thought experiment. First, form a mental picture of the Democratic front-runners for president — Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. Now do the same for the leading Republican contenders — John McCain and Rudy Giuliani. Next (and this is the key step), imagine each of them in church, sitting in a pew, head bowed, or better still, at the pulpit, delivering a homily or leading the congregation in worship.

Strange, no? It's not hard to envision Clinton and Obama among the faithful. She is a lifelong Methodist and self-described "praying person," and he belongs to a church where some years ago he found himself (in his own words) "kneeling beneath that cross" in submission "to His will." Both slip easily into the earnest, humble-of-the-earth mode of liberal God talk.

But McCain and Giuliani? You somehow imagine them fidgeting during the hymns and checking their watches. The senator is an Episcopalian, the former mayor a Catholic, but neither man, you have to think, would be caught dead in a Bible-study group or could possibly declare, à la George W. Bush, that his favorite philosopher is "Christ, because he changed my heart." In the piety primary, the Democrats win hands down.

None of this is likely to reverse the "religion gap" in our politics — that is, the fact that regular churchgoers identify by a wide margin with the G.O.P. Come election time, the personal religiosity of the Democratic candidates won't matter nearly as much as the positions they take in all the drearily familiar theaters of the culture war. What a matchup between churchgoing Democrats and secular-minded Republicans may supply, though, is welcome moderation in our debates over issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research. God knows, both sides of the ideological divide have fundamentalists in need of taming.

On the right, the culprits are familiar, having become stock characters in our politics. In his unsuccessful run for the Republican nomination in 2000, McCain called them "the agents of intolerance," singling out Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell. For a taste of their views, you can visit the Web site of Concerned Women for America (C.W.A.), which bills itself as the "nation's largest public-policy women's organization." Its mission is "to protect and promote biblical values among all citizens," the Bible being "the inerrant Word of God and the final authority on faith and practice." As for dissenters from C.W.A.'s stand on issues like the "sanctity of human life," a handy link to Bible passages explains "why you are a sinner and deserve punishment in Hell."

A number of observers on the right, including Jeffrey Hart of National Review, Heather Mac Donald of the Manhattan Institute and the blogger Andrew Sullivan, have performed a service lately by denouncing the G.O.P.'s pact with such authoritarian bullies. But the problem can be exaggerated. Whatever their private views, most of today's big-time social conservatives speak in public as faith-based policy wonks, not as preachers of fire and brimstone. Consider James C. Dobson, the controversial founder of Focus on the Family. In a recent article titled "Two Mommies Is One Too Many," he objected to the impending parenthood of Mary Cheney and her partner. The core of his argument? What he trumpets as "more than 30 years of social-science evidence" showing that children do best with a married mother and father.

Is Dobson persuasive about the supposed evils of gay parenthood? Not to me. But the case he makes is based on an asserted set of facts — facts that are open to challenge and dependent on neither revelation nor church writ. Yes, he also avers in passing that traditional marriage is "God's design for the family and is rooted in biblical truth," and this is probably what motivates him. But is there anything wrong with so frankly religious a premise? Does it somehow disqualify his arguments?

Here is where the dogmatists of the secular left come in. Looking to fend off Bible-toting conservatives, the philosopher Richard Rorty argued more than a decade ago that in a modern democracy, faith should be a strictly private matter and has no place in public discussion. Traditional religion, he wrote, is a "conversation stopper," a source of values before which nonbelievers can be only mum. The same rigid divide informs a recent manifesto "in defense of science and secularism" signed by such academic luminaries as Daniel C. Dennett, Steven Pinker, Peter Singer and Edward O. Wilson. They urge the country's political leaders "not to permit legislation or executive action to be influenced by religious beliefs."

So categorical a rejection of faith in the public square is impossible to reconcile with our political traditions, of course. It sweeps away not just today's social conservatives but also abolitionism, women's suffrage and the civil rights movement. Dr. King without the almighty? Unthinkable. Conceding the extremism of his earlier view, Rorty himself has backtracked. Citizens should feel free to speak as believers, he now suggests, so long as they don't simply "cite authority, scriptural or otherwise."

It's a reasonable standard. After all, very few of us, whether religious or secular, can easily articulate our views about fundamental things. On questions of human dignity and human ends, we tend to sputter and assert, setting out propositions that are difficult to justify to those who don't share them. Invoking secular values like "autonomy" or "self-realization" can be just as much of a "conversation stopper" as appealing to the Bible. What we owe one another are concrete explanations, grounded in terms we might hope to share.

Can the rising field of presidential hopefuls move beyond the collision of orthodoxies to which we have grown accustomed? Maybe in some small way, if only because of the peculiarities of the personalities involved, but even that would be progress. At our present cultural moment, it is hard to think of a more edifying prospect than a campaign that will feature a running debate between churchgoing Democrats and vaguely impious Republicans.

Who Are The Bundlers? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

THE 2008 presidential field has already begun to sort itself into candidates willing to disclose the identities of their big financiers and those who balk at providing this critical information. On the side of real disclosure are three Democrats, Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, along with two Republicans, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and -- in the latest addition to the ranks of openness -- Mitt Romney. Officials of the former Massachusetts governor's campaign told us that Mr. Romney will report the names of his big bundlers, the fundraisers who collect donations from large numbers of people and who thereby help their candidate far beyond the maximum of $2,300 they are legally allowed to contribute directly. Declining to provide this information are Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani.

The refusal of these candidates to live up to the standards set by President Bush during his two campaigns, as well as by 2004 Democratic nominee John F. Kerry, speaks volumes about their commitment -- or lack thereof -- to openness in government. These candidates note, correctly, that they aren't obliged to reveal the names of their big bundlers. But in what could be the first presidential campaign since Watergate to be financed entirely with private funds, in an election cycle in which the two major-party nominees alone could raise and spend $1 billion, it's critical that the identities of those helping to underwrite these expensive enterprises be released. Candidates are as indebted to those who haul in big bundles of checks for them as they would be to those who write big checks. Since the latter practice is no longer allowed, big bundlers are the most important components of a successful financial operation.

Indeed, Ms. Clinton's campaign encourages "Hillraisers" to sign up on its Web site and set fundraising targets. For its biggest bundlers, the campaign has set the audacious goal of at least $1 million. Does the campaign really believe it's tenable to keep the identities of these financiers secret? What is its justification for doing so? We single out Ms. Clinton for a number of reasons, chief among them her front-runner status, her undoubted capacity for raising enormous sums and the unprecedented size of the bundles she is seeking.

But that does not excuse the refusal of her rivals in either party to be transparent about their own financial operations. Candidates who simultaneously hold elective office -- and who therefore have another claim on donors' attention -- ought to be especially conscious of this duty. Connecticut Democrat Dodd, whose chairmanship of the Senate Banking Committee offers him a handy fundraising platform, promises to do the right thing. We've had no luck getting answers from other elected officials, including New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), and Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.).

Mr. Edwards, alone among Democratic candidates in 2004 in refusing to disclose the names of his bundlers, is well aware of both the value and peril of bundlers; his campaign was fined $9,500 by the Federal Election Commission last year for accepting in-kind contributions and illegally reimbursed donations from one of its big 2004 bundlers. Mr. Giuliani, too, knows the benefits of bundling: A 1996 report by the New York City campaign finance board, "Bundles of Trouble?" detailed how Mr. Giuliani had 205 "intermediaries" bring in more than $1 million to his 1993 mayoral campaign. "Like direct contributions, bundled contributions can be a means for buying access, influence and political power," the report noted. That is exactly why the names of bundlers should be a matter of public record.

Human Nature Redux (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

Sometimes a big idea fades so imperceptibly from public consciousness you don't even notice until it has almost disappeared. Such is the fate of the belief in natural human goodness.

This belief, most often associated with Jean-Jacques Rousseau, begins with the notion that "everything is good as it leaves the hands of the Author of things; everything degenerates in the hands of man." Human beings are virtuous and free in their natural state. It is only corrupt institutions that make them venal. They are happy in their simplicity, but social conventions make them unwell.

This belief had gigantic ramifications over the years. It led, first of all, to the belief that bourgeois social conventions are repressive and soul-destroying. It contributed to romantic revolts against tradition and etiquette. Whether it was 19th-century Parisian bohemians or 20th-century beatniks and hippies, Western culture has seen a string of antiestablishment rebellions led by people who wanted to shuck off convention and reawaken more natural modes of awareness.

It led people to hit the road, do drugs, form communes and explore free love in order to unleash their authentic selves.

In education, it led to progressive reforms, in which children were liberated to follow their natural instincts. Politically, it led to radical social engineering efforts, because if institutions were the source of sin, then all you had to do was reshape institutions in order to create a New Man.

Therapeutically, it led to an emphasis of feelings over reason, self-esteem over self-discipline. In the realm of foreign policy, it led to a sort of global doctrine of the noble savage — the belief that societies in the colonial world were fundamentally innocent, and once the chains of their oppression were lifted something wonderful would flower.

Over the past 30 years or so, however, this belief in natural goodness has been discarded. It began to lose favor because of the failure of just about every social program that was inspired by it, from the communes to progressive education on up. But the big blow came at the hands of science.

From the content of our genes, the nature of our neurons and the lessons of evolutionary biology, it has become clear that nature is filled with competition and conflicts of interest. Humanity did not come before status contests. Status contests came before humanity, and are embedded deep in human relations. People in hunter-gatherer societies were deadly warriors, not sexually liberated pacifists. As Steven Pinker has put it, Hobbes was more right than Rousseau.

Moreover, human beings are not as pliable as the social engineers imagined. Human beings operate according to preset epigenetic rules, which dispose people to act in certain ways. We strive for dominance and undermine radical egalitarian dreams. We're tribal and divide the world into in-groups and out-groups.

This darker if more realistic view of human nature has led to a rediscovery of different moral codes and different political assumptions. Most people today share what Thomas Sowell calls the Constrained Vision, what Pinker calls the Tragic Vision and what E. O. Wilson calls Existential Conservatism. This is based on the idea that there is a universal human nature; that it has nasty, competitive elements; that we don't understand much about it; and that the conventions and institutions that have evolved to keep us from slitting each other's throats are valuable and are altered at great peril.

Today, parents don't seek to liberate their children; they supervise, coach and instruct every element of their lives. Today, there really is no antinomian counterculture — even the artists and rock stars are bourgeois strivers. Today, communes and utopian schemes are out of favor. People are mostly skeptical of social engineering efforts and jaundiced about revolutionaries who promise to herald a new dawn. Iraq has revealed what human beings do without a strong order-imposing state.

This is a big pivot in intellectual history. The thinkers most associated with the Tragic Vision are Isaiah Berlin, Adam Smith, Edmund Burke, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Friedrich Hayek and Hobbes. Many of them are conservative.

And here's another perversity of human nature. Many conservatives resist the theory of evolution even though it confirms many of conservatism's deepest truths.

Rice Finds Huge Gaps Between Israel, Palestinians (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 18, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas as she presses forward with a new initiative to revive the moribund peace process.

She is to meet with Abbas in the West Bank political capital of Ramallah and with Olmert separately in Jerusalem.

Rice flew in to Israel Saturday vowing to press ahead with a risky summit with the two leaders, who are embroiled in a bitter feud over the presence of Islamist radicals in a soon-to-be-formed Palestinian government.

Rice, arriving from an unannounced visit to Iraq, went straight into talks with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni in Jerusalem.

The highlight of her mission is to be her first three-way meeting with Abbas and Olmert on Monday. She has billed that as the kick-off of a long-awaited US initiative to revive negotiations on a peace deal and the creation of a Palestinian state.

But the Rice plan has been overshadowed by controversy over a power-sharing deal reached last week between Abbas' Fatah party and the ruling Islamist group Hamas, which the US and Israel consider a terrorist group.

Speaking alongside Rice, Livni insisted Israel will not deal with the new government until its Hamas members recognise the Jewish state's right to exist, renounce violence and accept past peace agreements.

Those principles are supported by Washington and its Western partners but have so far been consistently rejected by Hamas.

"These requirements are not obstacles for peace but they are the basic conditions and foundations for any kind of vision of a two-state solution," Livni said.

"I think that the moderates in the Palestinian side need to understand that a path towards a Palestinian state needs to go though renunciation of violence and terrorism and not by compromising with terror," Livni said.

Abbas, whom Rice and President George W. Bush have long hailed as the key "partner for peace" in the Arab-Israeli standoff, insists the power-sharing understanding meets the international conditions.

Earlier Saturday, Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said "we will say to the Americans and to the Israelis that they must give a chance to this government." "The world must work with this agreement," Abu Rudeina added, speaking after a meeting between Abbas and Rice's top Middle East aide, Assistant Secretary David Welch.

While Israeli media reported that Bush backed the hardline Israeli stance in a telephone conversation with Olmert on Friday, Rice declined to publicly take sides.

She insisted that the three conditions "remain the foundational principles for a two-state solution and in fact for the formation of a leadership that can lead to that two-state solution".

DOJ_NMG_0133508

But she added that Washington "will await the formation of a (Palestinian) government before making any decisions about it," as Livni watched on.

"If one waited for the perfect time to come to the Middle East, you would never get on an airplane," she said.

The West and Israel have refused critical financial aid to the Palestinian government since Hamas took control of the administration after unexpectedly trouncing Fatah in legislative elections a year ago.

Abbas was elected separately and has significant executive powers under the Palestinian constitution.

The aid embargo has exacerbated an economic crisis in the Palestinian areas and fueled tensions that erupted into deadly violence between Fatah and Hamas supporters in recent weeks.

Abbas says the understandings reached with Hamas meet the West's principles by stating that the new government will respect "Arab and international" agreements and past accords signed with Israel by the Fatah-led PLO -- steps that imply recognition of Israel according to this view.

Regardless of the outcome of her meetings here, Rice could come under pressure to ease the boycott from Washington's partners in the so-called Quartet of mediators who first laid down the principles -- the European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Following her visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories, she is to meet her Quartet counterparts in Berlin on Wednesday.

3 Parties Jostle Before Meeting In Jerusalem (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 17 — A much anticipated meeting of Israelis, Palestinians and Americans here on Monday — seen as a possible first step to rejuvenating Middle East peace talks — seems likely to be overtaken by battles over a new Palestinian unity government.

On Saturday, representatives of all three groups were jostling for position before the meeting, with the Americans and Israelis saying that the new government must recognize Israel, and the Palestinian Authority president saying that the world would have to live with the coalition.

But it was unclear whether those statements sounded a death knell for restarting talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to represent the United States at the meeting.

Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, and his political movement, Fatah, recently agreed to form a unity government with the militant group Hamas to try to end deadly fighting between the groups. But Hamas, which won last year's legislative elections, has not yet agreed to recognize Israel and renounce violence, as the Israelis, Americans and many Europeans have demanded.

On Saturday, Bush administration officials informed Mr. Abbas that the United States would continue its boycott of the Palestinian government if the unity government did not meet its demands, according to Arab and American officials. Those officials would not speak for attribution before the meeting on Monday.

Mr. Abbas responded with what amounted to "take it or leave it," his spokesman, Nabil Abu Rdeneh, told reporters.

Ms. Rice stopped short of calling off the long-term peace effort, saying she wanted to wait until the unity government was formed to give it a chance to meet American conditions.

Tzipi Livni, Israeli's foreign minister, said that the Israelis would attend the meeting on Monday but that they would not proceed further with peace negotiations unless the new Palestinian government recognized Israel and renounced violence.

Abbas Tells U.S. He's Done His Best (AP)

AP, February 18, 2007

The world will have to deal with a new Hamas-Fatah coalition even if its platform falls short of international demands such as recognition of Israel, Mahmoud Abbas told a U.S. envoy Saturday, according to an aide to the Palestinian president.

Abbas told State Department official David Welch he will deliver the same message _ that he has done his best to moderate the Islamic militants _ at an upcoming summit with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the aide.

However, Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni suggested later Saturday that there would be no room for compromise. Speaking at the start of a meeting in Jerusalem, they said any Palestinian government would have to meet the three conditions of international acceptance _ recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace deals with Israel.

"The moderates on the Palestinian side need to understand that the path toward a Palestinian state goes through the renunciation of violence and terrorism and not by compromising with terror," Livni said, in an apparent reference to Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0133509

At Abbas' headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah, the president told Welch that he had no choice but to cut a deal with Hamas, which won parliamentary elections last year. Abbas was elected separately in 2005 and also wields considerable power.

"President Abbas told David Welch that the Mecca agreement was the only possible agreement and the world must deal with it," Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said. The U.S. side did not comment on the meeting.

"In the three-way meeting with Olmert and Rice, President Abbas is going to say that this government should be given a chance." Abu Rdeneh said.

The platform of the coalition between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement falls short of the international demands, containing only a vague promise to "respect" previous peace deals, which could be seen as implied recognition of Israel.

Rice said Saturday she would withhold judgment until the government is formed.

The U.S. secretary of state said the Palestinian coalition talks were complicating the summit, which was to have been a step toward restarting Israeli-Palestinian peace talks after more than six years of fighting.

"Despite the complications it's an important time to have these discussions ... about the principles of two states for two peoples," she said.

The Hamas government, which resigned Thursday to make way for the new coalition, was hit by an international aid boycott that nearly bankrupted it.

Despite that warning, Abbas went ahead with the new coalition, based on a power-sharing deal reached last week in the Muslim holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia.

On Thursday, Abbas asked Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to start forming the new coalition. Haniyeh has five weeks to do so.

The Palestinians fear a return to deadly factional fighting if the fragile power-sharing arrangement fails. In recent months, dozens of people have been killed in violence between Hamas and Fatah.

In the West Bank, gunmen opened fire early Saturday on the home of a Hamas Cabinet member, Planning Minister Samir Abu Eisha, breaking some windows, but causing no injuries.

Abbas: "World Must Deal" With Hamas (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

JERUSALEM - Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, speaking hours before the arrival of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a mission to revive peace talks, delivered a blunt message: "The world must deal" with Hamas.

He made his comments in a meeting with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David Welch in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

"President Abbas told David Welch that the Mecca agreement was the only possible agreement, and the world must deal with it," Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said after the meeting.

He was referring to a Saudi-brokered deal between the militant Islamist group Hamas and Mr. Abbas' secular Fatah party to share power in a new Palestinian government.

Miss Rice, who arrived in Jerusalem last night after a surprise visit to Iraq, acknowledged that her visit was taking place at a "complicated time."

Immediately after her arrival, Miss Rice met with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. She is to meet with Mr. Abbas today.

The climax of her visit is expected tomorrow, when Miss Rice hosts a summit between Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

The summit has been clouded by Hamas' continued refusal to meet three conditions recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace agreements.

Hamas is labeled a terrorist group by the United States and Europe, which have imposed a crippling economic embargo since the militant group won a majority of seats in the Palestinian government early last year.

"In the three-way meeting with Olmert and Rice, President Abbas is going to say that this government should be given a chance," Mr. Abu Rdeneh said.

Miss Rice said the United States had decided it would wait until the installation of the new government before deciding whether to cooperate with it.

"It only makes sense that you have to renounce violence. It only makes sense that you have to recognize the right of your partner to exist and to respect international agreements," Miss Rice said.

"Those principles remain the foundational principles for the formation of two states and the formation of a leadership that can lead to that two-state solution," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0133510

With the Palestinian government dependent on international aid, the previous Hamas government had been subject to an economic embargo by the United States and Europe.

Limited international aid has been channeled through Mr. Abbas, who was elected president in 2005. Power within the Palestinian government is split between the president and a Cabinet, which is lead by a prime minister.

The Cabinet posts of the new coalition government and its policy guidelines have yet to be agreed on.

The United States hopes the meeting tomorrow with the Palestinian and Israeli leaders will establish a set of principles to begin negotiations on a final Israel-Palestinian agreement.

Success would mark the first peace negotiations in six years, since Israeli and Palestinian diplomats failed to reach a deal in the waning hours of the Clinton administration and the first months of the Palestinian uprising.

But instead, Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert and Miss Rice appear likely to be detoured by the Mecca agreement and how it will affect relations with the Palestinian Authority and the flow of international aid.

"This is a very sensitive point in time after the agreements between the Fatah and Hamas. The understandings don't meet the requirements of the international community," Mrs. Livni said before her meeting with Miss Rice.

"These requirements are not an obstacle for peace, but they are the basic conditions and foundation for any kind of for the vision of a two-state solution."

Israelis Are Gone, But Gaza Rebuilding Is Slow (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

RAFAH, Gaza Strip, Feb. 16 — In a place were most everyone has a hard-luck story, Ibrahim Abu Shatat could write an entire book. Two of his homes have been destroyed by Israeli troops, he has been out of work for six years and his family of nine has lived in the storage room under Rafah's soccer stadium for three years.

Yet Mr. Shatat may be one of the few Gazans who see a ray of hope. Partly through his persistence, construction has begun on 300 homes in the sand dunes next to the former Jewish settlement of Rafiah Yam. Along with a neighboring school, they are the first major construction projects in or near a settlement since Israeli soldiers and settlers pulled out of the Gaza Strip in summer 2005. And one of those homes will be his, possibly by fall, Mr. Shatat said.

The Israeli withdrawal raised Palestinian hopes for new homes, schools and businesses, and an easing of the overcrowding in the Gaza Strip, an impoverished coastal territory where about 1.5 million Palestinians live.

"When the Israelis left, we demanded that the Palestinian government give us a piece of land," said Mr. Shatat, 47. But internal Palestinian turmoil, the conflict with Israel and a lack of money have kept the abandoned settlements looking almost exactly as they were the day the Israelis left. Israel, in agreement with the Palestinians, flattened the roughly 1,600 settler homes, and so far, the rubble is being removed from only 3 of the 21 settlements.

But there is progress on the barren patch that was a no man's land just outside Rafiah Yam, in southwest Gaza near the border with Egypt.

Mr. Shatat took his wife, Maha, to the construction site for the first time on Friday to see the cinder-block foundations of about 20 homes. The plans call for modest, detached houses of two or three stories, with one family living on each floor. "I'm so excited," Mrs. Shatat said. "Now I finally believe it is happening."

Since the Palestinian uprising began in 2000, at least 1,500 families in Rafah have lost their homes, according to the Palestinians. Israeli military bulldozers made repeated forays to destroy houses that Israel said were being used by weapons smugglers and gunmen firing on Israeli forces along the border with Egypt.

The Israeli departure raised the prospect of land-hungry Palestinians flooding into the former settlements. But while many Palestinians are impatient for new housing, security guards have kept out would-be squatters in most, but not all, cases. The settlements also came with greenhouses that offered the prospect of thousands of agricultural jobs. Yet the greenhouses sit idle.

The Palestinians invested millions of dollars to repair the greenhouses shortly after the Israelis left, and had an excellent crop in the winter of 2005 and 2006. But they were unable to export their produce to Europe, the main market, because Israel kept Gaza's main crossing for goods closed for weeks at a time, citing security concerns.

Short of money and fearing a similar fate this year, the Palestinians did not plant a winter crop in the greenhouses. But the goods crossing has been mostly open in recent weeks, when the crops would have been ready for export.

The Palestinian Agriculture Ministry says it will soon start renting the greenhouses to private farmers and will encourage them to grow for the local market, since there are no guarantees that fruits, vegetables and flowers can be exported in a timely manner.

Ahmed Yousef, an adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said the government had been allocating former settlement land for universities, hospitals, recreation facilities and housing. The projects have been slow in developing for several reasons. The Palestinian government has never been known for its efficiency, and several months after the Israelis left Gaza, Hamas, the radical Islamic movement, came to power, which prompted Western countries to cut direct financial assistance. "We had to find countries to finance these projects," Mr. Yousef said. Saudi Arabia is providing $11.5 million for the 300 homes in southern Gaza, and the United Nations development program is overseeing the project.

Mr. Shatat was a welder in Israel for 14 years and built a large, three-story home in Rafah, just 50 yards from Gaza's border with Egypt. But the Palestinian uprising that began in 2000 dealt his personal fortunes a double blow.

Mr. Shatat was among the thousands of Palestinians who lost their jobs as Israel restricted the number of Palestinian workers allowed in. Then, five years ago, with Palestinian militants in Rafah battling Israeli troops, Mr. Shatat's home was rendered uninhabitable when Israeli forces demolished his neighbor's home. The Shatats rented a home nearby; that was destroyed in January 2004 when Israel tore down more homes. The only shelter Mr. Shatat could find for his wife and eight children, now ages 3 to 20, was the storage room under the Rafah stadium.

As soon as he moved his family in, Mr. Shatat began lobbying the Palestinian Authority to build replacement homes for those destroyed in the fighting, but received little help, he said. He set up a committee for the homeless in Rafah, and made himself a nuisance at government offices in Gaza City, particularly at the Land Authority. "I told them that if they did not give us land, we would start living in their offices," he said.

About a year ago, the Palestinian government allocated land for 300 homes, though this will provide shelter for fewer than half those who lost homes in fighting along the border, according to Mr. Shatat.

Several miles up the Mediterranean coast, the former settlement of Tel Katifa offers a more typical example of the state of the former settlements. At its northwest corner, armed members of Fatah stand guard, maintaining positions they have held since shortly after the Israeli departure. Along the southern side, Hamas forces hold an outpost established a month ago, in a bid to replace the Fatah men.

At the southwest corner, unarmed guards from the Agriculture Ministry hope their presence, marked by a torn Palestinian flag flapping overhead, will discourage the factions from shooting at each other. So far, Fatah and Hamas have exchanged only sporadic gunfire during the factional fighting in Gaza.

Meanwhile, a family affiliated with Fatah is living in Tel Katifa's former kindergarten, the one building left standing when the Israelis pulled out. Fawzi Abu Abed said his family moved in after receiving permission from a Palestinian family that claimed it owned the land before the Israelis arrived. Mr. Abed said his home was destroyed by the Israelis in 2002, and government subsidies to rent a home ran out last year. "The government is broke, so we had to find our own solution," Mr. Abed said.

Egyptian Charged With Spying For Israel In Turkey; Israel Denies It (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 17 — An Egyptian student who fled the country six years ago is now sitting in jail, arrested upon his return to Cairo on charges of spying for Israel.

According to his former lawyer, the man, Mohamed Essam Ghoneim el-Attar, has confessed and is "regretting everything he has done." Mr. Attar, who has dual citizenship in Egypt and Canada, is facing a likely sentence of 15 to 25 years, the lawyer said.

"His personal circumstances — divorced parents, needs a job — are no excuse," said the lawyer, Ragab el-Assal, who met with the defendant last week. "He is someone who sold himself for the sake of money and ambition, the destructive kind."

Mr. Attar, who originally fled Egypt to avoid a prison sentence for what the lawyer said was his failure to pay a car repair bill, has been allowed only limited access to legal counsel since he was arrested on Jan. 1, Mr. Assal said before seeing him. In fact, at the time Mr. Assal was not even sure where Mr. Attar, 31, had been incarcerated.

"All they said to me is, 'We do not have him,' even though I have an official permit to see him," said Mr. Assal, after he had spent an entire day visiting Egyptian authorities and prisons in search of his client.

But after finally seeing his client and examining the investigation files, Mr. Assal relinquished the case, adding that he thought Mr. Attar was guilty as charged and would be convicted accordingly.

"I wish the confessions were a result of torture and the case a fabrication; I wish he was innocent," Mr. Assal said. "But there are confessions, witnesses and evidence. It is a lost case."

Egyptian law enforcement authorities have not disclosed the details of the arrest, which they announced more than one month later. But an account of the case was reported by Al Ahram, a newspaper with close ties to the government.

According to the newspaper, Mr. Attar left Egypt in August 2001 on a tourist visa to Turkey, where he offered his services at the Israeli Embassy and was recruited by an agent of the Mossad, Israel's intelligence service, to gather information about Egyptians and Arabs living there.

DOJ_NMG_0133512

The newspaper also said he was asked to select other potential recruits by luring them with "money and women," and that he later moved to Canada where he converted to Christianity, changed his name to Joseph, obtained Canadian citizenship and got a job at a bank in Toronto with the help of two other Mossad agents.

Mr. Assal said witnesses included people who said they were approached by Mr. Attar in Turkey. According to the news report, the three Israelis have been charged with espionage and will be tried by Egyptian courts in absentia.

Israeli officials denied the allegations, saying they learned about the case from news reports.

"I would summarize it in one word: nonsense," said the Israeli minister of Internal Security, Avi Dichter, while speaking to reporters last week in Ottawa.

Israeli intelligence services have been accused of using Canadian identities to shield agents before. In 1997, Mossad agents, using fabricated Canadian passports, tried to assassinate a leader of Hamas in Jordan, causing the Canadian government to file a protest. At the time, the Israeli government said it would not use false Canadian passports again, a pledge Mr. Dichter repeated last week.

"Those days are over and that's why I say it is a fabrication," he told reporters.

Deciding On The Enemy Worth Talking To (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

WHEN it comes to finding a way to disarm your enemies, here is a puzzle: How do you decide which dictatorial, nuke-building regimes to negotiate with, and which to freeze out, sanction or intimidate with a couple of aircraft carriers?

That, in a nutshell, is a looming question raised by last week's long-delayed deal with North Korea. Even while hardliners and conservatives were assailing the administration last week for "selling out" to Kim Jong Il, some in the administration were wondering whether there are lessons here for dealing with Iran.

The deal Mr. Bush approved requires North Korea to stop producing plutonium, seal its giant nuclear facility at Yongbyon and — after a negotiation yet to happen — take apart the nuclear complex. Over the next 60 days, the North also has to invite back the inspectors it threw out of the country four years ago — and declare where it has hidden the rest of its nuclear materials and facilities.

That would seem hard enough for the hermit nation, but the next part could be even harder: In return for concessions no one is yet talking about, the North would give up its nuclear arsenal.

Many hardened North Korea watchers say it will never happen. After all, that arsenal, estimated by American intelligence agencies at six to a dozen weapons or the fuel for them, is the only source of power for the isolated, bankrupt Hermit Kingdom.

But here's the curious part: Mr. Bush's aides worked out this "first step" in one-on-one talks in Berlin of the kind the White House refused to hold a few years back, while North Korea was still busily producing nuclear fuel to make its next generation of weapons. Those are exactly the steps Mr. Bush refuses to take with Tehran.

On Wednesday, even while celebrating the North Korean deal, Mr. Bush repeated his bottom line on opening talks with Tehran: They must stop enriching uranium first.

So what explains the difference? Why talk to one brutal regime that imprisons its dissidents in gulags, while refusing all kinds of advice — from Republicans, the Iraq Study Group, and others — to start talking to Iran?

Inside the White House, the logic goes this way: North Korea's nuclear program is already "mature," a delicate way of saying that, thanks to years of failed efforts of administrations that go back three decades, the country has joined the eight other nations known to have nuclear weapons. Insisting on suspending fuel production, one senior administration official said recently, would not gain the United States any leverage.

Iran, they argue, is different. It has no weapons — at least not yet. The Americans' objective is to prevent the Iranians from following the North Korean model, and to avoid waking up some day to news of the Iranian equivalent of North Korea's nuclear detonation, which took place last October.

But President Bush worries, his aides say, that to negotiate with Iran while it is still enriching uranium would be to open up Washington to blackmail. "Think about it," said one senior administration official. "While we're talking, the clock ticks. The Iranians can drag this out for years. But while the talks are on, no one is willing to invoke real sanctions" — or threaten, even vaguely, that if the issue isn't settled soon Mr. Bush or the Israelis might consider "disabling" Iran's facilities from the air.

This results in the American conundrum, made worse by Iran's ability to cause trouble in Iraq, a problem the administration has been loudly declaring is getting worse. "When you can't bomb, and you won't negotiate, you end up in a third box — acquiescing to bad things happening," said Robert Gallucci, the dean of the Georgetown School of Foreign Service, who was the main American interlocutor with North Korea in the Clinton administration.

"Many will say, 'What about sanctions?' " Mr. Gallucci added. But that "often turns out to be acquiescing," especially if countries like Russia, one of Iran's biggest trading partners, decline to turn the screws.

Of course, what Mr. Bush is facing now is the worst of all those bad choices. With no negotiations underway with Iran, the country has defied the United Nations and is continuing to enrich uranium (though it appears to have run into technical troubles that have slowed its progress). While the Security Council has imposed some mild sanctions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concedes that trying to escalate those punishments by passing more Security Council resolutions is probably ineffective. The Russians and the Chinese have made clear they simply won't go along much farther.

That leaves Mr. Bush with the choice of hinting at military action — an option his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, has all but dismissed. "For the umpteenth time we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran," he declared the other day, out of exasperation.

So, instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to exert more financial pressure against European banks and others who do business with Iran, in hopes of squeezing the country so hard that it decides its leaders have to go.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, argued in a speech in Washington on Wednesday that the squeeze is working — in ways it could not in North Korea — because Iran is "not a monolithic system, there are many voices, many different points of view." Mr. Bush mused happily the other day about the troubles that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the Holocaust-questioning president of Iran, is facing from elements of Iranian society that want jobs and visas.

What may really be going on here, says Robert S. Litwak, the author of "Regime Change," is that, "Iran is seen as the more dynamic threat" than North Korea. "That means the administration felt it could defer the core issue of disarmament" in the case of the North; it does not feel that it has that luxury with the Iranians, even if they are years from an actual weapon.

But the ultimate lesson of the North Korea case may be that even after sanctions, even after mutual threats, at some point both sides have to take the leap toward negotiations.

The Iranians keep sending hints they are ready to do so; on Friday evening, in response to questions, a senior administration official who is at the center of Iran policymaking (but would not agree to be quoted on the record) insisted that "it is not us refusing to talk to the Iranians, but they are refusing to come back" under the conditions the United States and Europe established.

North Korea is also a reminder that those conditions can change. Just a year or two ago the deal reached last week would have been rejected by administration hardliners as rewarding bad behavior — and perpetuating one of the world's most repressive governments. That is still the view of many of the advisers Mr. Bush once relied on.

In the last two years of his administration, he has confronted reality in the coldest corner of East Asia. The question now is whether that foreshadows a similar shift as he confronts the dangers of the hottest corner of the Middle East.

No Cold War, Perhaps, But Surely A Lukewarm Peace (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

PRESIDENT VLADIMIR PUTIN'S acerbic assault on American unilateralism last weekend in Munich might not have heralded a return to the bad old days of global ideological confrontation — of blocs and proxy wars, dissidents and spies, arms races and mutually assured destruction — even if some were quick to say it did.

The problem is, Cold War II could in its own way be just as messy and unpredictable. For all the talk of strategic partnership and even personal friendship between Mr. Putin and President Bush, the relationship between Russia and the United States has reached what is probably its lowest point since the Soviet Union collapsed a decade and a half ago.

This is now "the world of one master, one sovereign," Mr. Putin said in Munich, and he was in no way pleased. "The United States," he said, "has overstepped its national borders, and in every area."

The countries seem headed into a period of tensions when every step is met with distrust and some counterstep, putting them on opposite sides of hotspots around the world, from Iran to Georgia to Kosovo.

And with presidential elections in both countries coming in 2008, it is unlikely to get better, since candidates rarely score points at home by being conciliatory abroad.

The countries are now openly competing for influence in Europe, in the Caucasus and in Central Asia, where access to natural resources and military bases has become paramount for both. The Bush administration's plan to build ballistic missile defenses in Poland and the Czech Republic is viewed with outright hostility here. So is NATO's flirtation with Georgia and Ukraine, both former Soviet republics that Russia considers part of its historic sphere of influence.

Equally hostile is the American view of Russia's arms sales to Syria, Venezuela and, most worrisome of all, Iran. Russia last month provided Iran with $700 million worth of TOR-M1 antiaircraft batteries whose likely target in the event of conflict would be American fighters and bombers, just as Russian anti-tank weapons, originally sold to Syria, were used against Israeli forces fighting Hezbollah in Lebanon last year, prompting diplomatic protests from Israel.

The areas in which Mr. Putin and Mr. Bush have cooperated closely — against terrorism and the spread of nuclear weapons — suddenly seem like sources of confrontation as much as collaboration. Last week's deal with North Korea to suspend its nuclear programs offers hope of collaboration, but a declaration by Russia's top general that Russia could withdraw from the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, negotiated by Ronald Reagan and Mikhail Gorbachev in 1987, portends the opposite.

"There was an equilibrium and a fear of mutual destruction," Mr. Putin said in his Munich speech, delivered at an annual trans-Atlantic security conference. "And in those days one party was afraid to make an extra step without consulting the other. And this was certainly a fragile peace and a frightening one, but as we see today, it was reliable enough. Today it seems that the peace is not so reliable."

Russia and the United States are no more likely to go to war than before, when their nuclear arsenals assured a perpetual standoff, as they still do. But potential flashpoints abound. And, as in the cold war, it would not take much for simmering tensions to become a grave breach, even a violent one.

Last September, for example, someone in South Ossetia, the Russian-supported enclave in Georgia, fired on a helicopter carrying the Georgian defense minister on the same day that a Senate delegation including John McCain was flying around the region.

"Can you imagine," said Andrew Kuchins of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, "if they had shot down John McCain's helicopter?"

Mr. Putin's speech, which was interpreted at least by some in Russia as a defining moment akin to Winston Churchill's in 1946 that gave the world the phrase "Iron Curtain," almost certainly reflected Russia's rediscovered swagger on the world stage. It certainly could become a historical marker. Buoyed by soaring energy prices, Mr. Putin's Kremlin is more assertive about its role in the Middle East, in Asia, in Europe — and inevitably that means tripping over American interests in those places.

Mr. Putin was also airing long-simmering grievances about the heavy-handedness of American foreign policy that began under President Bill Clinton and continued under Mr. Bush. The complaint is of the United States' disregard for Russia's feelings on issue after issue since the 1990s, from the expansion of NATO to the alliance's war against Serbia, when Russia was simply too weak and chaotic to do anything about it.

"The West has not reckoned with the quick revival of Russia," said Alexander Rahr, a Russia expert at the German Council on Foreign Relations. He stopped short of predicting Cold War II but, "We can surely speak of the emergence of a cold peace."

After reaching out to Mr. Bush in the first hours after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Putin and others here have expressed dismay at what they see as a string of broken promises: an unfinished war in Afghanistan, with a growth of heroin production that inevitably reaches Russia; and, even worse, the seeming permanence of an airfield in Kyrgyzstan once billed as temporary. Then there is the war in Iraq, which Russians vehemently opposed and Mr. Putin warned would be catastrophic for regional peace.

American officials have expressed equal dismay with Mr. Putin's unmet promises on democratization and an "energy dialogue" that was supposed to expand opportunities for American oil and gas companies but died with the Kremlin's campaign to impose state control over natural resources. Mr. Putin spent last week in the Middle East, including Qatar, another major producer of natural gas, expressing interest in a "gas OPEC" that could coordinate policy and prices for Europe and the United States.

"That is what worries me about a new cold war: both sides feel betrayed," said Sergei M. Rogov, director of the Institute for the Study of the United States and Canada in Moscow.

Mr. Rogov said the two countries now disagreed on economics, politics, military matters and, most important, values. The latter includes distinct worldviews, he said: Russia's desire for multinational solutions that give it a voice versus American unilateralism that, especially under Mr. Bush, disdains the constraints of international treaties and obligations. Increasingly they seem to be talking past each other.

The most ominous development, Mr. Rogov said, would be a breakdown in cooperation on nuclear nonproliferation. To turn the tide of nationalistic ambitions to acquire nuclear weapons will require the countries to agree, as they did with North Korea but have yet to do with Iran.

"If we fight, politically not militarily," he said, "who will be minding the store?"

American officials were clearly shocked by the tone of Mr. Putin's speech but sought to emphasize the areas of agreement. And Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates went so far as to retort, "One cold war was enough."

Talking Tough To Stay In Power (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0133515

By Anders Aslund

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Vladimir Putin spoke his mind when he launched into an anti-American tirade in Munich recently, accusing the United States of having "overstepped its national borders in every way: in the economy, in politics, and in the humanitarian sphere it imposes its policies on other states. Well, who likes this?" Given the United States' Iraq troubles, it is natural that the Russian president would thrive on American weakness. But his speech was as notable for what it said about his domestic politics.

Putin obviously thinks he is riding high. The Russian economy is booming. Incredibly, in the past seven years, Russia's gross domestic product has grown by 500 percent, measured in current dollars (from $200 billion in 1999 to $1 trillion last year). The world is desperate for Russia's oil and gas, and Putin remains astoundingly popular at home. His successor is certain to be handpicked by him. One can only marvel at how adeptly he handles a 3 1/2 -hour televised news conference, with detailed answers, alternating charm and combativeness.

Despite all that, Putin has painted himself into a corner as he faces the end of the two terms in office that the Russian constitution allows him. This is a man who speaks the language of a modern leader trying to rebuild his country, when in fact he and his cronies have really just wanted to enrich themselves. Having spent his time as president undermining democracy, property rights, the free press and the rule of law by taking over Yukos oil (and throwing its owner into a Siberian prison) and then other big companies, now he and his coterie must cling to power somehow -- or risk losing it all if they cannot stage-manage a transition to the proper person.

The tolerance of corruption in the Putin regime is astounding. Recently, for instance, a Swiss court established that Minister of Communications Leonid Reiman, a close personal friend of Putin's, was the owner of telecommunications assets in Russia worth more than a billion dollars. But this has not been reported in major media in Russia, and Reiman remains at his post without having offered any explanation or apology, only an implausible blanket denial.

How can Putin and his cronies give this up?

It seems clear that Putin has these worries in mind when he fulminates on the world stage against the United States. Such words have the effect of increasing his popularity and therefore his grip on the country, which has been suffocated by his near-total control of television stations, newspapers, nominations of candidates, political parties and even public meetings. The evidence of a growing Russian authoritarianism is clear: Russia is one of the few countries that has declined since 2000 from "partly free" to "not free," according to Freedom House's meticulous ratings.

Russia's foreign policy in these seven years has changed accordingly, showing how brazen national political values do affect a country's behavior outside its borders. Recently, for instance, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov boasted: "Not one single significant international problem can be resolved without Russia or against Russia." Rather than acting as a problem-solver -- as Putin did in his first term when, for instance, he cooperated with the U.S. effort against the Taliban in Afghanistan -- he is now positioning himself as a spoiler on the world stage when it comes to the United States and its allies.

Nevertheless, Putin has managed to charm some Western leaders -- former German chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, former Italian prime minister Silvio Berlusconi, outgoing French President Jacques Chirac and, most notably, President Bush. Just this month, Bush told the Wall Street Journal: "Vladimir Putin has kept his word on everything he's said to me." Well, then he cannot have said much. Putin reciprocated in his anti-American Munich speech: "I consider the president of the United States my friend. He is a decent person." He could as well have said: "He is a useful fool."

Putin has divided the European Union by pampering its southern members -- France, Greece, Italy and Spain -- while antagonizing Poland and the three Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, which have tied themselves closely to the United States. In Moscow, the four latter states are called the "aggressive new minority" in the E.U.

Russia has shown itself to be most aggressive in foreign policy in its own neighborhood of former Soviet republics. It has antagonized these countries so badly with its bullying -- oil cutoffs, transportation blockades, trade shutdowns, immigration crackdowns -- that they are all rushing for the exits and seeking closer cooperation with NATO and the E.U. or working to develop new energy pipelines that skirt Russia. Russia's role in the region is dwindling despite its growing oil- and gas-fueled national wealth. As nationalist intellectual Stanislav Belkovsky, director of the National Strategy Institute in Moscow, recently put it: "In 2006, Russia ceased to be a regional power."

Likewise, even as it declares itself an energy superpower, Russia has tripped itself up. In the past year, it has bombarded its neighbors with rude surprises: oil taxes and higher gas prices; spigots closed to force a political point. No amount of reassurance at this point can erase concerns in Europe about Russia as a reliable energy supplier. In the post-Soviet space, both friends and foes of Russia are repelled, finding Putin's regime too unreliable and abrasive. They all now are trying to reduce their dependence on Russia.

The ultimate question is how the Putin regime will end. For the first time in Russian history, the secret police are fully in charge, right to the top. A tightly knit circle of Putin's friends from his St. Petersburg KGB days rules in the Kremlin. Led by Igor

Sechin, Putin's closest colleague, they control virtually all security organs. There is much speculation about whether they can even be overruled by Putin himself. The closest parallel to the Sechin group in the past is the group controlled by Joseph Stalin's secret police chief Lavrentii Beria, though there is one great difference: Unlike Putin, Stalin was not a creature of the security apparatus; he manipulated it for his own needs. There is another big difference: This group is interested only in amassing great wealth, not in controlling the lives of its countrymen. Which is why it is alarmed by the prospect of the 2008 presidential election and why Moscow is awash with rumors that Putin will find a way to stay on.

Given what is at stake, the United States can no longer be a mere bystander in this drama. Six years of soft policy on Russia have done nothing but encourage the Kremlin's anti-Western stand. Bush could learn a lesson from Mikheil Saakashvili, president of Georgia, to carry a big stick when dealing with Putin. When Bush compliments Putin, he evokes only contempt in the Kremlin. President Ronald Reagan knew how important it was to speak the truth loudly and clearly. Vice President Cheney's speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, last May was a welcome departure, which enraged the Kremlin. It's the time for the White House to follow through.

The West persuaded Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev to ratify the Helsinki conventions on human rights and free and fair elections in 1975. The Helsinki conventions played an important role in undermining the Soviet dictatorship. The United States should invoke them again as Russia approaches a new round of parliamentary and presidential elections, in which it now appears that every rule in the book is set to be violated.

Indeed, in Munich Putin saved his rudest abuse for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which was founded on the Helsinki conventions and is the international organization for monitoring elections. Like Brezhnev, Putin accused the OSCE of "interfering in the internal affairs of other countries," but the Helsinki conventions made democracy an international concern. Putin and his cronies may not like that, but given the link between Russia's domestic policies and its foreign behavior, it's important for the West to insist.

The Good Old Days Of The Cold War (LAT)

By Paul Kennedy

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

Don't wax too nostalgic -- the world was once a much more dangerous place.

IT WAS FUNNY, in a grim sort of way. Last week, Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates responded to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's polemical attack on the United States by remembering the 50-year Cold War as a "less complex time" and saying he was "almost nostalgic" for its return.

Gates should know. He himself is the quintessential Cold Warrior, having served nearly 27 years in the Central Intelligence Agency (facing off against the likes of Putin, who was for 17 years an agent in the foreign intelligence branch of the Soviet KGB). So we should take him seriously when he suggests that the problems of 20 or 30 years ago were in some ways more manageable than our current global predicament.

Nor is he alone. There is a palpable sense of nostalgia these days for the familiar contours of that bygone conflict, which has been replaced by a much more murky, elusive and confusing age.

The argument goes as follows: The Cold War, although unpleasant, was inherently stable. It was a bipolar world — centered on Washington and Moscow — and, as UC Berkeley political scientist Kenneth Waltz argued, it was much more predictable than, say, the shifting, multipolar world of the 1910s or 1930s, decades that were followed by calamitous wars. Yes, it's true that the two sides possessed masses of nuclear weapons aimed at each other's biggest cities, but the reality is that they were constrained by a mutual balance of terror.

They had divided Europe and divided Asia, and no one, except in the Korean War, crossed those lines. Even that conflict confirmed the essential stasis. Of course, they carried out surrogate wars — in Asia, Africa and Central America, in Vietnam and Afghanistan — but they never came into direct conflict. Hot lines, summit conferences and SALT treaties kept things under control. Polish and Czech dissidents might get tossed into prison but, hey, that was not a cause for an international crisis. Those were indeed the good old days. East was East and West was West.

Today's world is far less stable and indeed much less favorable to the comfortable Western democracies. It is not just that we face an almost-impossible-to-manage "war on terrorism," with all of its capacities for asymmetrical damage to ourselves, our allies and everyone else, even as we swat the occasional terrorist group. It is not just that we are deeply mired in Iraq and Afghanistan and that the whole Middle East may totter because of the failure (one hopes not, but let's not blink) to win on the ground. It is not just that we haven't a clue how to deal with the present, disturbing Iranian regime. It is not just that we haven't the energy to block Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez from his arrogant anti-American policies across Latin America.

It is not just that Putin is advertising his anger against the United States in speeches and continuing his manipulation of global oil and gas prices, his support of Iran, his intrusions into the Middle East. It is not just that the Chinese leadership is openly staking a new place in the world order, in its Africa diplomacy, its missile tests and its move into hitherto Western-dominated international institutions. And it is not just that a dozen or more fragile states, chiefly in Africa, are collapsing into chaos, while various other societies, chiefly in South America, are unraveling. It is the unnerving fact that all of this is happening at the same time, though at different speeds and different levels of intensity.

So is it true? Was the Cold War era, on the whole, a safer era? Ponder the following counterarguments:

First, however tricky our relationships with Putin's Russia and President Hu Jintao's China are nowadays, the prospect of our entering a massive and mutually cataclysmic conflict with either nation are vastly reduced.

We seem to have forgotten that our right-wing hawks argued passionately for "nuking" communist China during the Korean War and again during the Taiwan Straits crisis of 1954. We also have apparently forgotten — although newly released archival evidence overwhelmingly confirms this — how close we came to a nuclear Armageddon during the Cuban Missile Crisis.

Likewise, we've forgotten the shock of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, which prompted then-German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to ask, "Is this the new Sarajevo?" a reference to the outbreak of World War I. And who still remembers 1984-85, when we were riveted by Jonathan Schell's argument in the New Yorker that even a few nuclear explosions would trigger such dust storms as to produce a "nuclear winter"?

Those were really scary times, and much more dangerous than our present circumstance because the potential damage that could be inflicted during an East-West conflagration was far, far greater than anything that Al Qaeda can do to us now. No one has the exact totals, but we probably had 20,000 missiles pointed at each other, often on high alert. And the threat of an accidental discharge was high.

None of today's college-age students were born in 1945, 1979 or maybe even 1984. None lived with those triangular signs proclaiming their schools to be nuclear bomb shelters.

To recapture those frightening atmospherics these days, university professors must resort to showing Cold War movies: "The Manchurian Candidate," "Fail Safe," "Dr. Strangelove," "The Hunt for Red October," "Five Days in May," "The Spy Who Came in from the Cold." Students look rather dumbfounded when told that we came close, on several occasions, to World War III.

Yet what if, for example, Josef Stalin had prevented American and British supply aircraft from flying into Berlin in 1948-49? Phew! The years 1945 to, say, 1990 were horrible on other accounts. China's Mao Tse-tung's ghastly Great Leap Forward led to as many as 30 million deaths, the greatest loss of life since the Black Death. The Soviet Union was incarcerating tens of thousands of its citizens in the gulags, as were most of the other members of the Warsaw Pact. The Indo-Pakistan wars, and the repeated conflicts between Israel and its neighbors, produced enormous casualties, but nothing like the numbers that were being slaughtered in Angola, Nigeria, the Congo, Vietnam and Cambodia. Most of the nations of the world were "un-free."

It is hard to explain to a younger generation that such delightful countries as Greece, Spain, Portugal, Chile, Brazil, South Africa, Poland and Czechoslovakia (to name only a few) were run in those days by fascist generals, avowed racists or one-party totalitarian regimes. I am ancient enough to remember the long list of countries I would not visit for summer holidays; old enough to recall how creepy it was to enter Walter Ulbricht's East German prison house of a state via Checkpoint Charlie in the late 1960s. Ugh.

Let us not, then, wax too nostalgic about the good old days of the Cold War. Today's global challenges, from Iraq to Darfur to climate change, are indeed grave and cry out for solutions.

But humankind as a whole is a lot more prosperous, a great deal more free and democratic and a considerable way further from nuclear obliteration than we were in Dwight Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy's time. We should drink to that.

Protesters Oppose Plan To Expand American Base In Northern Italy (NYT)

By Peter Kiefer

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

VICENZA, Italy, Feb. 17 — Tens of thousands of people converged Saturday on this small city in the Veneto region of northern Italy for a peaceful protest against the planned expansion of an American military base here.

The expansion would essentially double the base's size so it could house the full 173rd Airborne Brigade. The number of military personnel here would grow to about 4,500 from 2,750.

Residents of the area, saying they are concerned over the possibility of terrorist attacks, military traffic congestion and environmental damage, have staged a series of protests, and the widely publicized demonstration on Saturday was billed as a chance for Italians to express their anger over American foreign policy. Fears grew of a repeat of the violence that overtook antiglobalization protests in Genoa in 2001.

Italian authorities and law enforcement officials were on high alert, and the United States Embassy warned Americans to steer clear of Vicenza.

On Saturday, the airspace over Vicenza was temporarily closed, and most stores in its historic center were closed all day, some even boarded up. Several helicopters circled overhead, and 1,300 local and military police patrolled the streets, but the marchers, of all ages, made their way through the city peacefully.

Some marchers were at least as angry at their own government for failing to stop the expansion as they were at the United States.

“I don’t like that they are building a military base here and that it is not even my country that is building it,” said Andre Torlai, 21, a journalism student who arrived earlier in the day from Parma, his hometown. “There people here that don’t like America for a lot of reasons, but I am here more to protest against my own government.”

Last week, Prime Minister Romano Prodi infuriated members within his ruling coalition, especially Communists and radical leftists, when he decided not to reverse the plan set in motion by his predecessor, Silvio Berlusconi, to allow the expansion of the base. The center-right opposition seized on the dissent as a sign of its weakness.

“Today, Prodi has been given a vote of no confidence by his own majority,” Isabella Bertolini of the center-right opposition Forza Italia party told [a news organization]. “He should step down.”

Fueling the tensions in advance of the march, an Italian judge indicted 26 Americans on Friday, most of them C.I.A. officers, in connection with the 2003 kidnapping in Milan of a radical Egyptian cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar.

This month, an Italian court ordered an American soldier to stand trial in the death of Nicola Calipari, an Italian secret service agent killed by American soldiers in Iraq in 2005 while driving a kidnapped Italian journalist he had helped free to the airport.

Italians Protest U.S. Base Expansion (AP)

By Colleen Barry, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 18, 2007

Tens of thousands of people marched through the northeastern Italian city of Vicenza under heavy police guard on Saturday to protest a planned U.S. military base expansion.

Despite fears that violent demonstrators would be drawn to the protest, the march took place without incident, finishing outside the main train station where it started, as hundred of police officers stood guard and helicopters hovered overhead. The route did not pass the airfield where the expanded base is to be built, where critics keep a permanent picket.

"The government majority — whether they agree with the protest or, like me, do not — welcomes that the demonstration in Vicenza finished in an orderly fashion," said Premier Romano Prodi, who had urged protesters to be peaceful. "This must be stressed."

Police estimated the crowd at 50,000 to 80,000, while organizers put the numbers at 120,000.

"To build a military base is not the gesture of a peaceful government," said 24-year-old city resident Simone Pasin, draped in a rainbow peace flag. "I think it's time to dismantle military bases and put up structures of peace."

Trains and buses brought in leftist activists and anti-globalization protesters from across Italy to support residents concerned that the expansion would increase traffic and noise and air pollution, deplete local resources and raise the risk of terrorist attacks.

Prodi's government has approved the project, angering his far-left allies. The Communist and Green parties, members of the governing coalition, have backed the protest, though no one from the government showed up after Prodi banned ministers from attending.

Prodi has said his government had no reason to halt the expansion, which also has been approved by local authorities.

The Ederle base has about 2,900 active duty military personnel. The expansion at the Dal Molin airport, on the other side of town, would allow the U.S. military to move four battalions now based in Germany, raising the number to 5,000.

The move is part of the U.S. Army's overall transformation into a lighter, more mobile force — reducing its numbers in Europe from a Cold War high of 480,000 to 88,000 by 2012. Under the plans, elements of the U.S. 173rd Airborne Brigade, a rapid reaction unit now spread between Italy and Germany, would be united.

"I think it is a done deal. I don't think there is any turning back. This is what Prodi has said and what the local authorities have said," said David Bustamente, a spokesman at the U.S. Consulate in Milan. "This demonstration is about process."

DOJ_NMG_0133519

Construction is scheduled to begin later this year and to be completed by 2011 at a total cost of $576 million. Before construction begins, a task force run by Italians has been set up to hear community concerns and make adjustments to the plans where possible.

"We're trying to show sensitivity, because we know people are concerned," Bustamente said.

The 173d Airborne Brigade, Europe's quick response force, is scheduled to redeploy soon for Afghanistan.

Some in Italy's ruling coalition feared the demonstration might suggest anti-U.S. sentiment in the country, but despite the presence of some "Yankees Out!" T-shirts, the mood was more anti-military than anti-American.

"The problems is not that Americans are in Vicenza," said Pasin. "The problem is that there is a military base."

A group of Americans ignored a warning by the U.S. Embassy to avoid Vicenza and joined the protest behind a banner reading "Not in our name," cheered by passing Italians who shook their hands and snapped their photos.

"The U.S. should not build military bases, the U.S. should think of its domestic problems," said John Gilbert, an American living in Italy for the past 25 years who was in a group of about 20 Americans who had traveled from Rome and Florence.

Spain's Peace Process In Tatters After Basque Separatist Bombing (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

SAN SEBASTIAN, Spain -- Call it prophetic or defeatist or just plain cynical. But when the Basque separatist group known as ETA shattered its so-called "permanent cease-fire" in December with a massive bombing at Madrid's airport that killed two people, former ETA leader and convicted killer Eduardo Uriarte was not surprised.

What had stunned him, he said, was that nine months earlier, Socialist Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero had bothered to reach out to ETA, which seemed close to final defeat after a nearly 40-year campaign of terror and assassinations that has left more than 800 people dead.

"ETA had almost disappeared, and the decision to have a dialogue with them brought ETA back to life," said Uriarte, 61, who spent eight years in prison for his part in the first ETA killing, in 1968. He was released in a general amnesty in 1977 and is now a peace activist.

"A government cannot give a terrorist group credibility and dignity like the Spanish government did," Uriarte said. "ETA is not looking for negotiation. They're looking for victory."

The Dec. 30 bombing at Madrid's Barajas airport, which leveled a five-story parking lot and killed two Ecuadoran immigrants, may not have surprised Uriarte, but it shocked Zapatero's government and many Spaniards who had dared to hope that peace talks with ETA, formally known as Basque Homeland and Liberty, would finally settle one of Europe's last and longest violent campaigns for independence.

Now, the peace process is in tatters, with no clear way forward. The bombing destroyed ETA's credibility, eroded confidence in Zapatero's government and emboldened the opposition Popular Party, which has adopted an increasingly strident tone against any compromise with Zapatero on his drive to resolve the issue.

"The problem is that the president of the government said first peace, then politics, telling ETA for the first time in 40 years that there was the possibility of paying a political price for peace," said Gustavo de Aristegui, the Popular Party's chief foreign policy spokesman in parliament. "In between, the government sent clear signals of appeasement" with Zapatero's "willingness to do almost anything" to win ETA's acquiescence at the peace table, he said.

Joseba Alvarez, a spokesman for the Batasuna organization, an outlawed political group that is considered ETA's political wing, said ETA had offered the March 2006 cease-fire to facilitate talks, but the government never followed through on compromises. Those included moving some of the 700 Basque prisoners scattered in prisons across Spain closer to their homes in the north, releasing sick prisoners and starting the process of legalizing Batasuna, he said.

Although Batasuna issued a statement expressing "profound sorrow" for the two deaths, the group did not condemn the bombing. "We will never condemn or criticize violence while there is no path to a political resolution" for an independent Basque state, Alvarez said.

"The bomb attack in December could have been averted if the Spanish government had done what it agreed to," Alvarez said. "On Aug. 18, ETA publicly said the path [to peace] was being blocked, and if there was no new movement, something could happen."

Many Spaniards say ETA's warnings smacked of extortion and indicated that ETA never intended to compromise on its drive for full independence from Spain. Polls show that a majority of the Basque country's 2.1 million residents are satisfied with the wide-ranging autonomy they already enjoy, but Batasuna has about 120,000 supporters, based on election support for its sympathizers -- a small but significant core that fuels ETA's violence, analysts said.

Mikel Buesa, head of Foro de Ermua, a group that opposes Basque nationalism, said that between the March cease-fire announcement and the December bombing, ETA continued to steal weapons and explosives and wage a concerted campaign of street violence. ETA will never lay down arms in favor of political dialogue, he said.

"ETA's capacity to negotiate depends on its capacity to commit violent acts," said Buesa, whose brother Fernando was killed in an ETA car bombing in February 2000 after the group had declared, then abandoned an earlier cease-fire agreement.

For his part, Zapatero acknowledged in a speech before Congress that his optimism about the peace process was a "clear mistake."

A former high-ranking official in the Interior Ministry, who would discuss domestic terrorism only on condition of anonymity, said that many top Interior officials opposed Zapatero's peace dialogue with ETA because the group was on the verge of being eradicated. A fundamental flaw in the process, he said, was that ETA never renounced violence, nor did it discontinue it, even after announcing the cease-fire.

"None of our reports provided support for the what the president wanted to do," he said. "We found leading counterterrorism offices around Spain saying ETA would be dead by spring, the group was so weak, and Batasuna was not able to mobilize anything" in the way of public support.

But even as reports of robberies, trafficking in explosives and experimental bombings poured in, Zapatero "was empowering the group and creating expectations" for compromise that he could not fulfill because of Popular Party opposition, which "proved to be a fatal article of the process."

Diego Lopez Garrido, a Socialist party spokesman in Congress, said the government had every reason to believe it was following a legitimate and promising peace negotiation that had deep public backing.

"It was logical to think that ETA was prepared to abandon weapons and violence," he said, noting that in addition to ETA's cease-fire declaration, the group had not killed anyone since May 2003. But after the December bombing, "We had a new fact. After that, the government said that's the end of dialogue and the peace process."

The bombing "not only destroyed the peace process, it destroyed any credibility ETA had," said Miren Azkarate, spokeswoman for the Basque regional government, which had led a broad political dialogue with Basque groups including Batasuna, in parallel with the federal government's talks.

"Now we all agree that the only way for ETA to recover this credibility is not by declaring another permanent cease-fire, but going for decommission of its arms, usually the last step taken by a terrorist organization, or otherwise there can be no trust and no possibility to sit with ETA again," she said.

Alvarez, the Batasuna spokesman, said without ETA there would be no peace process and any decommission of arms would come "when the process reaches the end."

In a Jan. 9 statement asserting responsibility for the blast, ETA said it considered the March 2006 cease-fire still active, although it reserved the right to "respond" again if the government continued attacks against the group.

While President Bush and others "try to make-believe that all violence is terrorism and there's only one kind of terror, here everyone understand that's not so," Alvarez said. "In Basque society, the majority were never in favor of an armed struggle, but they obviously distinguish between al-Qaeda and ETA attacks. What fuels ETA is society itself."

Expanding Power Puts Family Of Venezuelan President Under Increasing Scrutiny (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

SABANETA, Venezuela, Feb. 13 — At the entrance to this dusty town where Hugo Chávez was born in 1954, a billboard welcomes visitors with a gleaming image of Mr. Chávez, the president, and the words, “Cradle of the Revolution.”

Other billboards and posters throughout Sabaneta show Mr. Chávez embracing his younger brother Aníbal, Sabaneta’s mayor, and his father, Hugo de los Reyes Chávez, the governor of Barinas, the surrounding state. Such reminders of the power amassed by Mr. Chávez’s family have been ubiquitous here since he ascended to the presidency eight years ago.

From a humble start in a dirt-floored adobe home that was bulldozed to make way for a hamburger stand, the family’s widening political clout has been increasingly scrutinized as critics call attention to abuses of power and corruption charges throughout the institutions now controlled by Mr. Chávez, including the National Assembly, the Supreme Court and the federal bureaucracy. Revelations of corruption under his family’s watch in Barinas and accusations of nepotism have dogged Mr. Chávez even as he makes combating such irregularities one of the priorities of his government.

“We call them the royal family of Barinas,” said Antonio Bastidas, 46, an opposition politician in Barinas who grew up playing baseball and catching catfish with Mr. Chávez and his brothers. “They started out with nothing and now call themselves revolutionaries, though they are revolutionaries with all the best trappings of power.”

Mr. Bastidas and others in the political opposition in Barinas have filed numerous complaints of corruption and mismanagement against the administration of Mr. Chávez's father, a retired primary-school teacher universally known in Barinas as "maestro," or professor. Many of the accusations have languished in Venezuela's byzantine bureaucracy, while Mr. Chávez's family and its supporters in Barinas have repeatedly won strong victories in elections.

"I'm here because the people put me here," Mayor Aníbal Chávez, 50, said in an interview at his office, seated under portraits of the president, the Caracas-born liberation hero Simón Bolívar and Jesus. "We are recuperating our love of the fatherland, contrary to the policy of the empire, which is to enslave us," he said, referring to the United States.

"Sabaneta is booming," he said, listing state-financed projects here like asphalt and tomato-processing plants and a huge sugarcane-growing venture carried out with the assistance of dozens of advisers flown in from Cuba. "I'm a dreamer, but I believe we are transforming this municipality into something greater."

One effort intended to lift Sabaneta from obscurity, the Venezuelan-Cuban sugarcane project, has been particularly embarrassing for President Chávez. He became enraged last year after investigators uncovered a $1.5 million embezzlement scheme at the sugar-processing complex, which is named in honor of Ezequiel Zamora, a general who fought in one of Venezuela's bloody 19th-century internal wars.

Investigators have not implicated any of Mr. Chávez's five brothers or his father in the scandal, though it unfolded shortly after Aníbal was elected mayor and seven years into the administration of his father, who has fended off corruption accusations almost since his first election victory in 1998.

"May God forgive me for what I'm about to say, but in cases like this, I swear to you, if I could order someone to be executed, I would order him executed," President Chávez said last year when the scandal surfaced.

Mr. Chávez, who is twice divorced, vigilantly guards the privacy of his children and former wives. A court fined an opposition newspaper, Tal Cual, and an editorial writer this week for publishing an editorial imagining a dialogue about political subjects between Mr. Chávez and his youngest daughter, Rosinés. But his father and siblings, all public figures in Barinas, have been open to scrutiny.

The family boasts not only a mayor and a governor, but also the secretary of state for Barinas, a post created for the president's brother Argenis, who carries out many day-to-day functions at the governor's palace. Another brother, Adelis, is a senior banker at Banco Sofitasa, which does brisk business with the state government. Adelis also supervises the government's construction of a new soccer stadium in Barinas.

His brother Narciso, an English teacher who lived in Ohio for several years, was accused of influence peddling in the state government after he ran unsuccessfully for mayor of Bolívar, a municipality near Sabaneta. He was later placed in important posts at Venezuela's embassies in Canada and Cuba, where he was put in charge of overseeing the various bilateral agreements reached between Fidel Castro and Mr. Chávez.

Adán, the eldest brother of Mr. Chávez, who was the second-born son, is perhaps the most influential of the president's brothers, serving as ambassador to Cuba, private secretary to the president and, most recently, minister of education.

Adán, the president and Aníbal, the three oldest sons, are in their 50s; the younger sons are in their 40s.

Residents of Barinas, a state of cattle ranches, palm trees and pickup trucks that resembles stretches of South Texas, are treated almost monthly to tales of largess within Mr. Chávez's family, some substantiated, and some not.

They point to the frequent trips to Cuba of their governor, Hugo de los Reyes Chávez, for medical treatment, a luxury out of reach for many Venezuelans. Through a spokesman, the governor declined repeated requests for an interview.

The governor, who is in his 70s, has long been a fixture in state politics in Barinas, where for decades he was a loyal organizer for Copei, a conservative political party. From his schoolteacher origins, he rose to become director of education programs for Barinas during the early 1980s. Now he travels throughout Barinas in a caravan of sport-utility vehicles led by a police escort, a rarity in provincial Venezuela.

Opposition politicians here say that Mr. Chávez's mother, Elena, who also started as a teacher, exemplifies the family's rise to the nouveau riche class. She now appears in newspaper photographs carrying her poodle, Coqui, and dressed in designer outfits and gold jewelry. Her plastic surgeon, Bruno Pacillo, went to the National Assembly in 2004 to complain that he was barred from an elite Caracas social club, presumably because of his connection to Mr. Chávez's family.

Some claims that the family lives large off the state seem surreal. For instance, the newspaper La Razón published a column last month saying that Argenis, the secretary of state, had come into possession of a gray bulletproof Hummer, one of several such vehicles that can be seen roaming the streets of Sabaneta, the state capital, these days.

The column said that the president, during a visit over the Christmas holiday to the family's ranch in Barinas, tried teaching Argenis a lesson in revolutionary values by ramming the vehicle with a tractor. An official in the Barinas state government who was with the Chávez family over the holidays said the entire story was "a lie."

The family ranch near Sabaneta, called La Chavera, has been a frequent source of scrutiny for the political opposition, which contends that the family's landholdings there and elsewhere in Barinas have grown from a small area to more than 7,000 acres in the past eight years, according to "Hugo Chávez Without His Uniform," a biography of the president by Cristina Marcano and Alberto Barrera Tyszka.

The governor, who has a salary of about $2,000 a month, has emphatically denied any misappropriation of funds during his administration. Investigations of corruption allegations in the state Legislature were suspended after the president's supporters won all of the seats in the most recent election. The governor appears to be tiring of the persistent criticism of his administration in the local news media.

"Prepare yourselves," the governor warned his critics in the media and the political opposition in December after his son won a re-election bid for president by a wide margin, "for what is coming is going to be ugly."

While a vocal opposition to the president and his family persists, it is clear that many people in his hometown still adore him.

"Hugo was always a serious type of guy, but I never imagined he'd go so far," said Miguel Torres González, 55, a rancher and board member of the state sugar complex in Sabaneta who grew up with Mr. Chávez and his brothers.

"He always expressed his political philosophy as if he were writing poetry," said Mr. Torres, pointing to an flowery inscription in a book given to him by Mr. Chávez in 1986 about Maisanta, a rebel in Venezuela's backlands whom the president says was his great-grandfather. "We are extremely proud of him."

Similarly, Pilar Becerra, 50, the owner of a store selling sewing supplies near the spot where Mr. Chávez was born, rejected claims that his family had grown too powerful, pointing to the example set by the president of donating part of his salary to a scholarship fund for poor students.

His supporters here, along with Aníbal, questioned Mr. Chávez's refusal to allow a museum to be built in his honor on the trash-strewn lot where the family's adobe house once stood.

"The love of the people for my brother is so strong," Aníbal said over cups of the sweet coffee that is a staple of almost any visit here. "We'd like to honor him with this project, but he still doesn't want it."

Argentina's First Lady May Have Eye On Husband's Job (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

BUENOS AIRES — She is a senator and the chief advisor to her husband, who is no less than the president of Argentina. Some call her the real power in the presidential palace.

She is certainly more stylish than he is, sporting a Jackie Kennedy-like designer collection and a shoe closet rivaling that of Imelda Marcos.

And the heated rumor mill here suggests she wants his job.

"This is the century of the woman," Sen. Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, Argentina's first lady, commented in a much-celebrated encounter in Paris this month with Segolene Royal, the French Socialist vying to become France's first female president.

The first lady's French soiree has ignited a sizzling new round of speculation about Fernandez's long-presumed presidential aspirations.

The "new Evita" label appears destined to stick, even if comparisons seem to be a stretch in the case of this lawyer from a middle-class background and the up-from-the-streets Eva Peron, who died seven months before Fernandez was born. Both are first ladies and both nominally "Peronists," though what Argentina's dominant political movement even means today is a matter of debate.

Her husband, President Nestor Kirchner, has not officially decided whether to seek reelection this fall. He has played it coy, saying his party's candidate would be a male or female pinguino — a reference to the chilly Patagonian expanses, and penguin habitat, where the couple launched their political careers.

"This isn't the time to talk about the candidacy," Kirchner said recently, even though the election is less than nine months away and at least three opposition candidates, including Kirchner's former economy minister, Roberto Lavagna, have declared their intentions.

Kirchner, known for his left-wing, tough-guy talk, has been variously reported to be ailing or tiring of the nation's top job, and perhaps eager to yield to his strong-willed wife and avoid the pitfalls of a second term.

He would step down in good standing — Kirchner is widely credited with guiding Argentina's steady recovery from the economic collapse of 2001-02 — and perhaps even be in a position to run again in 2011. Some foresee a scenario in which he and his wife, who turns 54 on Monday, could alternate in power for the next 12 years, or at least try to.

DOJ_NMG_0133523

"He would be the first president to leave office with a positive image since the return of democracy" in 1983, noted Carlos Fara, a political analyst here. "If the electoral calculus doesn't change drastically, there is a great probability that Cristina will be the candidate."

Comparisons have arisen to another power couple who met in law school and burst from the boondocks to national prominence: Bill and Hillary Clinton.

Fernandez, dubbed Reina (Queen) Cristina in a recent, fawning biography, is known to admire Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. But the parallel may be unfair to Fernandez, who enjoyed a reputation as an outspoken lawmaker in the capital for years while her husband, the former governor of southern Santa Cruz province, was a virtual unknown here.

'Awful candidate'

In Congress, Fernandez's televised lectures against corruption and other perceived shortcomings earned her a mixed reputation: maverick lawmaker to her supporters, publicity-grabbing harridan to her detractors.

"She comes off as very strident and bossy," said James Neilson, columnist for the Noticias newsweekly, citing traits often attributed to her husband as well. "She'd be an awful candidate."

Early polling indicates she would garner 10 fewer percentage points in a general presidential election than her husband, probably ensuring a runoff against an opposition contender — a dicey proposition.

Others dispute Fernandez's supposed electoral vulnerability, noting her sweeping defeat of a rival Peronist to win a Senate seat from Buenos Aires province in 2005.

Her admirers portray Fernandez — with her flowing hair, infectious smile and rousing speaking style, complete with Evita cadences — as something special: a magnetic force ready to scale the final ramparts of macho governance here.

Fernandez would bring style to the job, her advocates say. "Cristina will win by 30 points," Kirchner's interior minister, Anibal Fernandez, gushed to the daily Clarin newspaper.

She will decide

Well, will she or won't she? She's not saying, but she is making one thing clear: She will make the call, not her husband. (Though no one really believes this.) "I decide about myself," she told reporters in Paris.

Fernandez was ostensibly in the City of Light to represent Argentina at the signing of a new international treaty banning the sinister "disappearances" that plagued her homeland under the 1976-83 military dictatorship. Critics assailed the Paris trip as a campaign junket and a cynical device to burnish Fernandez's thin international credentials at the taxpayers' expense.

But the first lady, who, like her husband, has a prickly relationship with the media, didn't take kindly to suggestions that her Parisian sojourn was a campaign jaunt. She compared her presence to Eleanor Roosevelt's trip to Paris in 1948 to push for U.N. passage of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, an initiative regarded as a landmark document.

"That I am here is important to Argentina because I take the opportunity to speak with people of the first level and explain to them what is happening in Argentina," she told Argentine reporters at her Paris hotel.

"There is something narcissistic in looking oneself in the mirror and saying: 'I want to be president,' " Fernandez said in a 2005 interview with the Spanish daily El Pais. "I would prefer to look at myself in the mirror and say … 'I am part of a project that once wanted to change the world and now has more humble aims — to take part in the change in my country.' "

Political handicappers here are waging that humility will take a back seat and Argentina's first lady will soon go for the big prize.

Ground Shifting Under U.S. Isolation Of Cuba (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

MIAMI — Opposition to restrictive U.S. policies on Cuba has been mounting for more than a decade, but it may have reached critical mass with recent power shifts in Havana and Washington.

With Democrats in control of Congress and 80-year-old Fidel Castro having transferred power to his brother Raul while he recovers from a grave illness, a course change may be ahead.

Polls suggest most Americans want better relations with the island. Farm and energy interests would like to trade and invest in Cuba. A raft of legislation to change trade and travel restrictions has been introduced in Congress this session. Even many who have fled Cuba say it's time to end the standoff.

"The majority of the Cuban community in Miami supports the betterment of relations with Cuba, especially with regard to ending travel restrictions," said Andres Gomez, a Miami free-speech activist. "There is a will to be able to help relatives, even if we oppose certain aspects of life on the island."

The committee aims to mobilize the hundreds of thousands of Cubans who have arrived since 1980 and who reject the isolation strategy adopted by exiles who fled after the 1959 revolution that brought Fidel Castro to power.

DOJ_NMG_0133524

Antonio Zamora, a Bay of Pigs veteran who has parted ways with anti-Castro militants, has formed a group that is pursuing normalized relations. "That we are not engaging with Cuba is very damaging to our future and to the possible influence we can have in Cuba," Zamora said.

Raul Castro has said Cuba would be open to talks on improving relations, but the White House has spurned the offers.

"It's an ongoing missed opportunity," says Glenn Baker, Cuba policy director at the World Security Institute think tank in Washington. "If they're available for dialogue, getting together and talking, even if they talk past each other for some of that time, I still think it's a useful exercise."

President Bush would probably veto any measure to engage with Cuba, but lawmakers and lobbyists believe there is sufficient support to override a veto or attach policy changes to legislation Bush must sign.

"Congress is energized. I think the various constituent groups are energized," said Kirby Jones, a consultant on trade and business with Cuba. Farmers want to sell more produce, oil companies want to explore Cuba's gulf deposits, and the travel industry anticipates a million U.S. visitors to Cuba the first year it is legal.

"What has changed is that we are in the majority — and by 'we,' it's important to underscore that it's not Democrats or Republicans or liberals or conservatives, but 'we' meaning those who would like to see a change in policy," Jones said, noting that much of the legislation proposed since Congress convened last month enjoyed bipartisan support and could sidestep a veto.

The Cuba Reconciliation Act sponsored by Rep. Jose E. Serrano (D-N.Y.) proposes to lift the 45-year-old trade embargo. Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) has submitted a bill to rescind restrictions on Cuban Americans' visits to family on the island, now limited to once every three years.

Also on the table are moves to allow any U.S. citizen to travel to Cuba, to remove tight limits on money and goods Cuban Americans can send to their families, and to ease the payment process for agricultural sales to Cuba.

The barrier most likely to fall first, say Cuba-watchers, is the limit on visits to parents, siblings and children. "It's a policy that's reduced American influence on the island to almost nothing as dramatic changes are occurring," Delahunt said.

"The crazies in Miami overplayed their hand when they put in that once-every-three-years restriction. Nobody supports that," said Albert Fox, a Tampa businessman who heads the Alliance for Responsible Cuba Policy.

Though few see even the slightest flinch in the administration's posture, Fox says Cuba policy has "dropped down a few notches" in importance to a White House beset with bigger foreign policy headaches. He predicts the U.S. Treasury Department, which licenses travel to Cuba, will begin approving more applications.

Recent actions, though, confirm a status quo. The Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control denied permission for a U.S. cycling team to compete in Cuba this month. It refused to license a humanitarian and educational mission planned for June. The State Department recently nixed visas for Cuban academics to take part in a University of Connecticut symposium on the post-Soviet era.

The Miami Herald editorial page, long a voice for militant anti-Castro exiles, published an editorial that stated: "The U.S. government is blowing its best chance to encourage a peaceful transition in Cuba by holding fast to counterproductive restrictions on travel to the island."

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is working to get the travel ban lifted. He says that more contact between Cubans and Americans will erode misconceptions about U.S. life that the communist regime has fostered.

U.S. citizens apparently want change too. In a recent Associated Press-Ipsos survey, 62% wanted diplomatic relations restored with Cuba; 40% said they would like to vacation there. A December Gallup poll found similar sentiments.

Opportunities to get into Cuba's booming tourism and natural resource markets are also driving the push for change. A bill exempting U.S. oil exploration in Cuba from the embargo was submitted last year by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), and is expected to be brought before the new Congress. The measure has bipartisan support and the backing of the oil lobby.

A bill submitted by Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) aims to ease the payment regimen for agricultural sales to Cuba, which have been legal since 2000, but have been stifled by bureaucracy. USA Rice Federation spokesman David Coia says there is potential for U.S. rice producers to triple last year's $40 million in sales to Cuba if trade and travel barriers are lifted.

Daniel P. Erikson, Caribbean analyst for the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington, says the exiles and the White House are digging in because the scenario they planned for hasn't happened. "The administration has spent all its time planning for the collapse of communism. There's no Plan B," he said.

The five Cuban American members of Congress steering U.S. policy on Cuba do not see a need to shift tactics. "The Castro brothers have done nothing to merit better treatment by the generous spirit of the American people," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.).

The State Department's Cuba transition coordinator, Caleb McCarry, adds: "This is the time to maintain our policy and to continue to press for genuine changes in Cuba."

Suicide Bomber Kills Judge And 14 Others In Pakistani Courtroom (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

KARACHI, Pakistan, Feb. 17 — In the sixth suicide bombing in a month, a man blew himself up in a small district courtroom in the border town of Quetta on Saturday, killing 15 people, including a senior judge, and wounding 35, officials said.

No group claimed responsibility, but the chief elected official of the province connected it to the string of suicide attacks that have now killed some 40 people and put security forces on alert across the country.

The Quetta blast could be linked to earlier suicide attacks in Islamabad and Peshawar, said Jam Mohammad Yousaf, the chief minister of Baluchistan Province.

Baluchistan has often been the scene of bombings, linked to Sunni and Shiite sectarian groups and, to a lesser extent, Baluch nationalists who are fighting an insurgency against the government. But Mr. Yousaf said local groups lacked the expertise for suicide bombing.

The recent string of bombings began after the military carried out an airstrike against suspected militants in the tribal area of South Waziristan on Jan. 16.

A militant leader, Baitullah Mehsud, vowed to use suicide bombers to take revenge. Pakistani officials have not directly implicated Mr. Mehsud in the bombings while the investigations are under way, and he has denied any involvement, saying that his threat was an emotional outburst.

Mr. Mehsud is believed to have trained suicide bombers and sent them into Afghanistan, where there were 127 suicide attacks last year.

Militants based in the tribal areas, who are sympathetic to the Afghan Taliban and Al Qaeda, are widely believed to be behind suicide bombings in Afghanistan, and have in the past been implicated in the more rare attacks in Pakistan.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and an Army Corps commander have all come under attack in the last few years, as have foreign targets like the United States Consulate in Karachi and a busload of French engineers.

Officials say the attacks are prompted by Pakistan's pro-American policy since Sept. 11, 2001. Recent attacks have focused on softer targets, with bombers often on foot and often killing civilians.

The trend is a shock for Pakistan and a stark warning for the government, which has largely ignored Afghan pleas to go after militants in the tribal areas.

The target the bomber chose in Quetta was a small district court in the center of the city, where there was little security. The bomber pushed his way in at the court's busiest time, about 11 a.m., saying that he was due at a hearing. He blew himself up at the door of the first room he came to.

Judge Abdul Waheed Durrani, who was hearing a case involving a property dispute, was killed, along with six lawyers and relatives of the defendants. Bodies and debris littered the room afterward, and shrapnel scarred the walls.

Prime Minister Aziz condemned the attack. "That is why we are against terrorism, because it kills innocent lives," he told journalists during a visit to Peshawar. "It is against our religion and against humanity."

A suicide attack in Peshawar, the capital of the North-West Frontier Province, which also shares a border with Afghanistan, killed 15 people on Jan. 27. A day earlier, a bomber at a hotel in Islamabad killed a guard.

Another bomber killed a policeman in the town of Dera Ismail Khan on Jan. 29. And a car bomber killed two soldiers in the town of Tank, near the tribal areas this month.

Blast In Courtroom Kills 15 In Pakistan (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

QUETTA, Pakistan, Feb. 17 -- A suicide bomber attacked a courthouse in western Pakistan on Saturday, killing 15 people in the deadliest in a series of attacks that have struck the country in recent weeks.

Many Pakistanis suspect that pro-Taliban fighters are targeting sensitive sites to undermine the country's support of the United States, and an official in the region where Saturday's attack took place hinted at Afghan involvement.

The explosion wounded 24 people and left bloodied clothes and body parts scattered next to wrecked furniture and shattered glass in Quetta District Court. Police tightened security nationwide.

"Afghans have been involved in previous such attacks here. I cannot rule out their involvement in today's attack, but we don't have any evidence to prove it," Jam Mohammed Yousaf, the top elected official in Baluchistan province, told reporters in Quetta.

DOJ_NMG_0133526

Relations between the neighboring countries have soured over Afghan allegations that Pakistan is supporting the Taliban, which has escalated its insurgency in Afghanistan over the past year. Pakistan denies aiding the insurgency but acknowledges that some members of the Taliban may operate from its soil.

Increasingly, Pakistan has also become a battleground. About 10 bombings have been reported in the past month, most of them in the tribal northwest. The capital, Islamabad, has been targeted in suicide attacks at its international airport and the Marriott Hotel.

Saturday's blast in Quetta was by far the deadliest.

The suicide bomber "entered the courtroom on foot, and he immediately exploded himself," Yousaf said.

The blast killed Judge Abdul Wahid, five lawyers and some relatives of prisoners who were on trial, Yousaf said. He was unable to give details about the prisoners' identities or the cases being heard.

Shortly after the attack, a crowd angered by the lapse in security gathered outside the court complex and chanted anti-government slogans. Hundreds of people later crowded a government hospital where the dead and wounded were taken to find out the fate of relatives.

The Quetta attack came a day after police near Islamabad and the southern city of Karachi said that they had arrested five people who were allegedly planning suicide attacks on foreigners and minority Shiite Muslims. Also, police in the southern city of Sukkur said Saturday that they had arrested three people who were planning suicide attacks at upcoming Shiite gatherings.

Cashing In On Communism (WP)

In the land of Mao, getting rich is finally glorious. It's also complicated.

A COUPLE OF YEARS AGO, SHI XIAOYAN SOLD 17 OF HER 20 CARS. That left her with just the Porsches -- a Boxster and the 911 Turbo -- in the garage downstairs. Shi, who also goes by Celia, is the founder and chief executive of Illinois, the Beijing-based home furniture chain, and No. 21 on a list of the richest women in China, with a reported total wealth, along with her husband, Ye Mingqin, of $125 million. These days, she drives a $38,000 convertible Mini Cooper.

"I drive an economic car -- saves gas," she explains. "You know, you have to save something for your next generation; you shouldn't spend everything."

The next generation, of course, includes Shi's son Jason, 11. Three years ago, for his eighth birthday, Jason got a Subaru Impreza, which he had customized and regularly drives at his father's racetrack.

That kind of conspicuous consumption might not be quite so conspicuous in Beverly Hills or even Great Falls. But this is China, where, until fairly recently, being rich was not only rare but virtually criminal.

After the 1949 Communist revolution, private wealth became a huge social liability. Much of it was confiscated by officials or voluntarily handed over by owners who feared persecution otherwise. Villas and large homes were seized and transformed in the interests of the state: housing for municipal workers, medical schools, government offices and the like.

Treasures in the form of antique paintings, calligraphy, Ming and Ching dynasty vases and jade sculptures were burned or smashed, often by their owners. With the Great Leap Forward and various other anti-capitalist campaigns in the late 1950s, Red Guards came and took whatever trappings of wealth remained.

If, at the beginning, Communist officials were close to the people -- farmers and peasants who were reacting to the corruption of the overthrown Kuomintang government -- eventually, they became enamored of and kept many of the confiscated goodies. Jiang Qing, leader Mao Zedong's wife, was notoriously extravagant -- reportedly having her swimming pool filled with mineral water, riding horses in parks closed to the public and watching foreign movies -- all while urging her countrymen to embrace poverty. After the Cultural Revolution (1966 to 1976), many people petitioned the government to get their possessions back: A few things were reportedly returned, but not many.

Well-known Communist slogans at the time included: "The poorer you are, the more glorious you get" and "To cut off the tail of capitalism." Free enterprise became so thoroughly reviled that even peasants selling fresh eggs were criticized as capitalists. During the Cultural Revolution, capitalists and rich landlords joined "rightists" and other "bad elements" as targets of persecution. People who spoke English or had Western training or education were fired, denounced or paraded through the streets.

Essentially, the rhetoric for three decades made it seem to be a crime to get rich.

China's "opening and reform" period began in 1978, thanks to Deng Xiaoping, the pragmatic son of a well-off landowner. After Mao's death in 1976, which ended the brutality and chaos of the Cultural Revolution, Deng marshaled reform-minded colleagues to restructure China's shattered economic system. Though Deng continued to elevate socialism over capitalism, he believed in market forces and pushed for stronger economic ties with the outside world. In 1979, he allowed parts of the southern province of Guangzhou to become a special economic zone -- Western-style management of business was permitted, and foreigners were encouraged to invest in and run factories there. He also visited the United States that year, which bolstered his desire to modernize China by turning from heavy to light industry and acquiring more technology.

The earliest Communist-era entrepreneurs, from about 1978 to the mid-1980s, were mostly people on the margins of society, members of the lower classes and sometimes criminals, people who knew little about the market but had nothing to lose by risking denunciation or the scorn of their neighbors, not to mention what little money they had. They often had to smuggle everything in -- from clothing to radios to watches -- just to build an inventory. But after making money was sanctioned by the government, many of the people who decided to xia hai, or jump into the commercial sea, and start their own businesses were either government officials or people with close connections to officials.

Any early belief that increasingly free enterprise would lead to political liberalization was crushed in the 1989 massacre of pro-democracy demonstrators by government troops in Tiananmen Square. Many entrepreneurs joined the students, calling not just for democracy but also for an end to government corruption. Much, but not all, business came to a standstill, until 1992 when Deng took a now-famous tour of the south, a trip that generated hundreds of newspaper articles and at least 20 books. Though 88 and already ailing, and with many of his pronouncements issued by a daughter, Deng promoted a package of economic reforms. He thought fair competition would stimulate business and allow some people to get rich, which would slowly spur others to follow suit. On his southern tour, he repeated a phrase he first used in October 1985 when meeting with a U.S. business group in Beijing: "Rang Yi Bu Fen Ren Xian Fu Qi Lai" (Let Some People Get Rich First). This call for economic exemplars was erroneously translated by Western media into the much more black-and-white "To Get Rich is Glorious," which became a catchphrase in the West for another burst of entrepreneurial activity in China. Though Deng continued to praise socialism, his push for economic reform became enshrined in the constitution and in Communist Party literature.

Since then, the booming Chinese economy has been one of the biggest stories in the world. Wealth and conspicuous consumption are climbing in a country where the average per-capita income has only just jumped to $145 a month (in Beijing, it's $209 a month). On the mainland, about 175 million, or 13.5 percent, of consumers have become what many Chinese scholars consider to be middle class, earning as much as $30,000 a year, the China Association of Branding Strategy reported recently. These consumers have managed to accumulate significant savings, yet often spend an entire month's salary on a single luxury item: a wallet, a watch or jewelry.

That group is expected to grow within 10 years to nearly 260 million, or 20 percent of the population, said Lu Xueyi, a Chinese Academy of Social Sciences professor. By then, China could be the world's biggest luxury market, analysts predict.

Another 320,000 to 500,000 people report enough income -- about $60,000 a year -- to put them into an upper-middle class. And because most Chinese do not disclose their exact wealth, experts say there are likely to be many more. Many of these Chinese live in gated communities. They pay $385 covers to entertain clients at karaoke clubs such as Shanghai's L.A. Disco. They spend $3,650 to mingle on a yacht at a "diamond bachelor" matchmaking party.

A far smaller, but more visible, group are the super rich. No. 1 on the 2006 Forbes China Rich List is 37-year-old Huang Guangyu, worth $2.3 billion and the owner of a chain of discount electronics stores. Of the top 40 on the list, more than a quarter are younger than 40. Their combined net worth was $38 billion, up 46 percent from $26 billion in 2005. There seems to be no real cutoff, but the minimum asset levels used by a rival rich list, Rupert Hoogewerf's Hurun Report, are telling. In 1999, people on his list had at least 50 million RMB (about $6.4 million) but this year, the lower cutoff had soared 1,600 percent, to 800 million RMB (about $100 million).

Recently, President Hu Jintao has responded to the growing gap between rich and poor by demanding that more attention be paid to a "harmonious society." Authorities have imposed luxury taxes on boats, golf clubs and diamond watches. But this has only encouraged the wealthy to fly to Hong Kong and buy such items there, where the luxury tax is lower. When not shopping, many mainlanders visit a famous 24-karat gold toilet and $3.5 million bathroom, owned by a local jeweler and displayed in a tourist exhibition hall.

The urge to flaunt economic success competes with the desire to keep a low profile. While many Chinese are flattered by the prestige of landing on various "rich lists," they also fear the publicity and the extra scrutiny from tax collectors, who seem to follow no known assessment standards.

Even so, wealth is beginning to bring other privileges. In Jiangsu province, just north of Shanghai, authorities announced last year that "large taxpayer" entrepreneurs who pay the government more than $375,000 a year get to help decide whether an official is dismissed or promoted.

Elsewhere, wealthy entrepreneurs have joined rural peasants, ethnic minorities and parents who were only children in exemption from mandatory one-child-only laws. In some cases, the children of wealthy entrepreneurs are given more points on their senior high school exams.

The rich are envied and resented -- and valued by the government. In the early days of "opening and reform," top officials had hoped that the rich would serve as a model to the poor, inspiring and encouraging them. But with high-profile corruption cases each year, leaders are increasingly worried about being caught in a scandal. They are encouraging "clean wealth" through television programs such as "Win in China," the new reality show based on "The Apprentice," even though corruption and the pursuit of money seem to be rife at every level of society.

In theory, a rising entrepreneurial class, which would mostly benefit from clean government and transparency, could act as a force for reform. But it is hard for those who have attained success to push back against official corruption, since many entrepreneurs broke the rules to get rich in the first place. It is what Chan Kin Man, a sociology professor at the Chinese University of Hong Kong who has studied the emerging upper class, calls "original sin." Some bribed bank officials to obtain loans. In other cases, their "original sin" is more serious -- a developer who plotted with officials to take the homes of poor residents, for example, or a food and grain company chief who cheats customers with poor-quality feed to get his business started.

"They feel insecure because of this original sin," Chan says. "They want to draw a line, pardon all the errors committed in the past. They understand it's too costly to ask for any political change."

It is difficult to separate wealth from power in China. A recent report in the Hong Kong-based Sing Tao Daily said research from China's State Council, the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences and the research office of the Central Party School showed that 90 percent of China's RMB billionaires (people with more than $128.2 million) are the children of senior officials. The rich get nowhere without official connections -- a commodity as valuable as capital and known as guanxi. Top officials themselves are wealthy, though some are more discreet about displaying their wealth than others. Nevertheless, their children study abroad, and they make shopping trips to Hong Kong or own expensive real estate.

The need for guanxi does not stop with the rich. The broader middle class is also dependent on its personal relationship to power. You need connections when the landlord of your luxury apartment decides to charge you extra maintenance payments, or glues your front door shut after you refuse.

Those who can afford their own planes and yachts or 20 luxury cars probably do not get their doors glued shut, or balk at fines for having too many pedigreed dogs, but Chan, the Hong Kong professor who has surveyed hundreds of entrepreneurs, said the rich told him they were exhausted from all the wining and dining of officials they had to do.

That is just the beginning of their anxiety. As these Chinese get richer, they ignore their health and struggle to cope with stress and success, according to surveys published in the state-run media. They have told pollsters of their insecurity and inability to find suitable marriage partners. Some complain of the possibility of losing their wealth overnight because of official corruption, while others said they fear criminals and jealous neighbors.

But mostly what they fear is having their new success snatched away. They are anxious about whether they have made the right connections, just in case their position of privilege turns out to be built on boggy ground.

"The only thing they think about is guanxi," Shi Xiaoyan says. "They use all their money, all their knowledge. They waste their sleeping time and their family's happy time . . . Rich people in China, they're just rich, but they know nothing."

A Clue To Washington's Cluelessness (LAT)

By Michael May

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

BOTH PROPONENTS and foes of the "surge" in Iraq made firm, confident predictions about what would certainly happen if their preferred course of action were not followed.

"If the U.S. walks away now, extremist elements will take over Iraq," said one group of government officials and pundits. "No, no — the proposed surge is too little, too late," said another. Some insisted that "the surge will only inflame anti-American sentiment."

But here's the only thing we know for sure: When the collection of politicians and pundits we call "Washington" makes predictions about countries in which the U.S. has "vital interests" (and especially about countries with which we have had bad relations), the predictions — even when they contradict one another! — are almost always wrong.

Consider the record. Washington didn't predict the fall of the shah in Iran, or the end of the Cold War, or the disintegration of the Soviet Union. Nor did our pundits (whether left, right or center) predict the war between Vietnam and China after the U.S. lost more than 50,000 service members in the region to prevent the spread of monolithic communism, or, for that matter, China's turn toward becoming a capitalistic and trading giant. There are innumerable other examples in Latin America, Africa and the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0133529

Everything is fine as long as nothing much is happening. But when something happens, especially if it's sudden or revolutionary, we usually don't see it coming. Since World War II at least, Washington's success rate at predicting change in countries with which we have a hostile relationship is close to zero.

Why this failure when most of the events mentioned were years in the making? In part, it's that we don't look at the right things. Our intelligence apparatus is better at counting missiles than at following the intricate politics of a central committee or overhearing the street talk in Tehran — or Baghdad. But even good intelligence on those matters would have had a hard time making it into the Washington debate.

That's because Washington debates tend to be narrow; they fall within a range of acceptable conventional wisdom and close out anything that seems to go out on a limb. We wonder: Is the Soviet Union trying to build a first-strike capability or not? Is Vietnam a tool of Red Chinese expansion? Does Saddam Hussein have nukes? Intelligence is asked to cast light on just those acceptable questions. The assumptions underlying those debates are seldom challenged. They are based on politically acceptable views of the other state and, career-wise, it doesn't pay to challenge them. Indeed, movers and doers in Washington often do not even have time to challenge them. There is little or no intelligence outside the axis of debate.

As a result, any analyst who forecast that, say, the Soviet Union would for its own purposes peaceably release its European satellites, or that the heirs of Mao would turn to capitalism before his body was cold in the grave, would have been quickly marginalized.

When researchers test predictions about, for instance, investments or the effectiveness of a new drug, they begin with the assumption, for testing purposes, that the theory or the advice leads to no better result than what could be attained by chance, or that the drug is no more effective than a placebo. It's up to the data to prove that the advice or the drug is effective, not the other way around. That's called starting with the "null hypothesis."

The null hypothesis means that there is no ground to believe or disbelieve any prediction. It's a way of guarding against bias.

The record of official Washington predictions gives us no reason to depart from the null hypothesis. Whatever the prediction, we should consider it just as likely that something entirely different will happen.

If the U.S. withdraws from Iraq, for instance, the civil war could grind on for years, or, conversely, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki could bring order to Baghdad within a year, probably by ethnic cleansing. The surge could lead to more needless deaths, or Gen. David Petraeus could bring a better kind of order out of chaos, at least for a while. If President Bush attacks Iran, it could help cool the situation, or we might have to hunker down for a longer, bigger war. Or perhaps the situation may be resolved not by actions from the U.S. but by initiatives from within the area, as were the earlier Soviet and Chinese situations.

Whatever we do, the situation a few years from now is likely to be different from what's currently predicted by any party to the Washington debate.

Realizing that we are still stuck with the null hypothesis should lead to a better-focused inquiry. It's a bit late for Iraq, where we disregarded what we knew and could have learned, and where the options have tragically narrowed. With Iran, North Korea and other difficult places, we have more time and freedom of action. What sorties into these places Americans and others have made bring back a different, more complex picture than the one presented by officials and discussed in the media. But we need to know still more.

The U.S. foolishly isolates hostile countries when it should pressure them to open up to our visitors, executives, students and diplomats. Congress should pressure the administration to open embassies in Tehran, Pyongyang and Havana and staff them in part with native speakers. David Kay, the former head of the Iraq Survey Group, which searched for weapons of mass destruction in that country after the U.S. invasion, found that Iraqi officials had been lying to Hussein and had not been carrying out his decisions in many cases. Perhaps if we'd been more engaged in that country, rather than keeping our distance, we would've been able to find that out before the invasion rather than after.

To get better intelligence, however, gathering information is not enough, as Iraq has tragically shown. Someone in intelligence has to put himself in the enemy's shoes.

That requires considering "the enemy" not solely as an enemy but as an organization staffed by humans with all their attending complexities — often not a politic point of view. Someone in power has to ask the right questions — and question fundamental assumptions. To date, the record says that, at key times in our history, our government, because of the blinders it put on, has had no clue about the direction of major events in the lands of our enemies. Perhaps only a better-informed public, acting through Congress, can change that.

Torture By Worms (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

DOJ_NMG_0133530

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

JIMMA, Ethiopia

Presidents are supposed to be strong, and on his latest visit to Africa Jimmy Carter proved himself strong enough to weep.

The first stop of Mr. Carter's four-nation African trip was Ghana, where he visited his projects to wipe out the Guinea worm, a horrendous two-foot-long parasite that lives inside the body and finally pops out, causing excruciating pain.

Mr. Carter was shaken by the victims he met, including a 57-year-old woman with a Guinea worm coming out of her nipple.

"She and her medical attendants said she had another coming out her genitals between her legs, and one each coming out of both feet," Mr. Carter added. "And so she had four Guinea worms emerging simultaneously."

"Little 3-, 4- and 5-year-old children were screaming uncontrollably with pain" because of the worms emerging from their flesh, Mr. Carter said. "I cried, along with the children."

We tend to think of human rights in terms of a right to vote, a right to free speech, a right to assembly. But a child should also have a right not to suffer agony because of a worm that is easily preventable, as well as a right not to go blind because of a lack of medication that costs a dollar or two, even a right not to die for lack of a $5 mosquito net.

As president, Mr. Carter put the issue of human rights squarely on the national agenda. Now Mr. Carter argues — and he's dead right — that we conceive of human rights too narrowly as political and civil rights, and that we also need to fight for the human right of children to live healthy lives.

He has led the way in waging that battle. Because of Mr. Carter's two-decade battle against Guinea worm disease, it is expected to be eradicated worldwide within the next five years. It will be the first ailment to be eliminated since smallpox in 1977, and it has become a race between the worm and the ex-president to see who outlasts the other.

"I'm determined to live long enough to see no cases of Guinea worm anywhere in the world," Mr. Carter said as he walked in blue jeans through a couple of villages in a remote corner of southwestern Ethiopia, the third country of his African tour.

After leaving the White House, Mr. Carter ended up "adopting" diseases like Guinea worm disease, river blindness, elephantiasis, trachoma and schistosomiasis that afflict the world's most voiceless people. These are horrific diseases that cause unimaginable suffering, yet they rarely get attention, treatment or research funding because their victims are impoverished and invisible.

When Mr. Carter met with Mohammad Zia ul-Haq, then Pakistan's president, President Zia had never heard of Guinea worm and didn't know it existed in Pakistan. Nor did his health minister. But after Mr. Carter put the issue on the agenda, Pakistan worked energetically with the Carter Center to eliminate the parasite in that country.

The villages here in Ethiopia that Mr. Carter visited cradle a fast-moving creek, making a lovely image of thatch huts and bubbling water. But the creek is home to the black flies whose bites spread the parasite that causes river blindness, leading to unbearable itching and often eventually to blindness.

"It's almost impossible to imagine the suffering of people with river blindness," Mr. Carter said as he traipsed through the village beside his wife, Rosalynn.

Already, Mr. Carter's campaign is making huge progress against the disease.

Kemeru Befita, a woman washing her clothes in the creek near Mr. Carter, told me that two of her children had caught river blindness in the last couple of months. After a visit to the witch doctor didn't help, she took them to a clinic where — thanks to Mr. Carter's program — they received medicine that killed the baby worms. They are two of the nearly 10 million people to whom the Carter Center gave medication last year alone, who won't go blind.

At the end of the day, this one-term president who left office a pariah in his own party will transform the lives of more people in more places over a longer period of time than any other recent president. And I hope that he can also transform our conception of human rights, so that we show an interest not only in the human rights of people suffering from the oppression of dictators, but also from the even more brutal tyranny of blindness, malaria and worms.

A Reality Check On Our Fears (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

NEW YORK -- Global business is burbling while global politics croaks messages of dread, frustration and hatred. It is supersized Dickens: The best of times by many economic measures is also the worst of times when we listen to the pollsters and the politicians.

Why this disjunction of spirits? Or to put it another way: Why not? Selling fear is the oldest tool of politics. Selling hope and confidence is the mother's milk of business. The more we get, the more we have to fear having it taken away by "others" as defined by race, religion, class or rivalrous sameness.

But there is a different, fragile feel to this particular "golden moment," a term George Shultz used in a recent Washington talk. As a former secretary of both Treasury and state, Shultz is credible in warning that the current public fury with leaders, liberal trade policies and the conduct of nations does not match -- and eventually can threaten -- the economic openings that bring billions of new workers into global labor markets and generate huge profits for the happy few of highest finance. Protectionism is the danger Shultz has in mind.

The jarring contrast is easy to spot. I went recently from listening in Washington to a hopeful Eric Schmidt, the chief executive of Google, describe a world of growing individual empowerment and prosperity as Chinese and Indian peasants join the Internet era to listening to politicians at the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy darkly emphasize the threats of terrorism, failed states, and, yes, American unilateralism and lawlessness.

That point was put most pungently by Russian President Vladimir Putin in a widely misunderstood presentation. Putin's speech was an intensely personal mocking of President Bush rather than a policy declaration of hostility toward the United States. Moreover, it was laboriously calculated for domestic political effect to bolster the other important Russian in Munich, Sergei Ivanov.

It was bad cop, good cop. Ivanov talked reassuringly about U.S.-Russian cooperation. Also a former KGB officer, Ivanov is moving forward now to succeed Putin. He was portrayed on Moscow television as a statesmanlike figure -- especially on one program filmed before either spoke in Munich but shown afterward, one knowledgeable Russian told me. Putin promoted Ivanov to become first deputy prime minister five days after the president's speech in Germany.

Putin's political intentions and the mood of his audience reflect how the national security imperative has displaced pocketbook issues that should dominate political discourse today. A relatively strong global growth cycle is continuing longer than experience and experts say is normal. You can argue economic policies round or flat if you pick your own numbers. In this confusion, foreign policy and national security issues become more salient and decisive in campaigns around the world.

Putin's audience included Sen. John McCain, a leading Republican presidential contender, who took the high road by characterizing Putin's jabs as "aggressive" but quickly adding that Americans still must work with Russia. But it did not include Sen. Hillary Clinton, the leading Democratic contender. Clinton decided to stay away from a meeting she dazzled two years ago. This time she did not want to be put in the position of criticizing the Bush administration or Democratic rivals on Iraq from a foreign forum.

Instead she went to New Hampshire to criticize the Bush administration on Iraq and to eclipse her Democratic rivals. Republican strategists hope she will now "chase John Edwards to the left" to counter his populist economic programs and thereby muddy her strong appeal to the electoral center on national security.

The dynamic is similar in other democracies. French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin gets little to no political credit for announcing that unemployment has declined steadily through his tattered term. Segolene Royal, the Socialist presidential candidate, has tumbled from front-runner to second place with foreign policy blunders that make her seem inexperienced and duplicitous. (The second the French may forgive, but not the first.) German Chancellor Angela Merkel presides over a stalemated coalition and a surprisingly robust economy. No need to dwell on Tony Blair's politically poisoned golden economic chalice in Britain.

Abundant financing in global markets and broad confidence in the ability of today's central banks to control inflation have created a buoyant international financial system in which risk premiums scrape historic lows. Oil price volatility creates enormous psychological strain on Western consumers -- but has not derailed growth to this point.

There is always cause for concern about markets overshooting, especially when risk premiums evaporate. But the merchants of political despair are overdoing it as they manipulate the new instruments of intrusive round-the-clock communications. Breathe deep, look around at what is really happening, and spend more time in life than online or in other forms of virtual reality.

TERRORISM NEWS:

George W. Visits Home Of George W. (USAT)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Bush said in front of Washington's home along the banks of the Potomac River in Mount Vernon, Va.

Bush chose the Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech on the lawn of the estate.

"I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W.," the president quipped.

McCain says Rumsfeld wasone of worst Defense chiefs

Republican presidential candidate John McCain said the war in Iraq has been mismanaged and Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst Defense secretaries.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," the Arizona senator said. "The price is very, very heavy, and I regret it enormously."

McCain, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense," McCain said to applause from some in a crowd of 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Clinton says S.C. should remove Confederate flag

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton said South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from its Statehouse grounds, in part because the nation should unite under one banner while at war. "I believe that we should have one flag that we all pay honor to," the New York senator said.

Other Democratic hopefuls, including Sens. Joseph Biden and Chris Dodd, have said the flag should come down. The banner, which once flew over the Statehouse dome and now flies nearby, is the subject of an NAACP boycott.

More than 3,000 people gathered Monday to see Clinton in her first presidential campaign stop in Columbia, S.C.

Report criticizes medicalresponse to hurricanes

The federal response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita showed that medical personnel deployed to emergencies need more hands-on training, the inspector general for the Department of Health and Human Services said.

The report by Daniel Levinson said federal medical teams often lacked experience and effective training and the teams did not include enough nurses, dentists and mental health professionals.

John Agwunobi, assistant secretary for Health, said the inspector general's recommendations "mirror many of the preparedness and response areas we are addressing."

Bush Compares Revolutionary, Terror Wars (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 20, 2007

President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president on Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," said Bush, standing in front of Washington's home and above a mostly frozen Potomac River.

"And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

DOJ_NMG_0133537

Bush chose the national Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech from a platform on the bowling green lawn of the estate.

"I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W. I thank President Washington for welcoming us today. He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," Bush said to laughter.

Washington was born on Feb. 22, 1732.

"On the field of battle, Washington's forces were facing a mighty empire, and the odds against them were overwhelming. The ragged Continental Army lost more battles than it won, suffered waves of desertions, and stood on the brink of disaster many times. Yet George Washington's calm hand and determination kept the cause of independence and the principles of our Declaration alive," Bush said on a clear but frigid day, speaking to several hundred people.

Mount Vernon is about 16 miles south of the White House. Bush traveled by helicopter.

"In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable," said Bush. "After winning the war, Washington did what victorious leaders rarely did at the time. He voluntarily gave up power.

Washington's retirement didn't last long, Bush noted.

"As president, George Washington understood that his decisions would shape the future of our young nation and set precedent. He formed the first Cabinet, appointed the first judges, and issued the first veto."

"Over the centuries, America has succeeded because we have always tried to maintain the decency and the honor of our first president," Bush said.

Before and after Bush's speech, recorded music by the 3rd U.S. Infantry Old Guard Fife and Drum Corps blared through loudspeakers. Organizers of the event said the fife and drum corps had planned to perform live, but decided against it Sunday night because of expected temperatures in the 20s that could have damaged their historic instruments.

Bush Invokes Washington On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

MOUNT VERNON, VA. — Marking George Washington's 275th birthday, President Bush on Monday linked the ideals of the first president to the war being fought by the 43rd, saying Washington's goals guided the nation's quest to extend freedom beyond its borders.

"George Washington's long struggle for freedom has … inspired generations of Americans to stand for freedom in their own time," Bush said, using a morning visit to Mount Vernon to compare the dilemmas faced at the birth of the nation to the troubles he now confronts.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," he said. "And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

Quoting the first president — and referring, by implication, to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan — Bush said: "He once wrote, 'My best wishes are irresistibly excited whensoever in any country I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.' "

Bush spoke for nine minutes on a frigid morning in front of the first president's mansion overlooking the ice-crusted Potomac River.

"I feel right at home here," he told the audience of several hundred. "After all, this is the home of the first George W."

After being greeted by Dean Malissa, an actor and Washington interpreter dressed in the blue-coat uniform and tri-corner hat of the Continental Army, Bush observed: "I thank President Washington for welcoming us today. He doesn't look a day over 275 years old."

The president recalled visiting Mount Vernon as a child with his grandmother, and said he and his wife had brought their daughters to the first president's house. The visit of about 45 minutes Monday was his first as president.

DOJ_NMG_0133538

The plantation, about 16 miles south of the capital, is in the heart of what are now Northern Virginia's suburbs, with mini-mansions rivaling it in size and grandeur cropping up nearby on both sides of the Potomac. Bush flew here by helicopter, making the trip from one president's mansion to another in just a few minutes.

Bush noted the trials that Washington faced during the Revolutionary War, at the helm of "the ragged Continental Army," facing desertions, disaster and "a mighty empire."

But, he said, "In the end, Gen. Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable."

Earlier, Bush and his wife, Laura, presented a wreath of red, white and blue blossoms at Washington's tomb. Monday was a federal holiday celebrating Presidents Day; Washington's actual birthday is Feb. 22.

Tourists Hear From President At George Washington's Home (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

President Bush visited Mount Vernon yesterday to pay tribute to "the first George W." and compared the Revolutionary War to the Iraq war in their pursuit of freedom.

Bush made his first visit as president to George Washington's home on the holiday marking the first president's birthday. Bush said he had visited Mount Vernon with his grandmother as "a little fellow from Midland, Texas," drawing appreciative laughs from a chilly crowd of several hundred tourists, history buffs and schoolchildren who had the day off.

The president and first lady Laura Bush laid a red, white and blue wreath at Washington's tomb, commemorating the 275th anniversary of his birth on Feb. 22, 1732. The presidential party took a helicopter in and out of the Mount Vernon estate in southern Fairfax County, completing the visit in less than an hour.

Bush's remarks consisted mainly of a reflection on Washington's life and impact on the United States, with brief allusions to today's war.

"America's path to freedom was long, and it was hard," Bush said. "And the outcome was really never certain. . . . In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable."

In the only direct analogy to Iraq, the president said, "Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life. And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone. He once wrote, 'My best wishes are irresistibly excited whensoever in any country I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.' "

Some of those who watched the speech under crystal skies just happened to visit Mount Vernon the day the president was there, and others had planned to attend the speech. Ellen Georgi, a history teacher from Frederick, was in the latter group. She brought her family to make them "suffer through my love of history." She said the president "gave a very good speech about George Washington and morality as the compass of our country."

About 250 high school students from Presidential Classroom, an education program for students across the country, were bused in from Georgetown thinking they were just sightseeing, part of an itinerary that also included the Jefferson Memorial and Union Station yesterday. Instead, they stood just a hundred feet from the current president.

"It was great," said Paula Jernigan, 18, from Suches, Ga. "It was moving how [Bush] talked about George Washington, how he was a great president. It reminds our country what it is that makes us great."

Defending Nation's Latest War, Bush Recalls Its First (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

MOUNT VERNON, Va., Feb. 19 — To those who criticize his handling of the war in Iraq, President Bush likes to say that history will be his judge. On Monday, Presidents' Day, Mr. Bush wrapped himself in history's embrace, invoking another war, the American Revolution, and another George W. — George Washington — as his guide.

Here at the first president's sprawling estate on the Potomac River, Mr. Bush bowed his head in placing a wreath at Washington's grave to commemorate the 275th anniversary of his birth, this Thursday. Then, after an actor portraying

Washington welcomed him to the estate — "He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," the current president cracked — Mr. Bush implicitly compared himself to his predecessor.

"With the advantage of hindsight, it is easy to take George Washington's successes for granted," Mr. Bush said after enumerating Washington's achievements as commander of the Continental Army and later as president. But "America's path to freedom was long and it was hard," he continued, "and the outcome was never really certain."

Mr. Bush drew an analogy between the Revolution and what he called "a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," wording that left unclear whether he meant the combat in Iraq or the broader fight against terror.

Washington, he added, "believed that the freedoms we secured in our Revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

The president has often seemed to find solace in past occupants of the White House. He has invoked Lincoln's shepherding the nation through the Civil War. He has recalled Truman, who struggled to explain another unpopular war, in Korea, and whose dismal public approval ratings shot skyward long after he left office. And more recently, he has been making reference to Washington as well.

"I'm reading about George Washington still," the president told reporters at a December news conference where he defended his Iraq policy. "My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary."

His appearance Monday was Mr. Bush's first at Mount Vernon as president. (He is the 28th president to visit.) It was also a rare public appearance before a crowd that is not invitation-only. But the audience was friendly, made up mostly of families with children, outfitted in snow boots and bright-colored jackets and mittens to guard against the icy cold.

The president kept it short. He spoke for just nine minutes, including a personal reminiscence of his own first visit to Mount Vernon, "when I was a little fellow from Midland, Tex., and my grandmother brought me here."

Those nine minutes were filled, however, with hints about the state of mind of a president who is doggedly prosecuting an unpopular war.

Mr. Bush spoke of General Washington's "many challenges," noting that the Continental Army "stood on the brink of disaster many times." And he spoke of Washington's resolute determination: "His will was unbreakable."

The president spoke as well of a brief retirement at Mount Vernon between Washington's return from the Revolutionary War and his presidency. Mr. Bush is already laying the groundwork for his own retirement with plans for a presidential library at Southern Methodist University, Laura Bush's alma mater.

"All he wanted to do was return here to Mount Vernon and to be with his loving wife, Martha," the 43rd president said of the first. "As he wrote with satisfaction to his friend Lafayette, 'I am become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomac, and under the shadow of my own vine and my own fig tree.' "

McClatchy Newspapers, February 20, 2007

MOUNT VERNON, Va. - Was it like this at Valley Forge?

People huddled together, marched in place and danced jigs for warmth on a frosty field outside George Washington's historic home Monday, as President Bush paid homage to the nation's first president, whose 275th birthday is Thursday.

"I feel right at home here," Bush told some 2,000 shivering people who braved morning temperatures in the low 20s to listen to the nation's 43rd president praise the first one. "After all, this is the home of the first George W."

Bush turned to a man who was portraying Washington at the festivities and thanked him for welcoming him to the late president's spacious estate on the banks of the Potomac River, about 16 miles south of the White House.

"He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," Bush quipped.

After laying a wreath at Washington's tomb, Bush drew comparisons between America's first wartime president and the current one. He likened Washington's struggles in fighting for and forging democracy to his global war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0133540

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Bush said, without specifically mentioning Iraq. "And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

The president and first lady Laura Bush made a spectacular entrance to Washington's estate. Their green helicopter, Marine One, landed a few yards from Washington's house, spraying up a misty cloud of powdery snow. Onlookers - mostly students on class trips - rushed to get a closer view of the presidential helicopter.

Before Bush arrived, the crowd had spent most of its time trying to stay warm, just as Washington's Continental Army did at Valley Forge during the bitter winter of 1777. Folks moved to the beat of piped-in fife and drum music Monday to keep their toes from freezing. A fife and drum corps was to have performed live, but decided against it for fear the frigid temperatures might ruin the historic instruments.

The bracing weather didn't bother 36-year-old Danielle Frank, of Woodbine, Va. She bundled up her family and drove to Mount Vernon. Asked whose idea it was to get up at dawn on a school holiday to go stand in an icy field for a brief presidential speech, 6-year-old Adam Frank pointed at his mom.

"It's Presidents Day," Danielle Frank said. "We should be doing something presidential with the kids, and I'm not sure they're doing White House tours."

Sarah Woodin, 14, accompanied the Franks to Mount Vernon, a bold move for someone who'd recently arrived in the Washington area from Florida. For her, the visit to Washington's home was time well spent.

"I like learning everything about history," she said. "You need to know where you came from."

President Links Terror War, U.S. War For Independence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

President Bush yesterday celebrated 275 years since George Washington's birthday by visiting Mount Vernon and linking today's war against terrorism to the United States' fight for independence.

"George Washington's long struggle for freedom has also inspired generations of Americans to stand for freedom in their own time. Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Mr. Bush said as he stood on the lawn in front of Washington's estate in Fairfax County.

With a re-enactor dressed as Washington looking on, Mr. Bush said the victories the first president won "were not meant for the United States alone," but were to advance freedom worldwide.

As he nears the end of his own two terms as president and his Iraq policy faces heavy criticism, Mr. Bush, the 43rd president, seems to take solace in the fact that historians are still digesting the first president's legacy.

"My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary," he said at a press conference late last year.

Mr. Bush clearly has done some of his own analyzing about Washington, praising him several times for being steady as a wartime leader.

"In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable," he said.

Mr. Bush also praised Washington's decision to relinquish his commission at the end of the Revolutionary War -- a time when "many would have gladly made George Washington the king of America," he said -- and returned to Mount Vernon, only to be called to oversee the constitutional convention and, later, the presidency.

"George Washington accepted the presidency because the office needed him, not because he needed the office," Mr. Bush said.

While displaying his knowledge of the first president, Mr. Bush did run afoul of Washington fans who lament the decline of the first president's celebratory day.

"We're celebrating around the country Presidents Day, but the folks that work here call it Washington's birthday," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0133541

In fact, as far as the federal government is concerned, the holiday, as designated by the Uniform Monday Holiday Act passed in 1968, is "Washington's Birthday." Some states celebrate "Presidents Day" as a combination of Washington's and Abraham Lincoln's birthdays, and the term gained prominence through the ubiquitous car- and furniture-sales campaigns that promulgated the moniker.

With the federal holiday pegged to the third Monday in February, it can never fall on Washington's actual birthday, Feb. 22.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, found another reason to recognize the day yesterday. It marked the 65th anniversary of President Roosevelt signing the executive order allowing internment of Japanese-American citizens and Japanese legal permanent residents during World War II.

"We must continue to remember this tragic time in our history to learn from our errors of the past, reaffirm our commitment to the protection of civil liberties and to ensure that we never walk the same path again," Mr. Reid said.

Australian Held At Guantánamo May Go Home (NYT)

By Tim Johnston

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, Feb. 18 — The Australian foreign minister said Sunday that his government had reached a deal to allow David Hicks, who has been held at the American military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial, to return to Australia by the end of the year.

American military prosecutors have accused Mr. Hicks, 31, an Australian citizen, of attempted murder in violation of the laws of war and providing material support for terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, is expected to be formally charged soon.

Australia's foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said authorities in the United States had told him that if Mr. Hicks was found guilty by the military tribunal, he would be allowed to serve out his sentence in an Australian prison.

"If he's convicted, we've made an arrangement with the Americans, which was confirmed to me 10 days ago by the secretary of defense, Robert Gates, that David Hicks will be able to serve his sentence or the remainder of his sentence in Australia," Mr. Downer told Australia's Nine television network.

"If the trial proceeds and proceeds quickly," Mr. Downer added, "it'll be possible to get Mr. Hicks back to Australia by the end of the year, either to serve in a prison in Australia or, of course, just to be released, depending on the result of the trial."

The Australian government is facing an election later this year and has come under increasing pressure to persuade the American authorities to either charge Mr. Hicks or release him.

American officials said Mr. Hicks had admitted to attending a training camp run by Al Qaeda and to being assigned to guard a Taliban tank outside the Kandahar airport when allied forces were bombing the area. It is unclear if he ever engaged foreign forces in Afghanistan.

Mr. Hicks's lawyers said prolonged periods of solitary confinement had produced a marked deterioration in his mental health.

U.S. To Stage Biggest Anti-terrorism Exercise On Guam (WT)

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

SAIPAN, Northern Mariana Islands (Agence France-Presse) -- The world's biggest anti-terrorism exercise will be held this year on Guam, underscoring the Pacific island's growing importance to Washington, officials said yesterday.

Exercise TopOff4 is part of a series of large-scale maneuvers established to strengthen the U.S. ability to respond to terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction.

William Marhoffer, the U.S. Coast Guard commander in Guam, said the TopOff4 exercise would be bigger than last year's Valiant Shield war games, in which the United States mobilized 30 ships, 280 aircraft and 22,000 military personnel.

"It will be bigger in some ways. Valiant Shield was a military exercise. It was a show of force. It was the first time we had three carrier strike groups in combined operations in the Pacific since the Vietnam War," he said.

TopOff4 "is a domestic counterterrorism exercise. ... It involves the intelligence communities, the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Department of Defense, the U.S. Coast Guard." The exercise is expected to simulate a maritime terrorist attack.

Vice President Dick Cheney is to visit Guam later this week.

"This exercise highlights Guam's strategic value and will show the world that we are prepared to defend our island and our nation from any threat of terrorism," Gov. Felix Camacho said in his State of the Island address.

Guam and neighboring U.S. territories, including the Northern Mariana Islands, are considered by the United States as strategic locations in the Asia-Pacific region.

Guam is home to one of the largest U.S. military naval bases in the region, and 8,000 Marines will soon be relocated there from Japan.

The island, with a population of 171,000, is banking on the U.S. military buildup to bail it out of its economic woes.

The United States and Japan are spending $15 billion on the relocation of the Marines from Japan, which is expected to further boost Washington's military strength in the Asia-Pacific.

Moroccan Suspect Says Police Implicated Him In Madrid Bombings Out Of Revenge (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

MADRID (AP) — A Moroccan who ran the shop where most of the cellphone cards used to set off the bombs in the 2004 Madrid train attacks were sold said Monday he was implicated in the case as punishment for refusing to be a police informant.

Jamal Zougam, 33, is among 29 suspects charged in the March 11, 2004, attacks that killed 191 people and injured more than 1,800 in Spain's capital. The trial opened last Thursday and is to last several months.

Zougam said he was approached twice by Spanish police seeking help getting information about Islamic radicals, but he refused.

He told a three-judge panel that following his detention — two days after the bombings — a police officer visited him in his cell and told him that if he had cooperated with police, he would not have been implicated.

"He told me: 'If you had collaborated with us, this wouldn't have happened to you,'" said Zougam, who took the stand for a second day.

"I realized it was revenge," he said. "I had nothing to do with this attack and with no other attack. I don't know why I'm in this trial."

At least two suspects in the trial were police informants before the attacks, and their defense lawyers claim the arrests were made under pressure to find a culprit.

Zougam denied he was a member of al-Qaeda or other radical Islamic groups, or that he had ever trained in terrorist camps in Afghanistan. He also condemned the Madrid blasts, and said he had never thought of his host country as an enemy.

"I condemn this attack categorically; I don't agree with this attack that takes the lives of people for religious, political and other reasons," he said.

"I live in Spain: This is like my country. Here, I live, I work, I eat," he said.

Zougam, who witnesses say planted at least one of the bombs on the commuter trains, testified Friday that he was asleep at the time of the early morning blasts and that witnesses who identified him were confused because they had seen his face on television.

Another alleged bomber, Syrian Basel Ghalyoun, also took the stand Monday and dismissed witness accounts that he, too, had placed some of the bombs.

He acknowledged that he was a friend of Tunisian Serhan Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet and other ringleaders who blew themselves up as police moved to arrest them weeks after the attacks but denied having anything to do with the bombings.

Ghalyoun, who continuously checked handwritten notes during the session and challenged the prosecutor and lawyers over certain facts and names, said he knew Fakhet was a radical.

"Serhan considered the United States an enemy of the Muslim people," Ghalyoun said.

DOJ_NMG_0133543

The 26-year-old said he had told police that the Tunisian wanted to stage attacks in Spain but said he was referring to attacks on banks and jewelry shops for money. He said police had urged him to used the generic word, attack.

Both Zougam and Ghalyoun face sentences of up to 38,656 years — 30 years for each of the 191 killings and 18 years apiece for 1,820 attempted murders — though under Spanish law, the maximum time anyone can spend behind bars is 40 years.

Who Needs Jacques Bauer? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Twenty-nine defendants went on trial last week in a Spanish courtroom for complicity in the March 11, 2004 Madrid train bombings that killed 191 commuters and injured another 1,800. Among the accused: Jamal Zougam, a 33-year-old Moroccan immigrant who once ran a cellphone business. In June 2001, Spanish police raided Mr. Zougam's apartment, where they found jihadist literature and the telephone numbers of suspected terrorists. But the Spaniards judged the evidence insufficient to arrest or even wiretap him. Today, the Moroccan is believed to have furnished the cellphones through which the trainbombs were detonated.

In raiding Mr. Zougam's apartment, the Spanish were acting on a request from French investigative magistrate and counterterrorism supremo Jean-Louis Bruguiere. Earlier, Mr. Bruguiere had also warned the Canadian government about a suspicious Algerian asylum-seeker named Ahmed Ressam, but the Canadians took no real action. On Dec. 14, 1999 Mr. Ressam -- a.k.a. the Millennium Bomber -- was arrested by U.S. customs agents as he attempted to cross the border at Port Angeles, Wash., with nitroglycerin and timing devices concealed in his spare tire.

It would be reassuring to believe that somewhere in the ranks of the FBI or CIA America has a Jean-Louis Bruguiere of its own. But we probably don't, and not because we lack for domestic talent, investigative prowess, foreign connections, the will to fight terrorism or the forensic genius of a Gallic nose. What we lack is a system of laws that allows a man like Mr. Bruguiere to operate the way he does. Unless we're willing to trade in the Constitution for the Code Napoleon, we are not likely to get it.

Consider the powers granted to Mr. Bruguiere and his colleagues. Warrantless wiretaps? Not a problem under French law, as long as the Interior Ministry approves. Court-issued search warrants based on probable cause? Not needed to conduct a search. Hearsay evidence? Admissible in court. Habeas corpus? Suspects can be held and questioned by authorities for up to 96 hours without judicial supervision or the notification of third parties. Profiling? French officials commonly boast of having a "spy in every mosque." A wall of separation between intelligence and law enforcement agencies? France's domestic and foreign intelligence bureaus work hand-in-glove. Bail? Authorities can detain suspects in "investigative" detentions for up to a year. Mr. Bruguiere once held 138 suspects on terrorism-related charges. The courts eventually cleared 51 of the suspects -- some of whom had spent four years in preventive detention -- at their 1998 trial.

In the U.S., Mr. Bruguiere's activities would amount to one long and tangled violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Eighth Amendments to the Constitution. And that's not counting the immense legal superstructures that successive Supreme Courts have built over and around the Bill of Rights. In France, however, Mr. Bruguiere, though not without his critics, is a folk hero, equally at home with governments of the left and right. The main point in his favor is that whatever it is he's doing, it works.

"Every single attempt to bomb France since 1995 has been stopped before execution," notes a former Interior Ministry senior official. "The French policy has been [to] make sure no terrorist hits at home. We know perfectly well that foreign-policy triangulation is not sufficient for that, [even if] it helps us go down a notch or two in the order of priority [jihadist] targets. So we've complemented our anti-U.S. foreign policy with ruthless domestic measures."

That's something that U.S. civil libertarians, who frequently argue that the Bush administration should follow the "European model" of treating terrorism as a law-enforcement issue instead of a military one, might usefully keep in mind. As lawyers David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue in the forthcoming issue of the National Interest, "the [Napoleonic] Civil Law system offers considerable advantages to the state in combating terrorism -- especially in terms of investigative tools and a level of secrecy -- that are simply unavailable in the ordinary Common Law criminal prosecution and trial, at least as governed by the United States Constitution."

Again, review the contrasts between American and European practices. Except in limited circumstances, the U.S. does not allow pre-trial detentions. But according to figures compiled by the U.S. State Department, 38% of individuals held in Italian prisons in 2005 were awaiting trial or the outcome of an appeal, while Spanish law allows for pre-trial detentions that can last as long as four years for terrorism suspects. In the U.S., the Posse Comitatus Act forbids the use of the military in law-enforcement work, and paramilitary units are relatively rare. By contrast, most European countries deploy huge paramilitary forces: Italy's Carabinieri; France's Gendarmerie Nationale; Spain's Guardia Civil.

Even Britain, which shares America's common law traditions, has been forced by Irish and now Islamist terrorism to resort to administrative detentions, trials without jury (the famous Diplock courts) and ubiquitous public surveillance. Wiretapping is authorized by the Home Secretary -- that is, a member of the government -- rather than an independent judge. In the early days of the Northern Irish "troubles," the government of Edward Heath placed some 2,000 suspects, without charge, in internment camps. Ironically, it was the decision to treat terrorists as ordinary criminals that led to the famous hunger strikes of Bobby Sands and his IRA crew.

All this calls into question the seriousness, if not the sincerity, of European complaints that under the Bush administration the U.S. has become a serial human-rights violator. Europeans have every right to be proud of civil servants like Mr. Bruguiere and a legal tradition that in many ways has been remarkably successful against terrorism. But that is not the American way, nor can it be if we intend to be true to a constitutional order of checks and balances, judicial review and a high respect for the rights of the accused. When President Bush declared a war on terror after 9/11, it was because he had no other realistic legal alternative. And when the rest of us make invidious comparisons between Europe and America, we should keep our fundamental differences in mind. There is no European 82nd Airborne, and there is no American Jean-Louis Bruguiere.

Madrid Bombing Trial Opened To Streaming Video (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

MADRID, Feb. 18 — On the opening day of Spain's trial of 29 men accused in the deadly Madrid train bombings, police officers ringed the maximum-security brick courtroom while a helicopter whirled overhead.

But with the click of a computer mouse, anyone can peek inside the inner sanctum for a glimpse of Spanish judges in black robes with white lace cuffs facing suspects barricaded behind bulletproof glass.

That YouTube-style window has been opened by a high-tech legal services company, Datadiar, which is streaming live coverage of the trial on its Web site, datadiar.com, and posting archived video testimony that began with the appearance on Thursday of the first suspect, Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, known as Muhammad the Egyptian

Datadiar has struck an alliance with the tribunal, the Audiencia Nacional, which has opened the courtroom wide to cameras. Four are posted at various angles in the court, and a fifth shows documents presented as evidence.

Forty-three microphones are scattered among the tables of the lawyers, and recordings are stored on DVDs.

With that fly-on-the-wall technology, Datadiar, a 10-year-old company on the outskirts of Madrid, is offering a courtroom version of C-Span, the American cable channel that covers government proceedings without commentary. The rare running view of what stands to be a legal marathon is of keen interest to a nation still haunted by questions about who set off the bombs on March 11, 2004, killing 191 and wounding nearly 2,000 on four commuter trains.

Datadiar hopes to introduce similar models in other countries at a time when there is renewed interest in opening up the courts. In the United States, for example, a Senate bill was introduced last month by Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, to permit cameras at most federal court proceedings.

Canada has just started a pilot project to test cameras in the courtroom in a prominent murder case. And in California, a judge said on Friday that he would allow full television coverage of the rock producer Phil Spector's murder trial, declaring that it was time to discard "fear of cameras in the courtroom."

Cristina Cortijo, a Datadiar managers and the wife of its founder, José Manuel Díaz-Arias, said: "We believe this issue is a very important one in the world, and people are looking at us. It's critical that people know that our company is doing this objectively with real-time transmissions and no cuts. And it's for free."

Datadiar is not being paid by the government to stream the trial, according to Ms. Cortijo, who said permission was granted by the presiding judge in the case, Javier Gómez Bermúdez.

In court, the judge strikes a brisk, no-nonsense manner with the lawyers, suspects and Arabic translators, but he seems comfortable and conscious of the informal jury of the public. He is an author of a new manual for legal journalism, "Lifting the Veil," and he regularly strides into the press room to take brief questions from an overflow crowd of journalists who are covering the case in an adjoining area by watching giant plasma TV screens.

In a brief interview during a trial break, Judge Gómez Bermúdez said the national court chose to open the bombing trial to broad viewing because "there are so many victims, and they can't all fit in here."

Critics of live courtroom coverage often cite the O. J. Simpson murder trial in California as an example of how a constant camera presence can turn a legal proceeding into a media circus.

But Judge Gómez Bermudez scoffed at the idea that such coverage might influence the trial, and said that Spanish courts had been receptive to cameras for some time.

A verdict in the train-bombing case is not expected until October, after the testimony of more 100 experts and 600 witnesses. There are also nearly 90,000 pages of documents, some which will be instantly accessible to the public through Datadiar.

The company's usual audience consists of members of the Spanish professional class: judges, lawyers and accountants who pay more than $2,500 a year for a subscription to Globalius, a Datadiar database of legal information made available on a portable flash drive.

But with the start of the trial, Datadiar's commercial director, Rosa Martínez Casas, said the company was beginning to reach a global audience.

To maintain its neutrality, Datadiar has avoided creating chat forums in connection with the legal issues that it is raising. The site does offer a series of primers to explain elements of the legal process, like the concept of the presumption of innocence. It also has a seating diagram of the courtroom and the 46 defense lawyers, prosecutors and translators.

In the last 10 years, investors have plowed more than $65 million into the company, which did not break even until 2003. It is now turning a profit, Ms. Cortijo said.

So far, Datadiar has not sought advertising for the legal information it is offering on its portal, but that is an alternative under discussion, she said, in addition to the company's subscription model, for creating similar court coverage in other countries.

Ms. Cortijo said it was too early to calculate how much it would cost Datadiar to offer the free streaming video online, although she said that new technology had helped reduce costs.

"It may be difficult to understand why we do this for free," she said. "We are objective. We are in the middle. We are only lawyers and professionals, and offering information. It's not like television."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

A Nuclear Headache (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

It was one of the first major scares after September 11. In October 2001, a CIA agent told the government al Qaeda had smuggled a nuclear bomb into New York City and intended to detonate it. A covert search team from the Department of Energy was dispatched to search for the weapon. It was never found, but the incident worried the administration so much that Vice President Dick Cheney and several hundred federal employees holed up in a bunker for weeks, just in case a twin attack leveled Washington.

Such fears still resonate. Department of Homeland Security Chief Michael Chertoff's virtual battle cry is that he wants to focus DHS's resources on preventing the most catastrophic attacks. Nuclear bombs are the rare weapon that can kill hundreds of thousands. And experts say the unleashing of a dirty bomb-a conventional explosive laced with radioactive material-could sicken thousands of people and cause unparalleled economic damage. So it's not surprising that DHS and New York-area authorities are planning an aggressive approach in coming months: They'll surround Manhattan with radiation detectors they hope can sniff out a weapon before it does harm. But it's an ambitious, expensive effort, and critics worry they're going too far, too fast.

Trying to protect against nuclear threats is hardly new. The Department of Energy created SWAT-like search teams in 1974 after, in what turned out to be an elaborate hoax, a man in Boston threatened to detonate a nuclear weapon unless the government gave him $200,000. After 9/11, detection moved to the open: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has installed 321 radiation detectors in U.S. seaports and has used smaller devices to help secure the last three Super Bowl games. Officials in New York City have at least 700 hand-held radiation detectors-with good reason. "Because dirty bombs can be made from readily available devices used in hospitals and construction sites," says Ivan Oelrich, a nuclear physicist with the Federation of American Scientists, "there's really no good explanation why this [sort of attack] hasn't happened yet."

Freeway. Today's detection efforts, however, are limited by technology. Many machines now in use must be driven through-at about 5 mph-to produce a reading. And the vast majority of machines can't distinguish between harmful and harmless, naturally occurring radiation. Still, DHS's current approach has been quietly gaining speed in the past year. Five months ago, the department's Domestic Nuclear Detection Office launched a pilot project to add nuclear detectors to 18-wheeler weigh stations in nine southeastern states. "Kentucky might not necessarily be the target," explains Mary Pedersen with the state's Office of Homeland Security, "but chances are it's on the way." Her state, which is crisscrossed by 70,000 semi-trucks each day, currently has detectors in weigh stations on two interstates. She estimates that within two years it will be hard for most trucks to drive very far into Kentucky on any freeway without a radiation scan.

The New York model builds on that effort, but it will touch everyone on the road. NYPD Commissioner Raymond Kelly says the plan is to create a "ring of radiation detectors" roughly 50 miles outside Manhattan's border. Vehicles that trigger alarms can be stopped and searched, before they reach the city. Among the ideas being weighed: using covert detectors hidden inside SUVs to take radiation readings of cars in nearby lanes.

History's Troubling Lessons (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

The alarm over nuclear terrorism isn't new. In December 1945, a scant four months after an atomic explosion leveled Hiroshima, the United States was already anticipating the end of its nuclear monopoly. It was only a matter of time, scientists and generals knew, before other nations, particularly the Soviet Union, mastered the atom bomb.

So with that eventuality in mind, a group of nervous congressmen sought counsel from the father of the atom bomb, Robert Oppenheimer, about the possibility of a surprise nuclear attack. Chief among their concerns was that a bomb could be smuggled into a major American city and detonated without warning.

Prescient. Transcripts of that hearing, obtained from the National Archives, reveal a startlingly prescient debate on the Sisyphean challenge of homeland security. In one exchange, Colorado Sen. Eugene Millikin presses Oppenheimer about how to find a bomb hidden in a city:

Sen. Millikin: We... have mine-detecting devices, which are rather effective... I was wondering if anything of that kind might be available to use as a defense against that particular type of use of atomic bombs.

Dr. Oppenheimer: If you hired me to walk through the cellars of Washington to see whether there were atomic bombs, I think my most important tool would be a screwdriver to open the crates and look. I think that just walking by, swinging a little gadget would not give me the information.

That candid assessment shocked the senators, who then asked the Atomic Energy Commission to examine the problem. In the early 1950s, two top physicists, Robert Hofstadter and Wolfgang Panofsky, a veteran of the Manhattan Project team that built the atomic bomb, produced a still-classified assessment, which came to be known as the Screwdriver Report.

Panofsky, now the director emeritus of the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center, says the assignment was to detect 1 cubic inch of highly enriched uranium or plutonium hidden inside a crate and smuggled across a land border. "The conclusions of that report are still valid because the laws of physics have not changed one bit," Panofsky tells U.S. News. "You still can't detect a nuclear device unless you are, say, 10 feet away from it-and even then it can be quite easily shielded."

Not everyone completely agrees; Department of Homeland Security officials say new state-of-the-art detectors can do a much better job than that. But the basic point is still valid-and alarming. Radioactive material emits less radiation with distance from its source. Despite the Screwdriver Report's conclusions, though, the government back then began a covert pilot program at selected airports and seaports to scan for radioactivity. The short-lived "Cyclops Project" had a poor record of success, according to Panofsky and historian Gregg Herken, author of Brotherhood of the Bomb. In fact, says Panofsky, the only thing that the Cyclops system discovered was a woman at a New York airport who tried to evade customs by taping 200 wristwatches with radioactively luminescent dials to the inside of her corset.

New Federal Rules For Chemical Plants Criticized (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — New government rules seeking to thwart terrorist attacks on chemical plants are facing stiff opposition from state leaders, environmentalists and others who say the regulations are flawed, vague and unlikely to protect the public.

The rules, which are scheduled to take effect in April, are the culmination of a five-year government debate about how to prevent a toxic attack at any of the nation's chemical facilities. Such an attack could release a cloud of poison over a densely populated area and kill thousands.

"The regulations are seriously flawed and could have a very harmful impact," Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., wrote to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff this month.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke says the department is reviewing the complaints and will work with plant managers, state officials and other groups to address their concerns.

Federal security requirements will be tailored for each plant and could range from more fences and lighting to improved storage facilities. Companies that don't meet the new requirements will face fines of up to $25,000 per day, Knocke says, "or even an order to cease operation."

Last year, Congress gave Chertoff authority over chemical plant security because of post-9/11 fears that terrorists could target a plant. The new rules would apply to any building or area where deadly chemicals are made, used or stored.

Lawmakers and various groups with an interest in chemical security complain that the new rules:

•Violate states' rights.

In New Jersey, state lawmakers in 2005 passed stricter chemical security rules than those set to take effect at the federal level.

The federal rules, however, would invalidate the New Jersey rules, in effect weakening chemical security in that state, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine says.

"Federal standards are necessary," says Corzine, a Democrat. But federal rules must not "limit states' abilities to take further action to protect our own citizens."

Knocke says the nation must have uniform security policies. "State laws cannot and should not conflict with federal authorities," he says.

•Are too vague.

The American Chemistry Council, which represents nearly 90% of the nation's chemical plants, complains that Homeland Security has not been clear enough about how it will determine which plants fall into the high-risk categories and will be required to put tighter — and potentially costly — security in place. "We need a clear understanding as to who this applies to," ACC President Jack Gerard says.

•Don't require chemical companies to look into using safer chemicals.

If companies were required to use less dangerous chemicals, says Greenpeace toxics director Rick Hind, they could "eliminate 9/11-magnitude risks that communities living within 14 miles of a chemical plant face each day."

Dems To Push Subway Safety (USAT)

Transit systems 'ripe, easy targets'

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats now in charge of homeland security are pushing ahead with legislation to tighten security in the nation's subways and other mass-transit systems.

"These are ripe, easy targets," says Senate banking and urban affairs committee Chairman Chris Dodd, D-Conn. "Commuters shouldn't have to play Russian roulette when they get on the train in the morning."

Dodd became chairman of the panel when Democrats took control of Congress on Jan. 4. His committee has approved legislation authorizing $3.5 billion over the next three years on transit security. The committee oversees mass transit.

The House Homeland Security Committee also is holding hearings. Chairman Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., says his panel's legislation will mandate more training for transit workers, whistle-blower protection for those who reveal security lapses, increased screening at stations and federal grants for mass-transit security.

Thompson says there's no way to screen everyone who uses the nation's transit systems. However, "given the number of people who travel every day on our rail system, we just can't ignore it any longer," he says.

Kip Hawley, head of the Department of Homeland Security's Transportation Security Administration (TSA), says the funding disparity is not what it seems because aviation security is funded entirely by the federal government and transit security is funded largely by industries and local governments.

The TSA is just "as concerned with stopping (a transit attack) as we are with an aviation threat," he says.

Subway operators, counterterrorism experts and mayors say it's about time Congress focused on transit security after five years of massive government spending on aviation security. "Transit has been drastically short-changed," says Elliot Sander, director of New York City's Metropolitan Transit Authority. "The absence of adequate federal funding for transit security is putting transit in a place where it has to make agonizing choices over ensuring passengers' safety."

Transit officials say the federal government needs to set standards for training and technology used to protect commuter rail and subway systems. They say they need more officers and bomb-sniffing dogs; more cameras and sensors; better evacuation plans and drills; and construction money to shore up tunnels, install lights and build barriers and fences for rail yards.

"No sector of our transportation network has been more neglected when it comes to security than transit," Warren George, president of the 180,000-member Amalgamated Transit Union, told the Senate this month. "The deficiency in security funding for this industry is staggering."

Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., former chairman of the banking committee, calls Homeland Security's investment in transit security "woefully inadequate."

Despite plots against New York's subway and terrorist attacks on transit systems in Madrid, London and Mumbai, India, the government has sunk $24 billion into aviation security and less than $500 million into transit security since 9/11, according to the Senate banking committee.

"This is not an appropriate balance," Dodd says.

Making Martial Law Easier (NYT)

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

A disturbing recent phenomenon in Washington is that laws that strike to the heart of American democracy have been passed in the dead of night. So it was with a provision quietly tucked into the enormous defense budget bill at the Bush administration's behest that makes it easier for a president to override local control of law enforcement and declare martial law.

The provision, signed into law in October, weakens two obscure but important bulwarks of liberty. One is the doctrine that bars military forces, including a federalized National Guard, from engaging in law enforcement. Called posse comitatus, it was enshrined in law after the Civil War to preserve the line between civil government and the military. The other is the Insurrection Act of 1807, which provides the major exemptions to posse comitatus. It essentially limits a president's use of the military in law enforcement to putting down lawlessness, insurrection and rebellion, where a state is violating federal law or depriving people of constitutional rights.

The newly enacted provisions upset this careful balance. They shift the focus from making sure that federal laws are enforced to restoring public order. Beyond cases of actual insurrection, the president may now use military troops as a domestic police force in response to a natural disaster, a disease outbreak, terrorist attack or to any "other condition."

Changes of this magnitude should be made only after a thorough public airing. But these new presidential powers were slipped into the law without hearings or public debate. The president made no mention of the changes when he signed the measure, and neither the White House nor Congress consulted in advance with the nation's governors.

There is a bipartisan bill, introduced by Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Christopher Bond, Republican of Missouri, and backed unanimously by the nation's governors, that would repeal the stealthy revisions. Congress should pass it. If changes of this kind are proposed in the future, they must get a full and open debate.

Justice For The Forgotten Internees (WP)

By Xavier Becerra And Dan Lungren

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Art Shibayama is an American who served in the Army during the Korean War. Like many veterans, Cpl. Shibayama was not born in the United States. He was born in Lima, Peru, to Japanese Peruvian parents. Until 1942, Shibayama, his two brothers and three sisters lived comfortably with their parents and grandparents, all of whom had thriving businesses. However, after America entered World War II, his family was forcibly removed from Peru, transported to the United States and held in a government-run internment camp in Crystal City, Tex.

Like many Japanese American families, Shibayama's family lost everything they owned. But the greater injustice occurred when his grandparents were sent to Japan in exchange for American prisoners of war. Their family never saw them again.

Shibayama and his family were among the estimated 2,300 people of Japanese descent from 13 Latin American countries who were taken from their homes and forcibly transported to the Crystal City camp during World War II. The U.S. government orchestrated and financed the deportation of Japanese Latin Americans for use in prisoner-of-war exchanges with Japan. Eight hundred people were sent across the Pacific, while the remaining Japanese Latin Americans were held in camps without due process until after the war ended.

Further study of the events surrounding the deportation and incarceration of Japanese Latin Americans is merited and necessary. While most Americans are aware of the internment of Japanese Americans, few know about U.S. government activities in other countries that were fueled by prejudice against people of Japanese ancestry.

That is why we have introduced H.R. 662, the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Latin Americans of Japanese Descent Act. We should review U.S. military and State Department directives requiring the relocation, detention and deportation of Japanese Latin Americans to Axis countries. Then we should recommend appropriate remedies. It is the right thing to do to affirm our commitment to democracy and the rule of law.

This year marks the 26th anniversary of the formation of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, whose findings led to the Civil Liberties Act of 1988. It provided an official apology and financial redress to most of the Japanese Americans who were subjected to wrongdoing and confined in camps during World War II. Those loyal Americans were vindicated by the fact that not a single documented case of sabotage or espionage was committed by a Japanese American during that time. This act was the culmination of a half-century of struggle to bring justice to those who were denied it. But work to rectify and close this regrettable chapter in our nation's history remains unfinished.

U.S. involvement in the expulsion and internment of people of Japanese descent who lived in various Latin American countries is thoroughly recorded in government files. These civilians were robbed of their freedom -- their civil and human rights thrown by the wayside -- as they were kidnapped from nations not directly involved in World War II. The Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians acknowledged these federal actions in detaining and interning civilians of enemy or foreign nationality, particularly those of Japanese ancestry, but the commission failed to fully examine and report on the historical documents that exist in distant archives.

Today, the Day of Remembrance, marks the anniversary of the 1942 signing of Executive Order 9066 -- the document that made it possible to intern thousands of Japanese Americans, German Americans, Italian Americans and Japanese Latin Americans during World War II. Though it is important that we remember what took place, it is more critical that we act, for justice delayed is justice denied. And for the dwindling number of surviving internees who became Americans, such as Cpl. Art Shibayama, justice has been delayed far too long. They deserve our attention, our respect and the official recognition of a country that is willing to heal and to make amends.

Hurricane Suits May Be Settled Soon (USAT)

By Kathy Chu, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

165 Louisiana homeowners awaiting first payments

The first major insurance settlement involving a group of hurricane-damaged homes in Louisiana is in its final stages and could be announced as soon as in a week or two, according to the attorney for the homeowners who sued.

The likely multimillion-dollar deal would cover about 165 homeowners insured by Louisiana Citizens — the state-created insurer of last resort — in Cameron Parish, where the 2005 hurricanes reduced homes to slabs, says Jennifer Jones, the homeowners' lawyer.

Jones cautioned that the settlement could still be scuttled. But if it succeeds, it could provide a model for resolving hundreds other such cases in the state. The deal would not affect thousands of homes damaged by the New Orleans levee breach after Hurricane Katrina.

Separately, State Farm, the largest insurer in Louisiana, has made two offers to settle 135 Cameron Parish cases involving homes reduced to rubble, says Jones, the parish's assistant district attorney. Jones rejected both offers, she says, because they'd provide too little money for homeowners. The second one was modeled after a proposed class-action settlement offer made recently to Mississippi coastal homeowners. Jones expects to meet with State Farm again in early March.

State Farm confirms it's negotiating with Jones and says it's "optimistic" about a settlement. Terry Lisotta, CEO of Louisiana Citizens, declined to comment on any settlement talks, saying, "We don't discuss open litigation."

"Right now, (insurers are) concentrating on Cameron Parish because there are a manageable number of claims," Jones says. "If I get a settlement for my homeowners, insurers could settle on the same cases" in other hard-hit Louisiana parishes.

Jones says she's "satisfied" so far with preliminary terms offered by Louisiana Citizens to settle cases in Cameron Parish and expects the insurer — which has nearly 10% of the homeowners' market in the state — to finalize the offer as early as next week.

Jones says Louisiana Citizens asked her not to disclose financial details of the proposed settlement because of ongoing negotiations. But she believes that the settlement "is going to be more than" the last offer made by State Farm — which she estimates at $2 million to $3 million — for its own Cameron Parish policyholders.

Homeowners' attorneys, including Jones, say insurers seem more willing to settle slab cases since a January court ruling. In that case, a federal judge said State Farm couldn't deny a Mississippi couple's claim if it couldn't prove whether wind or water caused damage.

Homeowner policies cover wind; only federal policies cover flooding. State Farm and other insurers sometimes deny payout if both wind and water hit a home.

Some attorneys fear that even if insurers settle cases of wiped-out homes in one Louisiana parish, other homeowners won't necessarily get the same relief.

"The most remarkable thing about the insurance experience for homeowners is the inconsistency (by insurers) in deciding who to pay and how much," says Anthony Fernandez, a lawyer for Louisiana homeowners in coastal St. Bernard's Parish.

Katrina 'Voluntourists' Make Labor A Vacation (USAT)

By Larry Copeland, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

Across the USA, people feel a pull to help Gulf Coast

DOJ_NMG_0133551

BILOXI, Miss. — Scott Shattuck, a pharmacy manager from Vancouver, Wash., is in Mississippi on vacation. But by day, he's more likely to be found "mucking out" a house damaged by Hurricane Katrina or painting a children's clinic than hitting the casinos or walking the beach.

"This is not a vacation in the sense of doing all the touristy stuff," says Shattuck, 33, here with a group of 30 volunteers from Kaiser Permanente. "You're here to do work for the community, and when you're done, you can have your free time."

Shattuck and his group, who also helped out in the New Orleans area, are among the massive wave of volunteers — half a million, by one estimate — who have come here from across the nation in the nearly 18 months since Katrina struck.

In storm-ravaged Mississippi, their impact has been immeasurable. From Pascagoula in the east to Bay St. Louis in the west, these volunteers have been the one positive constant for residents who have battled through lengthy power outages, mosquito infestations, stuffy FEMA trailers, recalcitrant insurers and an often molasses-slow government bureaucracy.

"They built our community back," D'Iberville Mayor Rusty Quave says. "Without those volunteer groups, we would be just starting. Our houses would be like some of the parishes in Louisiana where there are 10,000 houses that have not been mucked out."

That might seem strong praise in a state where the Federal Emergency Management Agency had spent $857 million through Feb. 5 — just over $50.4 million a month since Katrina — and where the Small Business Administration had issued $2.06 billion in low-interest loans for people to rebuild their homes. But about 80,000 people still live in FEMA trailers.

Almost to a person, Mississippians agree that the volunteers, many of them from religious organizations, have been the spur for their recovery. "We wouldn't even have a coast if it wasn't for them," Pass Christian Mayor Chipper McDermott says.

With their purchases of food and T-shirts, sneakers and blue jeans at restaurants and stores throughout the Gulf Coast region, the volunteers helped keep the local economy afloat in the weeks and months after the storm. They helped revive the region's vital tourism industry by blowing off steam at night in the bars, casinos and restaurants.

Volunteers have been so critical to the Magnolia State's ongoing recovery that a term has been coined to capture their duality. "Voluntourists," they're calling them here.

"They've had a tremendous impact," says Stephen Richer, executive director of the Mississippi Gulf Coast Convention and Visitors Bureau, who estimates that 500,000 volunteers have come here since Katrina flattened the coast on Aug. 29, 2005. "When I look at the people all of us have been dealing with on a day-to-day basis, they are the one group that has brought nothing but hope."

Shattuck, who also manages a pediatric department in Vancouver, is clearly a newcomer to Mississippi: He rhymes the middle syllable of Biloxi with "box" instead of with "lux" as the locals do.

He was drawn to the Gulf Coast by the need he sensed here.

"It seemed like after the immediate coverage, it kind of faded away," he says. "Seeing Spike Lee's documentary (on New Orleans), When the Levees Broke, and media images here and there … made my heart hurt for the people here. There was a tremendous urgency to come down here to do a job for the people that need help."

Shattuck says his wife, Melissa, was fully supportive when he told her he was taking a week of vacation to come here. She would have come, too, but stayed behind to care for their 3-year-old son and 8-month-old daughter.

His vacation is far from posh. He lives with about 100 other volunteers in a big room at Beauvoir Methodist Church, Mississippi headquarters for Hands On Gulf Coast, an Atlanta-based volunteer organization that also has a New Orleans branch.

Short-term volunteers such as Shattuck sleep on cramped bunk beds in a barracks-like setting or in big Army tents out back. They shower outdoors. Hands On serves them breakfast, usually oatmeal, pancakes, eggs, fruit salad and cereal. Dinner might be jambalaya, fajitas or spaghetti: "Something with a lot of carbs, real easy to make and can feed a lot of people," says Chris deVeer, director of Hands On Gulf Coast.

He says it's not unusual "for people to come for a week or two and still be here three or four months later. It's a life-changing experience. We connect people with people who need help, but it changes both sets of lives."

Along with religious organizations, college students have been the backbone of the state's volunteer effort, and officials on the coast expect thousands of them during the upcoming spring break.

DOJ_NMG_0133552

"We have a surge already booked up," says Betty Robinson, spokeswoman for the city of Waveland. "In March, April and the first of May, and again in the summer, we'll see a lot of college students."

The Beau Rivage Resort and Casino here, which recently completed a $550 million, post-Katrina renovation, is a world removed from the storm-blighted reality outside.

To anyone strolling among the resort's 11 restaurants, extensive shopping and bustling casino floor, the storm's devastation seems far away. It's easy to see why a volunteer might want to escape here for a few hours after a long day of cleaning muck out of a house.

"We absolutely have people staying with us that are here helping," says Mary Cracchiolo, a spokeswoman for the resort. "People are coming to help, and taking time to enjoy the area attractions."

It's probably impossible to measure the economic impact of "voluntourism" on Mississippi, says Richer, who tracks such things.

"What they spend is small," he says. "As to what they bring, what's the value of hope? What's the value of this house they left behind? The dollar value is probably a small part of what they brought. The overall impact is in the multiple millions. Say their labor is worth $10 an hour, and assuming they all work at least 40 hours a week, you're talking multiple millions of dollars."

Much of the evidence is anecdotal, says Beth Carriere, executive director of Mississippi's West Coast-Hancock County Tourism Development Bureau. "In the beginning, the volunteers were the only customers here for whatever business was open," she says. "Whatever was open, they utilized it. Lord, I don't know what we would have done without them. Now that the hotels are open, they're flying in, staying in hotels and doing volunteer work."

Bruce Frallic, executive director of Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport, says voluntourists make up 15%-20% of the airport's passenger traffic. "The voluntourism really took off sometime around November 2005 and was just intense for the following year," Frallic says. "They were probably 30% of our passenger traffic" then.

Pam Meinzinger, general manager of Prime Outlets at Gulfport, a 65-store mall, says the voluntourists helped the stores there remain open during the leanest period and are still important customers.

"They're just kind of becoming a part of the community," she says. "They're a big part of our customer base. The northern volunteers usually need some summer clothes. They really do shop us quite a bit, at night. … They buy a lot of blue jeans and tennis shoes."

Now Mississippi is saying thanks. In January, during a brief appearance on NBC's Today show, Richer expressed the state's appreciation to the volunteers — and urged them to keep coming.

The city of D'Iberville will build a 26-acre park, tentatively called Good Samaritan Park. It will feature the flags of all 50 states, the state highway patrol, the National Guard and others. "We're planning it right now," Mayor Quave says.

Bruce Beckham is executive director of Tourism Cares for America, a non-profit group that brought 330 tourism industry volunteers to Mississippi last year. He says that since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, many Americans have felt compelled to "go beyond their vacation" by volunteering.

"They're not doing it out of guilt," he says. "They feel that's what their responsibility as a human being is."

John Edmiston, Kaiser Permanente's national community relations manager, says the company had nearly 300 applicants for the 30 slots on the week-long Gulf Coast trip, all of them willing to give up a week's vacation.

Sometimes volunteers come for a week and find themselves pulled back. "They come here and build something," Frallic says. "They've contributed their blood, sweat and tears to this community, and as a result, they want to come back and see how things are going."

Maureen Gatto, 53, a lawyer from Bucks County, Pa., near Philadelphia, came to Hancock County for a week in April 2006 with about 25 other lawyers and friends.

"It was a typical group," she says. "We were gutting houses, helping out. When I got back home, I felt a very strong pull back to Mississippi, and I couldn't shake it. I gave it a month, thinking that do-gooder feeling would wash off. When it didn't, I said, 'Whatever it takes, I'm going to go down.' "

DOJ_NMG_0133553

Gatto returned to Bay St. Louis last August for a two-year stay. She is now the Mississippi coordinator of the Bucks-Mont Katrina Project, which has built a day care center in Bay St. Louis and breaks ground next month on an animal shelter. "I don't think I'll be here permanently," she says. "My whole family is in the northeastern United States."

Sometimes, volunteers come back. Sometimes, they fall in love.

Randy May, 58, says he drove from Austin to Pass Christian within a few days of Katrina. He's been there ever since, working as a coordinator of volunteers for a Baptist group from Indiana and Kentucky.

"I had a good life in Texas," he says. "I'm a horse-shoer and golf instructor. But I had to come here."

Two weeks after he got to Mississippi, May met Deborah Yawn, 56, of Jackson. She had been volunteering in Long Beach.

"She came to the Pass looking for (volunteer) work," May says, "and two weeks later, I married her."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Militants Launch Attack On U.S. Outpost (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 — In a rare coordinated assault on an American combat outpost north of Baghdad, suicide bombers drove one or more cars laden with explosives into the compound on Monday, while other insurgents opened fire in the ensuing chaos, according to witnesses and the American military. Two American soldiers were killed and at least 17 were wounded.

The brazen attack, which was followed by gun battles and an evacuation of the wounded by American helicopters, was almost surely the work of Sunni militants, most likely Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, according to American and Iraqi officials.

It appeared to be part of a renewed drive by insurgents in recent weeks as more American and Iraqi troops flood the streets of Baghdad and thousands of marines head to western Anbar Province to try to stem the violence. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in a recent wave of car bombings in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Insurgents have been able to shoot down more helicopters through coordinated assaults, captured documents suggest, and American and Iraqi military officials say they are concerned that militants are moving to areas where the American troop presence remains thin.

As the Iraqi government and the American military struggled to build public trust in the security forces, a Sunni woman publicly charged that she had been raped by members of the largely Shiite National Police, causing a furor.

The assault on the American outpost, situated in the heart of a town called Tarmiya, was unusual because militants had largely avoided direct assaults on heavily fortified American positions. A similar attack occurred last summer, when a suicide driver plowed a truck full of explosives into a military outpost near the town of Baghdadi, in Anbar Province, but that did not seem as coordinated as Monday's assault.

Shortly before dawn, suicide bombers drove at least one and possibly as many as three cars laden with explosives into the outer perimeter of the outpost. Witnesses said there were two explosions then a brief pause before another bomber drove his vehicle into the building, a former police station.

Sometime during the assault a gas storage container exploded, sending black smoke billowing into the sky as militants laid siege to the outpost, firing on the Americans from multiple directions, according to an Iraqi official and local residents. As the gun battle raged, at least four American helicopters swept overhead to evacuate the wounded soldiers. There were no reports of how many militants were killed.

The witnesses were reached by telephone and related their accounts only on the condition of anonymity, saying they feared for their lives. The accounts of the witnesses, some of whom live next door to the outpost, could not be independently verified. In a statement, the American military confirmed only the casualty figures and said at least one car bomb was involved in the attack.

Militants usually attack American bases by firing mortars from a distance, using snipers to wait for targets of opportunity, or planting explosive devices on roads frequented by Americans. Iraqi police and army stations, on the other hand, have come under frequent assault by suicide bombers.

DOJ_NMG_0133554

There is evidence that Shiite militia leaders are lying low and heading to strongholds in the south during the security crackdown, but attacks by Sunni militants seem to be intensifying. In addition to the assault in Tarmiya, militants on Monday struck at Iraqi security forces and government officials near Kirkuk, Ramadi and Tikrit, and attacked civilians near Falluja.

A family of 13 was killed on the road leading to Falluja, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad, because its members were from a tribe known to oppose Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, witnesses said.

The family, including an elderly woman and two small boys, was dragged out of a minibus, lined up and shot. The bodies remained on the highway for hours because people were afraid they would be ambushed if they collected the dead, witnesses said.

The family was part of the Albu Farag tribe, which has made an alliance with the Anbar Salvation Council. The council has been trying to undermine the militants, and its leader, Abdul Satar Abu Risha, was himself the target of an assassination attempt on Monday when a suicide bomber drove into his home in Ramadi. He survived, but five of his guards were killed.

The attack on the Tarmiya outpost came as American troops moved into similar stations throughout Baghdad for the first time since the early months after the 2003 invasion. Monday's attack underscored the inherent risks in the new strategy.

The Americans entered Tarmiya after the local police force collapsed in December, following a campaign of intimidation by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, according to the military and residents.

Until the police force collapsed, the Americans had been only an occasional presence in the town of 25,000, sending soldiers to conduct patrols with the Iraqis from a nearby base. Over the past two years, residents said, Sunni militants have been a constant presence. In addition to attacking the security forces, they have pushed nearly all the Shiites out of the once-mixed community.

The outpost, established in the abandoned police headquarters in the center of the town, was fortified by large blast walls. Americans typically keep one company of about 100 soldiers at such outposts.

By nightfall, American forces had sealed off all entrances to the town and imposed a curfew, leaving residents worried that they would be cut off from basic supplies.

In the west of the country, three marines and an Army soldier were killed over the weekend, the United States military said Monday.

Even as Iraqis and Americans stepped up security efforts in Baghdad on Monday, a day after bombs killed 61 people in a downtown market, there were at least three bombings and one mortar attack that killed 11 people, Iraqi officials said.

There was also an increase in the number of bodies found around the city after a brief lull, officials said. At least 20 bodies showing signs of torture were found on the streets of the capital on Monday.

The American military released statements asserting a number of successes in combating both Sunni militants and Shiite militia groups.

An Iraqi unit, aided by American advisers, caught militants in the act of constructing devices known as explosively formed projectiles in a house in Hilla, south of Baghdad, on Saturday, according to the American military. The explosive devices have proved especially lethal to American troops in recent months, and both military commanders and the White House have pointed to Iran as the source of a component essential in making the devices.

The renewed security campaign will rely on winning the trust of the population, and that effort may have been dealt a blow on Monday night, when a woman said on Al Jazeera, the Arabic-language satellite channel, that she had been kidnapped and raped by members of the Iraqi National Police.

The woman, a Sunni, said three members of the National Police stormed into her home in the Amil neighborhood of Baghdad on Sunday while her husband was away, accused her of cooking for militants and took her to a police garrison where the assault occurred.

Although the woman did not say her attackers were Shiites, the National Police is believed to be dominated by Shiites, including elements of the militias that have infiltrated its ranks.

Sunni politicians rushed to condemn the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and the security crackdown, while some Shiite officials questioned the woman's account.

DOJ_NMG_0133555

The woman said she was treated by Americans, but a spokesman for the American military said he had no knowledge of the case. An Iraqi nurse who said she had treated the woman supported her account.

Rape victims rarely come forward in Muslim countries, making the public airing of the account highly unusual.

Aware of the highly charged nature of the woman's claims, Mr. Maliki's office quickly released a statement last night calling for a full investigation and "the severest punishment" for anyone involved.

Brazen Pre-Dawn Attack On U.S. Outpost In Iraq Kills 3, Injures 17 (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 -- A U.S. military facility north of Baghdad was targeted Monday by suicide bombers and other armed men who killed three American soldiers and wounded 17 in an unusually brazen attack.

The facility, a former Iraqi police station in the town of Tarmiyah, came under attack shortly before dawn, according to a witness and the spokesman for the local joint coordination center, Capt. Muhammad Awad.

Two suicide car bombers tore through the main gate and detonated their explosives, destroying part of the building, which the U.S. military took over after Iraqi policemen abandoned it last summer because they were threatened by Sunni extremists who control that area.

A gun battle between U.S. troops and armed men raged for about 20 minutes after the initial explosions, as helicopters from the large U.S. military base nearby in Taji rushed to the scene.

Minutes after wounded soldiers were airlifted from the facility, an improvised explosive device blew up about 500 yards away, apparently targeting a U.S. convoy that included a fuel tanker.

U.S. military facilities in Iraq are frequently targeted from a distance with rockets, mortar rounds and sniper fire. But the coordinated frontal attack -- which occurred as hundreds of American soldiers are being deployed to small, similarly vulnerable inner-city posts -- appeared to be a shift toward more aggressive tactics.

The U.S. military released a brief statement, disclosing only the number of casualties. The statement noted one suicide car bombing. Three U.S. military spokesmen said Monday they had no additional information.

"This was not a spontaneous attack," said Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman. "The matter is under investigation. It would be premature to release anything else."

He said he could not confirm the account provided by Iraqis.

Tarmiyah, with about 150,000 residents, lies on one of the crucial routes to Baghdad, and U.S. forces and Sunni insurgents affiliated with the group al-Qaeda in Iraq have fought vigorously for control of the area. Insurgents had strengthened their grip on the town in recent months after the U.S. military moved a significant number of troops from the area to Baghdad. An Iraqi police unit trained in Jordan deserted last year after being threatened by insurgents.

"This is what happens when you clear and begin to hold, but leave before you finish the hold-and-build process," a U.S. Army officer stationed nearby said Monday night, speaking on condition of anonymity. "We created a vacuum, and al-Qaeda filled it. We lost the people's trust."

The attack came less than a week after U.S. and Iraqi forces launched an ambitious security plan that has made the capital the war's focal point, raising the risk for troops stationed in outlying areas.

Sunni extremists have dramatically altered the fabric of the region in recent months, said a 35-year-old shop owner who lives across the street from the military outpost in Tarmiyah.

"You can no longer find someone selling cigarettes, and you won't find men selling women's underwear," he said, offering an example of strict Islamic codes enforced in the area. Women now cover everything but their eyes and "barbers can't offer modern haircuts," added the man, who confirmed the version of the attack provided by Iraqi officials.

Sunni insurgent attacks on U.S. forces have become increasingly sophisticated and effective in recent months.

"It is hard to judge what is happening in Tarmiyah," said retired Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who led a division north of the city in 2004 and 2005. "But for sure we should never underestimate our enemy."

DOJ_NMG_0133556

The U.S. military on Monday reported the deaths of seven other service members killed in recent days, including three soldiers who died Monday when a roadside bomb exploded while they were on patrol southwest of Baghdad. Also, three Marines and a soldier were killed in the western province of Anbar in fighting since Saturday, the military said.

On Monday, a Baghdad woman said she was sexually assaulted by an Iraqi Interior Ministry official after she was detained over the weekend.

Iraqi officials initially condemned the reported rape and vowed to hold the perpetrator responsible. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office, which issued a statement naming the woman, also promised to investigate. It is unclear why Maliki's office named her. The Washington Post does not identify reported victims of sexual crimes.

The woman is a Sunni, and the ministry is controlled by Shiites. Reports of rape are unusual in Iraq. The woman offered an emotional, detailed account in television interviews.

Hours after announcing the investigation, Maliki's office released another statement saying the woman's claims were determined to be unfounded. A spokesman said the report had been fabricated by Arab news stations to undermine the Baghdad security plan.

Insurgents Strike U.S. Outpost In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a fiery raid on a U.S. military outpost north of the Iraqi capital Monday, killing two U.S. troops and injuring 17 in a possible foreshadowing of attacks to come as a neighborhood-based Baghdad security plan takes shape.

Police and witnesses said insurgents thought to be Sunni Arabs used at least one suicide car bomber, mortar shells, rockets and small-arms fire in the attack in the agricultural town of Tarmiya.

Fighting sparked by the rare assault on a U.S. base lasted for hours and ended after U.S. fighter jets and ground reinforcements arrived.

Other attacks around Baghdad and western Iraq killed dozens of Iraqis, most of them Shiite Muslims. The U.S. military also reported the deaths of four more troops since Saturday.

The latest violence coincided with the U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown to bring order to the Baghdad area, in part by establishing small neighborhood bases like the one struck Monday.

The raid, as well as continued assaults on Shiite Muslim civilians, suggests insurgents may be attempting to undermine the security plan by attacking far-flung and lightly fortified outposts.

Although the Tarmiya base is not part of the Baghdad security plan, relatively isolated outposts like it are an integral part of the strategy devised by Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

The plan calls for troops to move into community bases to connect with residents and keep an eye on members of the Iraqi security forces, many of whom are seen as instruments of the country's sectarian war.

Tarmiya, a small Sunni agricultural town of 40,000 people along the west bank of the Tigris River about 25 miles north of Baghdad, has long been an insurgent stronghold. The U.S. base is a former Iraqi police station in the center of town. Iraqi police officials said Tarmiya's police were threatened, kidnapped and killed about two months ago.

Authorities said at least one suicide car bomber either rammed into or drove up beside two trucks carrying fuel into the base about 7:30 a.m., igniting an explosion that sent flames dozens of feet into the air.

"Our windows and doors were broken by the blast," said Mohammed Hiali, 22, who lives near the base. "We went out and we saw fire and thick smoke…. There were repeated explosions."

Insurgents then opened fire with rockets mounted on a truck and from a nearby building, Iraqi police officials said. Mortar shells and small-arms fire added to the confusion as U.S. fighter jets, helicopters and ground forces responded in a battle that raged until noon, witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0133557

U.S. helicopters landed at least five times to evacuate casualties, Iraqi police officials and witnesses said. At least five Iraqi civilians were injured in the crossfire, including a child who suffered a shrapnel wound to the stomach and was taken to a nearby clinic, said Saadi Mashadani, a grocery store owner in the area.

A group calling itself the Iraqi Islamic State, which has declared a Sunni government in several western and central provinces, claimed responsibility for the attack.

"A brave knight from the Martyrs Regiment and a member of the Iraqi Islamic State set off this morning to infiltrate his booby-trapped car inside Tarmiya police station, which was made into a military position by the crusaders," an Internet posting said.

The U.S. tactic of placing troops in small neighborhood bases in effect reverses the trend since 2004, when American forces redeployed into impenetrable bases on the outskirts of Iraqi cities, lowering their profile on Baghdad streets. The aim was to put Iraqi security forces in charge of the country.

Since that time, Sunni insurgents have become more effective. They are able to conduct sophisticated and well-armed attacks on high-profile targets.

The assault on the Tarmiya base comes at a time when Sunni insurgents have also stepped up their attacks on Shiites in marketplaces and in law enforcement. The tactics may be an attempt to goad Shiite militias back into the fight. At least for now, Shiite militias appear to have lowered their profile to avoid clashes with U.S. troops.

"We are giving orders to state soldiers in Baghdad state to confront the Safawid [Shiite] gangs and protect the Sunnis and their mosques," said a statement posted on the Internet on Feb. 15 that heralded the insurgents' campaign, which it dubbed Operation Dignity.

"We will escalate operations against the crusader occupation army and his tails in all states in order to deteriorate enemy morale," the statement said.

Insurgents launched attacks on Shiite civilians and Iraqi security forces throughout the day in Baghdad, with explosions occurring across the capital. U.S. fighter jets scoured the skies as ground forces continued aggressive raids and patrols that have tripped up Shiite militias and reduced the number of sectarian executions.

A bomb struck a crowded outdoor market in a poor, mostly Shiite district on the capital's southeast fringe, killing five people and injuring 28. A roadside bomb killed three police officers and injured two on patrol in the Zafaraniya neighborhood.

A suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed five people and injured 11 on a packed minibus in the mostly Shiite Karada neighborhood in Baghdad. Two roadside bombs that exploded near a downtown marketplace killed two people and injured 40.

As twilight fell, mortar rounds struck an often-targeted Shiite neighborhood south of the capital, killing at least one person and injuring at least a dozen, including women and children.

Two car bombs in western Al Anbar province targeted a Sunni tribal leader, Sheik Abdul-Sattar abu Risha, who opposed Sunni insurgent groups linked to Al Qaeda. Abu Risha escaped unharmed, but 13 people were killed and seven were wounded.

A car bomb in Mahmoudiya, 30 miles south of Baghdad, killed one person and injured four. A car bomb parked near the home of an Iraqi army commander in mostly Sunni Duluiya, about 55 miles north of the capital, killed five people and injured five.

Gunmen in Hawija, a Sunni town near the northern city of Kirkuk, killed two Iraqi soldiers.

Shiite militias, despite their lower level of activity, were also apparent. At least 20 bodies of Iraqi men were found in west Baghdad, which contains a number of heavily Sunni neighborhoods, police said.

British forces in Basra said they killed a gunman who opened fire on troops at a checkpoint in a suspected stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

Iraqis were riveted Monday night by a televised interview with a young woman who said she was raped by Iraqi troops. The teary-eyed woman, a Sunni Arab whose face was mostly covered, said Iraqi security forces searching her west Baghdad neighborhood as part of the security crackdown raped her Monday.

Iraqi officials said they were investigating the woman's allegation.

U.S. officials reported four additional combat deaths Monday. A Marine was killed Saturday, a soldier and a Marine were slain Sunday, and a Marine was killed Monday. All of the deaths were in Al Anbar, a stronghold of the Sunni insurgency.

Iraq Insurgents Attack U.S. Base (CHIT)

By James Janega

Chicago Tribune, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Insurgents staged a brazen daylight attack Monday on a U.S. compound north of Baghdad as a wave of violence in the capital undermined the 6-day-old security campaign conducted by Iraqi and U.S. forces.

In a sign of the sectarian tensions threatening the country, a Sunni woman appeared on television to say she had been raped by Iraqi national police, most of whom are Shiite. The charge was rejected by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, who called it "made-up noise."

Two U.S. soldiers were killed in the raid on the compound in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad. Three other soldiers died in an attack on their patrol southwest of Baghdad on Monday. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and a soldier in combat over the past three days in Anbar province, bringing the U.S. death toll to nine since Saturday.

The assault in Tarmiyah began with a suicide car bomber who ignited a fuel tank inside the walls of the U.S. compound. Insurgent gunmen then fired into the chaos that ensued.

Helicopters were dispatched from the nearby U.S. base at Taji to evacuate the wounded. The fighting lasted for hours and ended only after U.S. jets and ground reinforcements arrived at the besieged compound.

Besides the two U.S. soldiers killed, 17 were wounded, the military said. A group aligned with Al Qaeda in Iraq claimed responsibility for the attack.

There was violence in Baghdad as well, despite the new security effort concentrated there.

At least 11 people were reported killed in a mortar attack on a Shiite enclave and five died when a suicide attacker with an explosive belt boarded a bus bound for the mostly Shiite district of Karradah in central Baghdad, The Associated Press reported. About 9 miles northwest of Baghdad, gunmen stopped a minivan and killed all 13 people aboard.

Nearly 100 people have died in attacks in the Baghdad area in the last two days, mostly in areas that are predominantly Shiite. The worst violence occurred Sunday when two car bombs exploded in the Shiite neighborhood of the Baghdad al-Jadid, killing 62 people and injuring more than 130. That attack followed a lull in violence in the first four days of the security crackdown, known officially as "Impose the Law."

Sunnis have criticized the new security plan, saying they are being unfairly targeted. The Sunni woman's allegation that she was assaulted by three members of the national police fed Sunni apprehensions about "Impose the Law."

"This is one of the signs that this plan will fail like others before," said Sunni parliament member Mohammed al-Dyni, a critic of al-Maliki.

The rape allegations first appeared Monday in the Baghdad newspaper Azzaman and were repeated later on Al-Jazeera television. The veiled woman, wearing what appeared to be a hospital bracelet, described the ordeal in detail as she wept on camera.

The report prompted a swift denial by Prime Minister al-Maliki, who said the woman in question had been sought for arrest by Iraqi security forces, and that medical tests showed she had not been assaulted.

In a statement early Tuesday, al-Maliki declared: "The aim of this made-up noise—which is done by known political partisans—is to distort the 'Impose the Law' security plan and to tarnish our armed forces that are hunting down the terrorist organizations."

He added that the accused officers will be rewarded for enduring false accusations.

But the allegation and other Sunni grievances may pose a significant challenge to the security push.

"We hope the security plan will target those who violate the law," said parliament member Omer al-Jebouri, of the Iraqi Front for National Dialogue. "The previous plans did not succeed, and this plan, I don't think it will make more progress than the others, unless we stop the sectarian talk."

"Otherwise," he warned, "there will be huge problems in the country."

In other violence Monday:

DOJ_NMG_0133559

A suicide car bomber attacked a police checkpoint in the Sunni city of Ramadi in Anbar province, killing two Iraqi police officers, the U.S. military said. Shortly after, a second suicide car bomber struck a house near the checkpoint, wounding eight women and five children.

Five people, including a 6-year-old boy, were killed by a roadside bomb in the northern city of Tal Afar, local official Najim Abdullah said.

Tribune foreign correspondent Liz Sly and Nadeem Majeed in Baghdad contributed to this report, along with Tribune news services.

Car Bombs Kill At Least 11 In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 20, 2007

Car bombs killed at least 11 people in Baghdad on Tuesday as militants show increasing defiance to a major security operation in the capital.

A car rigged with explosives tore through a street in the Sadiyah district in southwestern Baghdad. At least six people were killed and 14 injured, police said.

The neighborhood is mixed between the majority Shiites and Sunnis, whose militant factions are blamed for many of the recent bombings and attacks.

Later, a suicide attacker drove a bomb-laden car into a vegetable market in the Shiite enclave of Dora in southern Baghdad. At least five people were killed and seven injured, police said.

The same market was targeted last month by three car bombs that killed 10 people.

More than 100 people have been killed in the Baghdad area since Sunday, when twin blasts in a market claimed 62 lives. U.S. and Iraqi forces last week launched a massive effort of house-to-house searches and checkpoints around Baghdad to try to cripple extremist factions.

Outside Baghdad, more than 100 people were hospitalized complaining of breathing problems after a truck carrying fuel tanks exploded north of Baghdad, police and medical officials said.

At least one person died in the blast near Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad, said Mohammad Abbas, an emergency room overseer at Kazmiyah Hospital.

People treated at Kazmiyah and other hospitals said they had trouble breathing and were vomiting, but the cause was not immediately known, he said. Among those hospitalized were dozens of children.

Chemical experts collected samples from the tanker and conducted air tests.

Military Says Attacks In Baghdad Have Dropped (USAT)

By Oren Dorell And Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — The number of extremist attacks in Baghdad has declined over the past two weeks since a new security plan took hold, although the relative lull may be short-lived, the U.S. military said Monday.

Bombings on Monday that killed more than 40 Iraqis demonstrated that extremists were still staging attacks aimed at grabbing headlines, but the overall number of attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops has fallen, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military.

Reinforcements began arriving last month as part of President Bush's plan to expand the U.S. force by 21,500. They have joined with Iraqi forces to provide a 24-hour presence in some violent neighborhoods where troops previously had patrolled only by daylight. New roadblocks and house-to-house sweeps have targeted sectarian militias.

Garver said there had been fewer attacks in the past few days. He declined to provide statistics.

"We also look for the enemy to look for opportunities to attack back," Garver said. "They still want to launch spectacular attacks to embarrass the government."

Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, warned last month that it could be late summer before it becomes clear whether the new security plan is working.

DOJ_NMG_0133560

Garver said there has been a decline in reported sectarian kidnappings and apparent murder victims in the Baghdad morgue. The average number of bodies brought to the morgue a day has dropped in the past week to 10 from 50 to 60 a month ago, the Associated Press reported.

Mohamed Al Daiyni, a member of Al Tawafek, the largest Sunni coalition in the parliament, said violence was down because "all the fighting groups are hiding."

"If there is any lull in violence, it will be temporary," Al Daiyni said. "I am not optimistic at all, and I know the chaos will be back."

Garver said the motives might prove irrelevant.

"Them putting off their attacks has the potential to work in our favor," Garver said. "The longer we have to get the police and army into the neighborhoods and accomplishing the mission, the better chance we have to get the security to take hold."

Hundreds of militia members and leaders have been detained in security operations over the past three weeks, said Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman.

Lamb said the area around Haifa Street in central Baghdad, where U.S. forces engaged in violent street battles a month ago, is now mostly in the hands of Iraqi forces.

"It's taking small bites of the city," Lamb said.

The relative lull follows a violent 2006 in Iraq. The number of insurgent attacks increased by 20% last year to 40,801 attacks, according to U.S. military data obtained by USA TODAY.

Also Monday:

•Insurgents staged a daylight assault against a U.S. combat post north of the capital Monday — first striking with a suicide car bombing, then firing on soldiers pinned down in a former Iraqi police station. At least two U.S. soldiers were killed and 17 wounded, the military said.

•On a highway just northwest of Baghdad, gunmen stopped a minivan and killed all 13 occupants, accusing them of opposing al-Qaeda in Iraq, police and witnesses told the Associated Press.

Mixed Welcome For Baghdad Surge (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD

Iraqi and American forces are meeting mixed results – that often vary street by street and day by day – as they struggle to regain control of Baghdad.

Two days of relative calm in the capital prompted Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to declare a "dazzling success" in the security clampdown, as officials reported an 80 percent drop in violence.

Some neighborhoods are seeing tentative early progress in this city of 6 million, where a surge of Iraqi and American forces started last week. The effort is meant to replace rampant violence with security, crush militants, and enable tens of thousands of people displaced by sectarian fighting to return to their homes.

But the relative calm has been followed by car and suicide bombs that killed 60 on Sunday and at least 10 more Monday.

Throughout Baghdad, the security plan is being viewed through a sectarian lens, despite Mr. Maliki's promise to pummel equally Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

For example, buoyed by hope that he could return home after being forced out by Sunni insurgents, Moayad entered his street Saturday behind Iraqi commandos backed by Americans.

The carpenter and 50 other Shiite residents were pleased to see a dozen insurgents arrested, cuffed, and blindfolded.

But as they picked through their trashed houses in the religiously mixed Al Amel neighborhood, their sense of safety was short-lived. "When [the Iraqi commandos] finished, an American officer came and said to release [the insurgents]," says Moayad and other witnesses. "Even the Iraqi officers were very angry, and went back to their base."

While inexplicable, that decision drew angry reactions from Shiites there that wanted to return home – and highlights the colliding sectarian interests at play as US and Iraqi forces seek to impose order.

DOJ_NMG_0133561

When those Sunnis who had occupied their houses were released in Al Amel – two of whom had attempted to kill him one month ago, he says – Moayad and other Shiite returnees had no choice but to depart again.

"I think the Americans want the security plan to fail," he asserts. "I was very hopeful [when it was announced]. But today, after the Americans released these insurgents, I will never respect US troops again."

A US military spokesman said he could not yet comment upon the specific incident by press time, but said it would be pursued: "This is serious allegation, and we're definitely going to be looking into it," said US Army Sgt. Matthew Roe.

Monday in Al Amel district, where Moayad once lived, Iraqi commandos driving through came under fire from Sunni insurgents. One Iraqi soldier was killed and three wounded in an attack in which residents joined with their rifles – later the Iraqi commander thanked them, witnesses said – to quell the insurgent shooting.

Maliki said the bombs "confirm the defeat of these perpetrators and their failure in confronting our armed forces, which are determined to cleanse the dens of terrorism."

But the string of bombings show how difficult reining in Iraq's violence will be. One attack Monday left two US soldiers dead and at least 17 wounded when a bomb exploded in a sophisticated attack on an American-Iraqi base north of Baghdad.

Daily average of deaths drops

Still, many Iraqis say they have seen some positive steps in the days since the surge officially came into effect last Thursday. And not just because several hundred Iraqis are reported to have been able to return home, or that the daily average of 50 dead bodies on the streets has dropped to single digits in recent days.

"People are very, very happy," with the replacement of a commando unit that refused to go after Shiite militiamen by a regular Iraqi Army unit in the southeast district of Zafaraniyeh, says a resident who could not be named.

"When they came 10 days ago, there was chaos and killing. Since then, I have not heard of a single person being killed," says the resident. It is the new Iraqi commander who is making the difference.

"He came and took the Shiite and Sunni clerics to lunch and told them: 'I am not a sectarian man, and all should be under the law, Sunni and Shiite,' " says the resident, quoting the new commander. " 'If you help me, we will help you. If you don't cooperate with me, you will be breaking the law, and I will crush you.' "

That commander has "made many changes and tells people he will be responsible for supplying all families with cooking fuel," says the Zafaraniyeh resident. He has also marked each official checkpoint with a large number – so people can more easily spot fake checkpoints – and his Iraqi forces are searching every vehicle, including police convoys. On Friday, a joint US-Iraq checkpoint there snagged a "police" colonel who proved to be an imposter after calls were made to the Ministry of Interior to check his identity.

The insurgent stronghold of Dora, with its Sunni majority, has also been a key target of US and Iraqi efforts since the Baghdad security plan was first announced more than a month ago. In a 3:30 a.m. raid a month back, US troops arrived in two helicopters, surrounded a house, and took away two key insurgents.

"They had very sure information," says Dora resident who watched the raid take place. "When [the US] captured these guys, many people had a good feeling, because these two people caused big problems. They forced many [Shiite] families to leave. They were known insurgents."

In subsequent raids, US and Iraqi forces have tread carefully, looking for information about suspect trouble-makers as much as breaking in doors and searching suspicious cars for weaponry and bombs. This resident was handed a scrap of paper, printed in Arabic, which gives a mobile phone number and e-mail address to pass on tips to a US infantry unit, and reads: "Please call this number, to tell about any terrorist activities."

While carefully behaved US troops and their Iraqi translators may glean some information this way, other actions undermine their cause. In one case, the brother of this Dora resident was searched. The family was told to wait in the kitchen. US troops left, and then as the Iraqis were leaving, one asked the family to "check their money." Indeed, nearly $200 in Iraqi currency had disappeared. The Iraqi officer – in a line the family does not believe–blamed the Americans, and then left.

Sectarian view of the surge

So far the surge has yielded little head-to-head confrontation between US forces and Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. US officers say they expect both sides to have hidden their weapons or drifted away for the time being, until the surge passes.

DOJ_NMG_0133562

Shiite areas controlled by the Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are meant to be a particular US target because of links with death squads that have been killing dozens of Sunnis a day. Maliki's government, which relies on Mr. Sadr's supporter to rule, is reported to have pushed for Sunni areas to be cleaned up first.

Sunni leaders have cried foul, with Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi telling Al Jazeera TV on Sunday that leaks of the plan to Shiite militia chiefs meant a "golden opportunity for Iraq has been squandered."

But the perspective from Shiite areas is exactly the opposite.

"[Shiites] believe that this security plan is against the Shiites of Iraq – it's an American plan, [President George] Bush's plan, to limit the Shiites of Iraq," says a resident of Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum and Mahdi Army stronghold of northeast Baghdad.

"The dirty Iraqi troops with the Americans, they detain many, many people," the resident says, referring to a special Iraqi unit based at the Baghdad Airport that works with US forces in some cases. "If they see a picture of Moqtada in your house, they will detain you."

The cleric himself, this resident says, has ordered his followers – who battled US forces twice in 2004 – not to take on the Americans. Mahdi Army fighters confirm those orders.

"We are following Moqtada's orders, and if he says don't fight [the Americans], we won't," says a Mahdi Army fighter who took part in those 2004 uprisings, and asked not to be named. "We know America wants to make a mass killing of Sadrists, so we should avoid this, by following Moqtada's orders."

And the growing US presence is not universally rejected in Sadr City. "Sometimes they stop the bad people – it's a good service for us, and we should stop them. I feel safer," adds the resident. "Some people are happy with the [Iraqi] troops, and cook dinner for them."

But it may be some time before the Shiite residents of Al Amel, in south Baghdad, make peace with the US troops who they say enabled the release of the arrested Sunni insurgents on Saturday.

Al Amel resident Sadiq, who would not give his last name, fled over the New Year, after a gang of Sunnis – including three (former) friends – shot up his house one night, sending a message to multiple Shiite households to leave.

"We surrendered to reality," says Sadiq, who once ran a computer gaming center on the main street. "We are not fighters or armed. We just took our ID cards, and left our money and gold. We expected to go back."

But now that money and gold is stolen. Along with six computers he was keeping at home, after his business was forced to close. "Today, the important thing is to return back to my home," he says. "I have an unknown future."

So does Moayad, who would also only give his first name, who was attacked by two gunmen early one morning a month ago, as he went to clean his car. A video on his mobile phone shows the vehicle peppered with 15 rounds.

"When they came to assassinate me, they came without any masks, because they were sure they would kill me," says Moayad, who himself wore a mask during the Saturday operation, so he would not be recognized by insurgents.

He has received many phone calls, crudely threatening him and his family. And the same day that gunmen attacked him, he had another close call. Saying goodbye to other neighbors who had congratulated him on his good luck at surviving, he was standing in the doorway with his arm raised when a sniper shot through the cloth of his shirt at the armpit.

Three days later, out of money and ammunition, Moayad gave up his home.

"We are disappointed by the government and US soldiers," says Moayad. "In the future, if they don't help us, we will have to call on the militias and join them, even though that will not solve the problems."

Marines In Iraq's Al Anbar Cope With Daily Grind (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

In farming communities along the Syrian border, U.S. Marines work with Iraqis to open health clinics and a job center and to improve trash collection and water delivery.

In Fallouja, Marines at a center for displaced people greet Sunni Muslims from Baghdad seeking sanctuary from Shiite Muslim death squads.

DOJ_NMG_0133563

And along the sniper alley of a freeway that runs between Fallouja and Ramadi, Marines patrol less like warriors than traffic cops.

Rather than charge into battle, most Marines in Iraq's western desert are engaged in nation building on a piecemeal basis, the kind of venture President Bush once publicly disdained. Trained to win quick, decisive victories with firepower and bravery, Marines in Al Anbar province instead face a daily grind. Most never fire their weapons.

The Marine Corps has even changed the rules for its coveted Combat Action Ribbon, allowing troops to win the award even when no shots are fired.

A sign outside the chow hall at the base in this town near the Syrian border sums up the slow, incremental nature of the campaign: "Rebuilding Iraq one meal at a time."

Bush said during his State of the Union address that "this is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in." To the 20,000-plus troops in Al Anbar, soon to be reinforced under the administration's troop-increase plan, that wasn't news.

"I wasn't taught any of these things in infantry school," said Lt. Col. Scott Shuster, commander of the 3rd Battalion, 4th Regiment, with responsibility for Qaim.

Al Anbar, the vast province that sprawls from the Euphrates River valley west to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, remains deadly. About one-third of U.S. casualties since the invasion of Iraq in 2003 have occurred here, and the danger of roadside bombs in particular is ever present. At nearly every base, a list of Marines killed in action is posted on a wall.

"Inside the wire, [duty in Iraq] is better; outside the wire, it's not," said Lance Cpl. Stephen Herring, 20, of Pontiac, Mich., referring to the security of the base.

What has changed is not the violence, but the U.S. expectations. Just over two years ago, after the second battle of Fallouja, Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, then commander of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, boasted that U.S. forces had "broken the back of the insurgency." Now the watchword is that all gains are small and that prevailing here could take years.

"I think we're making progress," said Capt. Glen Taylor, executive officer of Golf Company of the 2nd Battalion, 8th Regiment, with troops in a run-down hotel in the farm town of Saqlawiya. "I don't know it will ever be enough, but I think the progress is real."

Fighting an insurgency is frustrating. "You cut off the head and the body doesn't necessarily die," Taylor said.

For one group of Marines, Al Anbar is a target-rich environment: The civil affairs groups, often reservists, describe their mission with the military acronym SWEAT, which refers to rebuilding the sewage, water, electricity, academic and trash-removal infrastructure ravaged by decades of neglect and three years of insurgent attacks.

"The challenges are the same as back home, just 100 times more difficult," said Staff Sgt. Christopher Garcia, a city planner in San Antonio.

Elsewhere in the province, Americans find themselves taking on duties they had not expected. In Ramadi, an Army lieutenant colonel trained as an artillery officer spends his days trying to make sure Iraqi police get paid, lest they desert and join the insurgents. In Haditha, Marines patrol on foot, greeting Iraqis at a market, trying to win hearts and minds one at a time.

In numerous communities, including Saqlawiya, Marines listen to the complaints of Iraqis about war-damaged homes and businesses, making payments in cases where the damage was caused by Marines. Every payment comes with a gentle lecture: It's time you choose between the insurgents and us.

There is an ad hoc quality to much of the Marines' strategy. "We're just trying to explore all avenues," Lt. Col. Blair Estep said.

There have been setbacks almost everywhere, sometimes caused by trusting the wrong people: Iraqi contractors who turn out to be insurgents; sheiks pretending to have more authority than they do; scam artists trying to get payments, such as a woman in Ramadi who showed the Marines her husband's death certificate, which was dated the following day.

Marine leaders plead for patience among their troops and the American public. A counterinsurgency operation such as the one in Al Anbar is slow, and gauging its progress is like trying to measure a child's growth on a daily basis, Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said.

Even when there are hopeful signs, they are contradicted by disappointing ones.

DOJ_NMG_0133564

Lt. Col. James Donnellan, who commands a Marine battalion with responsibility for a triad of towns along the Euphrates, is buoyed by support from the local police chief and a friendly, if tentative, attitude from residents.

Still, the competency of the police is questionable. When a joint Marine-Iraqi convoy was attacked recently, police officers began firing in all directions. Donnellan said it was fortunate no civilians or friendly forces were hurt. "Luckily the police are no better shots than the terrorists," he said.

For the enlisted ranks, particularly those stationed in more austere settings, away from the comforts of mess halls and movie nights and Internet cafes, the "Groundhog Day" repetition of duty in Al Anbar can be wearing.

"Sometimes you get down, because it seems nothing is going right," said Lance Cpl. Korby Rhodes, 21, of Park City, Kan., stationed at the spartan Camp Gannon. "You just have to get over it. You can't linger, you just have to get over it."

Young men become Marines to fight, not to spend their days protecting convoys from roadside bombs or trying to mentor Iraqis on how to be police officers in their own country.

"I had more of an idea of OIF1 stuck in my head," said Lance Cpl. Robert Warren, 20, of Palmdale, using the military acronym for the 2003 U.S.-led assault on Baghdad.

Commanders watch for signs that Marines, out of frustration or exhaustion, are too rough with the civilians they encounter at checkpoints or on foot patrols.

"There is a tendency among the young Marines to think it's as kinetic [combative] as it was once," said Maj. John Polidoro, whose troops live in tents in the dusty Euphrates valley.

Troops who have seen buddies killed by roadside bombs or snipers have learned to mourn quickly and move on.

"It's not like it gets easier, it's like we're bottling it up, saving our grief," said Navy corpsman Adam O'Gara, 27, in his second deployment in Iraq.

Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division, an Army unit that controls Ramadi and answers to a Marine general, said the Al Anbar strategy could be summarized by a quotation from British philosopher Thomas Hobbes: "Be sociable with them that will be sociable, and be formidable with them that will not."

Reminded that Hobbes also said that life is "poor, nasty, brutish and short," MacFarland replied, "Yes, that sounds like Ramadi."

Conservatives Target GOP War Critics In Congress (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Josh Kraushaar

The Politico, February 20, 2007

House Republican leaders and conservative activists are targeting critics of President Bush's plan to send more combat forces into Iraq -- and some GOP lawmakers are on the hit list.

Amid a mounting campaign in Congress to limit Bush's military options, conservatives led by talk show host Hugh Hewitt have created an advocacy group designed to counter the anti-war MoveOn.org. And its first round of targets will be the 17 GOP lawmakers who voted for last week's Democratic resolution in the House opposing the troop increases.

First in the sights of the new Victory Caucus is Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla., whose district includes Orlando.

While Hewitt carries considerable sway among conservatives, the fledgling Victory Caucus starts out with little of the money and prominence of MoveOn.org, now nationally entrenched as a liberal interest group.

At the same time, House Republicans are hitting Democrats who represent districts Bush won in hopes of preventing a congressional majority that would restrict money for Afghanistan and Iraq. The GOP is flooding those districts with news releases and e-mails warning that Democrats are undermining U.S. troops.

Republicans claim the campaign already has paid off in South Dakota, where the Sioux Falls Argus Leader ran a column over the weekend highlighting how Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth is pinched between party leaders and conservative voters in the state.

"We will certainly expose any Democrat who promised to fund the troops in order to get elected who turns around and supports a slow-bleed strategy now that they're here and their leadership is calling the shots," said Jessica Boulanger, communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0133565

The GOP political strategy is to shift the focus away from an unpopular war and unpopular president to the Republican claim that Democrats would abandon the troops.

"They're trying to go on offense on their biggest liability, and it's not going to work because they're losing on the issue," said Jennifer Crider, communications director for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Republicans are trying to force a House vote on a binding measure to prevent cutting or restricting money for the war.

Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas, a prisoner of war in Vietnam, is leading the effort, with the backing of Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri and his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia. They are gathering signatures for a discharge petition to force a vote on the issue, but the effort is almost certain to fail because it would need to attract some Democratic support.

In the meantime, the Victory Caucus hopes to shame Republicans into sticking with their leaders on upcoming votes on defense spending. "This is a means of getting out a message," said Dean Barnett, a member of the Victory Caucus Board of Governors. "We're letting the political class know there's a huge chunk of people out there that want victory."

Keller is a prime target, organizers say, because of his House speech last week comparing the Iraq war with a neighbor's unkempt lawn. "Imagine that you have a next-door neighbor who refuses to mow his lawn, and the weeds are up to his waist," Keller said. "You mow his lawn for him every single week. The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots at you. Under these circumstances, would you keep mowing his lawn forever?"

Barnett responded on his blog: "In the virtual special ed class that is our Congress, Keller sits in the virtual corner wearing the virtual dunce cap."

Keller is in many ways a surprising target for conservatives. He won a competitive primary in 2000 by running to the right of his opponent -- on an anti-abortion, anti-tax platform that won support from the conservative Club for Growth.

"The Iraq issue transcends partisan politics," Barnett said. "Keller may be a rock-ribbed conservative but on the biggest issue of our day, he's got it wrong."

Hewitt is asking his listeners to identify any potential primary challengers to Keller who are supportive of the Iraq war and to commit funding to such a campaign. He also announced he would not be donating to the National Republican Congressional Committee because of its support for "White Flag Republicans."

Weekly Standard editor Bill Kristol sounded a similar note on "Fox News Sunday."

"There's something called primaries we have in America, and there will be primary challenges in the Republican Party against some of those congressmen," Kristol said. "And they deserve to be primaried, because they are acting, I think, in a shameful way."

Unlike their Senate counterparts, most of the 17 dissenting House Republicans will not likely face tough re-election campaigns.

Only Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., had a difficult re-election in 2006. And based on the demographics of their districts, Republican Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, Mark Kirk of Illinois and Keller could face serious challenges next year.

None of the perennially targeted GOP incumbents, such as Reps. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, Heather Wilson of New Mexico or Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania, voted with the Democrats.

Liberal bloggers have already been involved in several high-profile primary battles with limited success. They helped Ned Lamont topple Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, but he lost in the general election and Lieberman was elected as an independent.

They also were unsuccessful when Democrat Ciro Rodriguez fell short in his primary challenge against Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Texas. Later, Rodriguez came back to defeat Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla in a December special election.

On the budget side, Democrats and centrist Republicans should shift substantial funding for combat operations in Iraq over to the Veterans's Administration budget and the DOD budget for Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Long term care for Veterans is atrocious. The number of wounded veterans returning from Iraq is greater than expected, and they are not getting the care they need. See:

Democrats and centrist Republicans should stand with the vets on this issue. Our veterans should be receiving the best care available, not mice-infested, run-down, isolated tenement dorms serving as an excuse for treatment. For more information, see www.votevets.org.

The war on Iraq was a collosal blunder from Day 1, in large part a product of the aggressive campaign by Israeli Lobby/neocons to get our country involved in wars with Israel's enemies (a campaign that continues still). Republicans were in power at the time; if the Democrats had been in power the same organizations would have waged the same campaign and the result might well have been the same. So honest Republicans should not be afraid to call the Iraq war what it is ... a collosal blunder and a national disgrace. But now, given the present situation, what is now best for America? That is a reasonable subject for discussion and no honest representative, Republican or Democrat, should duck the issue or cede his judgment to party leaders. This is a time for courage and leadership, a time to act in America's best interests. It is not a time for politics.

Yes, let the Republicans primary their only sensible members out of existence. Americans have HAD IT with this sham of a war. I think some GOP House members understand this and they're tired of being deck hands on Bush's Titanic. If the GOP didn't get the memo that voters sent them in '06, they'll just keep on losing. Sounds good to me!

IN 2002 in Georgia, the Republicans ran T V ads against Senator Max Clelland featuring Pictures of Clelland always followed by Osama Bin Laden ? Saxby Chambliss thought it was fair advertising ? Why does it not surprise me that they would turn on their own ? I can just imagine what the "turncoats" will see and hear? I am guessing terms like "un-american"--- "aide &comfort to the enemy"--- ? Can anyone think of other famous putdowns they use ?

So who is Hugh Hewitt? you might wonder.

Simple answer. An arch neocon who, like 99% of rightwing pundits, never wore the the uniform much less saw combat.

Hewitt shares air time at Townhall Talk Radio with four other neocons who never served: PNAC founder Bill Bennett, Mike Ghallager, Michael Medved and Dennis Praeger.

There is one more member of the goose-stepping Townhall group worth mentioning: John Newbury, whose talk show is called "National Defense."

He makes no bones about his rightwing Republican bent. On the Townhall website, Newbury sells self-described "conservative" T-shirts which he calls the "largest selection of liberal-baiting merchandise on the Net."

He also touts two favorable books about 2008 GOP presidential candidates John McCain and Mitt Romney. There are no pro-Democrat publications or other such products advertised on Newbury's home page.

And who helps pay John Newbury's salary?

The Veterans of Foreign Wars (VFW), which is supposed to be a NONpartisan association. By sponsoring John Newbury and no other voice on Townhall Talk Radio, the VFW shows itself at the national level to be a biased rightwing organization.

The political prejudice also proves how pervasive is the neconservative movement. For that reason, with much regret, I withdrew my VFW membership application in January 2007.

I can't believe this whole mess. It's the same old politics as usual. The dems are no better than the republicans. This country is in dire need of a third party that can reform the way congress and the senate operate. Until all the old fat cats are booted out and replaced with people that really reflect the national mood on Iraq, the economy, immigration , education, roe v. wade etc., we deserve these fat white dudes and their equally repugnant business as usual attitudes.

The Antiwar Rallying Point (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Two things are now abundantly clear about the future of U.S. policy toward Iraq. First, majorities in both houses of Congress have lost faith in President Bush's approach to the war. Second, the president will do all he can to resist changing his strategy by trying to split his critics into ineffectual factions.

Bush's choice is certainly bad for opponents of the war, but it's also bad for American foreign policy.

The president is inviting a full-scale confrontation over his warmaking powers in the expectation that the Democrats' narrow majorities will deprive them of the votes they need to win such a fight. He is ready to split the country rather than give any ground to those who ask whether it's wise to risk ensnaring American troops in a Sunni-Shiite civil war.

The challenge to critics of the war is to make the debate about Bush, not about themselves, and to make clear that the president has rebuffed all efforts to pursue a bipartisan path out of Iraq, beginning with his rejection of the core recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton.

Changing our policy will require a substantial Republican rebellion. The 17 House Republicans who voted for the resolution opposing the president's surge and the seven Senate Republicans who tried to get a vote for the House-passed measure are a start.

DOJ_NMG_0133568

The next steps pursued by the war's critics must be premised on the goal of expanding this circle of Republican opposition, because, as Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) put it on "Meet the Press" over the weekend, "Republican influence on the president might be more decisive than the Democratic voices."

For now, the war's opponents are focused on three strategies. One would be to cut off funds for the war, but there is currently no majority in either house for this. A second approach, expected to come from Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), would propose restrictions on troop deployments -- for example, forbidding the redeployment of units that have been home for less than a year and imposing substantial training requirements on the troops who are sent.

The Murtha measure would at least force a much-needed debate on the damage this war has done to our armed forces and the extraordinary burdens being borne by the brave minority of Americans who serve. It would also sidestep the political damage of doing anything that could be construed by Bush's supporters as "failing to support our troops."

But the sense that the proposal has been crafted in part for reasons of political convenience and the intricate restrictions it would place on the military are precisely what could doom it. The war's opponents need other options.

A third path, offered by Sens. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would have Congress revisit its original 2002 Iraq resolution to make clear that the war authorized then (against Saddam Hussein and what turned out to be nonexistent weapons of mass destruction) had nothing to do with putting American troops in the midst of a Muslim civil war now.

The Biden-Levin idea has the advantage of pushing Republicans who are quietly doubtful about Bush's path out into the open. In particular, Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who rightly called this weekend for a more bipartisan approach to Iraq, nonetheless keeps voting his party's line. That, in turn, enables Bush to pursue the very sort of divisive partisanship on the war that Lugar says he's against.

Lugar and others in his party who harbor doubts about Bush's approach must be challenged again and again to justify actions that allow the president to bull ahead by dividing his opposition.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) has an additional idea: Opponents of the war need to force full consideration of the original Baker-Hamilton proposals that, he said, promised to put American policy "on a trajectory to have our combat troops out of Iraq this time next year" and reflected "the center of gravity in Congress." Whatever its flaws, the Iraq Study Group report could still serve as a focal point for sharply reducing America's military role in Iraq before the 2008 election.

"The refusal of the administration to try to work with others to resolve this in a responsible manner has created a very polarized atmosphere," Van Hollen said. "They've refused to listen to anyone else."

That should be the central theme of the president's critics because it's true -- and because it offers the best rallying cry for those seeking to change a disastrous policy.

A Big Fight On The Hill (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Congress has been talking about it for weeks, jousting, posturing, and trading partisan jabs. Last week, the Democrats who control the House of Representatives finally got around to actually voting on President Bush's new policy in Iraq. After four days of debate, the 246-to-182 ballot in favor of a brief, nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan to add more than 20,000 troops seemed, well, anticlimactic.

Perhaps that's because it was. While it was a resounding vote of no confidence in the president's plan, it was also just the first of many legislative battles as Congress decides how strenuously to exert its constitutional powers to control funding for the war. That process is many months away from conclusion, but the political stakes are ratcheting up almost by the day.

Democrats voted nearly unanimously for the resolution last week, save for two members, and they were joined by a varied lot of 17 Republicans. Some, like Walter Jones of North Carolina, were early supporters of the Iraq war who eventually turned against the president. Others, like Michael Castle of Delaware, could face tough re-election campaigns in 2008.

Hanging tough. Despite the increasing pressure, the president shows no signs of backing away from his insistence on "victory." He hopes that the situation improves and that Iraqi forces can gradually take more responsibility. But he believes he can accomplish the planned troop surge and maintain whatever troop levels are necessary through the end of his presidency, in January 2009, White House advisers say. Those advisers are clinging to the hope that, in the end, most congressional Democrats won't vote to cut off funds for the troops.

Democrats are calling the House resolution "Step 1" in their approach toward shaping Iraq policy. Next up is the Senate, which so far has failed to even muster a vote on Iraq. At week's end, senators were poised to take up a measure that could lead to consideration of the same language passed by the House.

But the fight on Capitol Hill is already shifting to much tougher ground: the budget process. The president is requesting $93.4 billion in supplemental funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and next month Congress will consider whether to make changes to that budget request or other alterations to Bush's plan. In mid-March, the House International Relations Committee will hold hearings to consider about a dozen bills on Iraq, including efforts to withdraw troops from Iraq and proposals to force the Defense Department to change how it reviews contracts in Iraq for fraud and abuse.

In interviews and announcements last week coordinated with antiwar interest groups, Rep. John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat shepherding the Pentagon spending bill through Congress as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, detailed a process that would set conditions on the bill, thereby tying the president's hands. Murtha's plan-Democratic activists dub it "the readiness strategy"-would, in part, require that soldiers have at least one year at home before they're redeployed for a second tour and would ensure that troops have appropriate training and equipment under military guidelines. It would also end "stop loss" procedures that extend soldiers' tours. The upshot? "This vote will limit the options of the president," Murtha says, "and should stop the surge."

The Elusive Quds Force (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey And John Barry

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

The Iranian Special Operations unit called the Quds Force has for years been accused, with or without evidence, of assassinations and terrorist attacks as far away as Argentina. But its specialty is different: striking fear in the hearts of generals. Over the past 25 years, the Quds Force has proved ferociously effective at organizing, training and equipping guerrillas to confront the world's most vaunted armies. Quds played a vital role in creating Hizbullah to fight the Israelis in Lebanon. It supported the legendary Ahmed Shah Massoud against the Russians and his Taliban rivals in Afghanistan. Quds helped the Bosnians hold back the Serbian war machine. And now—it's in Iraq.

"What matters is that they're there," President George W. Bush said last week. Precisely why, at whose direction or invitation, and with what long-term goals: all that remains in doubt. Bush, even as he said the group had "harmed our troops," suggested how much remains unknown: "I do not know whether or not the Quds Force was ordered from the top echelons of [the Iranian] government. But my point is: what's worse—them ordering it and it happening, or them not ordering it and it happening?"

Actually, what's worse is that the unit appears to be as close to America's Shiite and Kurdish allies as to splinter groups accused of killing perhaps 170 of the more than 3,000 American soldiers who've died in Iraq. The relationship between the Quds Force and figures like Iraqi President Jalal Talabani or Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (both of whom have been received in the White House recently) goes back two decades to the days when only Tehran was aiding Saddam Hussein's enemies. "Do the Americans think they would stop working with us because Americans told them so?" says an Iranian intelligence official who is not authorized to speak on the record. Quds operatives captured recently were working directly under the protection, respectively, of Talabani and Hakim.

Because of the bad intelligence that the Bush administration used to pave the way to war with Iraq in 2003, skeptics worry it may be using similar tactics to provoke a fight with Iran. But when it comes to the Quds Force, the American military's concerns are much more down to earth. The weapons known as "explosively formed penetrators" or EFPs, which Quds allegedly helped design and supply to some Shiite factions in Iraq, send a molten slug at phenomenal speed through heavy armor. Each one costs perhaps $50, but is capable of crippling an Abrams tank that costs more than $4 million, and they are increasingly common.

Meanwhile, since the beginning of the year, U.S. helicopters have been shot out of the sky with unprecedented frequency. Although none of the five confirmed shootdowns have been linked to the Quds Force, or to Iran, U.S. commanders are worried about their troops' ability to move on the ground and in the air. So they're looking for any way to relieve the pressure—to stop the flow of Iranian arms—three Army sources told NEWSWEEK on condition of anonymity. Publicizing the threat and pushing back against Iran is one idea. But taking aim at this new enemy will be a challenge, given the risk of hitting a friend.

War Of Words (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine And Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

It should have been a pretty straightforward case: Shiite militias are using Iranian weapons to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq. On that, the evidence is clear. But when unnamed officials at a hastily convened briefing in Baghdad went a step further, accusing Iranian officials "at the highest levels" of funneling a particularly deadly form of roadside bomb to the Shiite militias, it raised more questions than it answered. For one thing, while the analysts laid out detailed evidence that the armor-piercing "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, originated in Iran, they offered nothing to support the allegation of Iranian government involvement.

Confusing matters further, several senior U.S. officials-including the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Gen. William Caldwell, the chief spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, and even President Bush-made a point of walking back from the accusation. "It is clear that Iranians are involved, and it's clear that materials from Iran are involved," Pace told the Voice of America, "but I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit."

In Washington and other capitals, many were left questioning the allegations and wondering aloud what, exactly, the Bush administration was hoping to achieve. Was this a prelude to stronger action against Iran or simply a clumsy warning to the regime to stop its support of Shiite militias? The Bush White House ran smack into a growing credibility gap of its own making-a hangover from its handling of intelligence regarding Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction before the invasion. It spent the rest of the week trying to explain its intentions.

The controversy's timing was, at best, inconvenient. Last week, the House of Representatives was engaged in a marathon debate over Bush's "surge strategy" (Page 25). Bush struggled to turn the nation's attention back to his long-awaited security crackdown in Baghdad, but at a rare press conference, the questions kept returning to Iran.

Back in Baghdad, military officials insisted the briefing was not a prelude to a new war but a simple matter of force protection. "We need these actions to stop," said Caldwell. But to explain the ill-fated decision to present the Iran intelligence anonymously in Baghdad, some Pentagon officials pointed to what they call the new Powell doctrine: Don't get stuck being the fall guy for the administration's intelligence claims. (This is a nod to the discredited case that former Secretary of State Colin Powell made to the United Nations about Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction.) "Nobody wants to be Powell. He could have been president, and there was no one more credible in 2002," says a senior Pentagon official, of the decision to withhold the identities of the briefers. "That sends a big signal. Powell is now essentially derided as a tool of the administration."

The briefing, originally planned about two weeks earlier, was delayed by an arduous review process. The intelligence on EFPs was widely vetted in Washington before it was delivered in Baghdad. Senior military and intelligence officials, along with National Security Council aides and the Director of National Intelligence's Iran mission manager, all reviewed the presentation. U.S. News has learned that additional allegations against Tehran were removed because the intelligence was not conclusive enough. Despite all these efforts, the final briefing (hurriedly scheduled after the talking points leaked to a New York Times reporter) left many confused.

Pentagon To Fill Iraq Reconstruction Jobs Temporarily (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — The Pentagon and State Department have worked out a deal to send a small number of military personnel and Defense Department civilians to Iraq for several months until Foreign Service officers and State Department contract workers with specialized skills can fill those jobs, senior officials said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0133571

The internal administration discussions over filling the posts had exposed tensions between the military and civilian agencies over how to share responsibilities in carrying out President Bush's new strategy for stabilizing and rebuilding Iraq — in particular, how to fill hazardous positions in new provincial reconstruction teams.

The State Department had asked the Pentagon to come up with military personnel or civilians to fill about one-third of the 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq. While the numbers involved are relatively small, the debate raised larger issues of whether the government was properly organized to carry out a long-term occupation of a country like Iraq.

The State Department's written request for military personnel to fill some of the positions temporarily, received in late January, was met with frustration by a number of senior Pentagon officials and military officers.

But last week, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates agreed to the State Department request. About 120 military personnel or Pentagon civilians will fill the jobs for up to four months, according to three senior officials who were briefed on the discussions.

The officials said the stopgap measure would give the State Department time to identify Foreign Service officers to serve in political and economic development jobs in Iraq and to use new Congressional financing to hire people with technical skills that are not routinely part of diplomatic missions overseas.

The officials said the jobs included industrial development specialists, public health advisers, engineers, veterinarians, agricultural experts and lawyers who specialize in creating or enhancing judicial institutions.

While those skills are not a standard part of the diplomatic corps, they are found among active duty military and reserve personnel. It is those people who will be asked to step in temporarily.

"We are moving forward to try and fill many if not all of those positions, and can certainly manage it for 60, 90 or 120 days," a senior Defense Department official said.

Another senior Pentagon official said, "Rather than waiting for the funding and contracting process, we want to push the envelope to get the provincial reconstruction teams running as rapidly as we can."

Mr. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have not publicly discussed the specifics of the agreement. But they met at the State Department last week, and Ms. Rice spoke in positive terms of cooperation between the departments.

"This is one of several meetings that the secretary and I have been holding and will continue to hold on major issues that Defense and State are confronting together in the global war on terror," Ms. Rice said at the time. "It gives us a chance to get the people who are really responsible for managing these issues on a day-to-day basis together with us to solve the problems that we face and to take advantage of the opportunity."

The president's new strategy calls for the State Department to step up its efforts in Iraq, by doubling to 20 the number of provincial reconstruction teams. That increase would be in tandem with the deployment of 21,500 more troops to Baghdad and Anbar Province to the west.

"We need to put more energy into government at lower levels, at the provincial level and, in some cases, at the municipal level," a senior Defense Department official said.

Another official said the additional provincial reconstruction teams, to be managed by State Department personnel, would not focus on "brick and mortar" construction, but on "trying to reconstruct governmental capacity — the ability for the Iraqi government at all levels to effectively deliver services."

The State Department-run reconstruction teams will rely on military personnel for security and to escort convoys, Pentagon and State Department officials said. Striking a balance between assigning troops to day-to-day combat missions versus providing security for nonmilitary efforts has caused some tensions in the past.

At the core of the debate is a clash of cultures, civilian and military, and assessments of the mission. Many in the military have said that while administration officials routinely speak of the United States as "a nation at war," by far the bulk of the mission is being carried by those in uniform, while the rest of the government is not on a similar war footing.

But across the civilian agencies, which have only a fraction of the Pentagon's personnel and budget, government workers say the question is whether a few hundred unarmed civilians spread across Iraq can make a significant difference in promoting democracy and reconstruction in the middle of a war zone, when more than 130,000 troops are not succeeding in that task.

Iraq-refugee Plan Facesbipartisan Opposition (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0133572

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

A new program by the Bush administration to admit 7,000 Iraqi refugees into the United States this year is meeting with some resistance on both sides of the political aisle.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, says the policy flies in the face of U.S. law, and Ted Strickland, Ohio's Democratic governor, says refugees are not welcome in his state.

"I think Ohio and Ohioans have contributed a lot to Iraq in terms of blood, sweat and too many tears," Mr. Strickland said. "I am sympathetic to the plight of the innocent Iraqi people who have fled that country. However, I would not want to ask Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies."

In addition to opening U.S. borders to refugees, the United States will contribute $18 million for a worldwide resettlement and relief program for 20,000 Iraqi refugees this year.

Current law states that no Iraqi nationals should be permitted to enter the United States until the government of Iraq cooperates with U.S. efforts to repatriate Iraqi criminal aliens back to their home nation, Mr. Tancredo says.

Since 2003, the United States has allowed 463 Iraqi refugees to relocate, a number Mr. Tancredo calls "too many."

"I believe caving in to this pressure would be a colossal mistake and would very likely violate U.S. law," Mr. Tancredo said in a letter to Mr. Bush on Friday. "I hope you will resist pressure from international bureaucrats at the United Nations and order the Department of State to bring its policy in line with United States law."

Up to 2 million Iraqis have fled their country, primarily to Syria and Jordan, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this month formed a special task force to coordinate refugee assistance. The administration announced last week the United States will accept one-third of the 20,000 refugees who will be screened and approved this year by the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

The United States cut back on the number of Iraqis seeking refuge after the September 11 terrorist attacks with tighter screening controls, said Ellen Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration.

"The numbers dropped off so dramatically that UNHCR found it not a very attractive destination and were making very few referrals to the U.S.," she said.

The program has the support of key Democrats in the Senate, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who say the United States should contribute $30 million, half the cost of refugee-resettlement worldwide.

"While we can't solve this problem alone, we have a moral responsibility to do all that we can and provide the necessary leadership to prevent this crisis from getting worse," said Mr. Kennedy. "Our invasion of Iraq led to this crisis, and we have a clear responsibility to do more to ease it."

The process of seeking refuge in the United States is long and arduous, and Mrs. Sauerbrey concedes that only half, or about 3,500, will be ready to travel to the United States by September.

Only refugees who have been referred by UNHCR or by the U.S. Embassy in Iraq are eligible, and must first pass background checks, medical tests and other requirements.

Nongovernmental organizations determine where in the United States refugees are resettled based on the availability of housing, employment, needed services, readiness of host communities and a variety of other factors. If a refugee has a relative in the United States, every effort is made to resettle the refugee near that relative.

Iraqi Oil Wealth Stays Locked Up (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins And Hassan Hafidh

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Foreign technology and capital are seen as vital to restoring Iraq's crumbling oil industry. But as a draft petroleum law inches its way toward the Iraqi parliament, fresh opposition to the legislation is emerging, underscoring the difficulty that may still lie ahead for any move to invite in international oil companies.

DOJ_NMG_0133573

A petroleum law could provide a significant political boost for Iraq's shaky government, by setting down how money from newly developed fields would be shared among the country's three dominant ethnic regions -- the mostly Kurdish north, the Sunni center and the Shiite south. Reaching an agreement on sharing Iraq's energy resources, by far the nation's major source of wealth, will be critical to achieving long-term peace in the war-torn country.

U.S. officials and petroleum experts have been advising Iraqi politicians almost from the start of the American occupation nearly four years ago about how to build a legal framework that would enable foreign oil-field development. International majors have been reluctant to venture into the country until violence subsides and before politicians endorse a law spelling out legal rights and financial terms for foreign firms.

In recent months, Iraqi politicians have made some progress. In its current form, the legislation envisions the re-creation of an Iraqi state oil company, and it gives broad latitude to officials from the country's various regions to encourage foreign investment and development. Kurdish officials had balked at earlier provisions calling for specific federal approval of development deals between regional governments and foreign firms.

The Iraqi cabinet discussed a revised draft of the petroleum law late last week. The cabinet is expected to meet perhaps as early as this week to take up the issue again, according to Assem Jihad, a spokesman for the Ministry of Oil in Baghdad. If the cabinet agrees on a working draft, it would be forwarded to parliament for debate and ratification.

The legislation still faces significant political hurdles. Earlier this month, an influential union of oil workers in the country's south said it will oppose the legislation. In a speech to more than 200 delegates at a conference in Basra in early February, union leader Hassan Jumaa condemned the legislation as opening Iraq's oil wealth to foreign exploitation.

"History will not forgive those who play recklessly with our wealth," he said. "We consider the new law unbalanced and incoherent with the hopes of those who work in the oil industry. It has been drafted in a great rush in harsh circumstances."

The rhetoric echoes the sentiment of many everyday Iraqi citizens. The nationalization of the Iraqi oil industry in the 1970s under Saddam Hussein remains a point of pride for many Iraqis, and opposition still runs deep to any hint of foreign interference.

Also, opposition has emerged from prominent former Iraqi oil officials, who have recently fled the country's chaos but continue to hold some sway in Baghdad's oil bureaucracy. Because of the escalating sectarian violence and political polarization, these officials fear, rushing through a petroleum law could cause more harm than good to the industry.

North Africa Feared As Staging Ground For Terror (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

TUNIS — The plan, hatched for months in the arid mountains of North Africa, was to attack the American and British Embassies here. It ended in a series of gun battles in January that killed a dozen militants and left two Tunisian security officers dead.

But the most disturbing aspect of the violence in this normally placid, tourist-friendly nation is that it came from across the border in Algeria, where an Islamic terrorist organization has vowed to unite radical Islamic groups across North Africa.

Counterterrorism officials on three continents say the trouble in Tunisia is the latest evidence that a brutal Algerian group with a long history of violence is acting on its promise: to organize extremists across North Africa and join the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad.

[Last week, the group claimed responsibility for seven nearly simultaneous bombings that destroyed police stations in towns east of Algiers, the Algerian capital, killing six people.]

This article was prepared from interviews with American government and military officials, French counterterrorism officials, Italian counterterrorism prosecutors, Algerian terrorism experts, Tunisian government officials and a Tunisian attorney working with Islamists charged with terrorist activities.

They say North Africa, with its vast, thinly governed stretches of mountain and desert, could become an Afghanistan-like terrorist hinterland within easy striking distance of Europe. That is all the more alarming because of the deep roots that North African communities have in Europe and the ease of travel between the regions. For the United States, the threat is also real because of visa-free travel to American cities for most European passport holders.

The violent Algerian group the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, known by its French initials G.S.P.C., has for several years been under American watch.

"The G.S.P.C. has become a regional terrorist organization, recruiting and operating in all of your countries — and beyond," Henry A. Crumpton, then the United States ambassador at large for counterterrorism, said at a counterterrorism conference in Algiers last year. "It is forging links with terrorist groups in Morocco, Nigeria, Mauritania, Tunisia and elsewhere."

Officials say the group is funneling North African fighters to Iraq, but is also turning militants back toward their home countries.

The ambitions of the group are particularly troubling to counterterrorism officials on the watch for the re-emergence of networks that were largely interrupted in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. While most estimates put the current membership of the group in the hundreds, it has survived more than a decade of Algerian government attempts to eradicate it. It is now the best-organized and -financed terrorist group in the region.

Last year, on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Al Qaeda chose the G.S.P.C. as its representative in North Africa. In January, the group reciprocated by switching its name to Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb, claiming that the Qaeda leader, Osama bin Laden, had ordered the change.

"Al Qaeda's aim is for the G.S.P.C. to become a regional force, not solely an Algerian one," said the French counterterrorism magistrate, Jean-Louis Bruguière, in Paris. He calls the Algerian group the biggest terrorist threat facing France today.

"We know from cases that we're working on that the G.S.P.C.'s mission is now to recruit people in Morocco and Tunisia, train them and send them back to their countries of origin or Europe to mount attacks," he said.

The G.S.P.C. was created in 1998 as an offshoot of the Armed Islamic Group, which along with other Islamist guerrilla forces fought a brutal decade-long civil war after the Algerian military canceled elections in early 1992 because an Islamist party was poised to win.

In 2003, a G.S.P.C. leader in southern Algeria kidnapped 32 European tourists, some of whom were released for a ransom of 5 million euros (about $6.5 million at current exchange rates), paid by Germany.

Officials say the leader, Amari Saifi, bought weapons and recruited fighters before the United States military helped corner and catch him in 2004. He is now serving a life sentence in Algeria.

Change of Leadership

Since then, an even more radical leader, Abdelmalek Droukdel, has taken over the group. The Algerian military says he cut his teeth in the 1990s as a member of the Armed Islamic Group's feared Ahoual or "horror" company, blamed for some of the most gruesome massacres of Algeria's civil war.

He announced his arrival with a truck bomb at the country's most important electrical production facility in June 2004, and focused on associating the group with Al Qaeda.

Links to the G.S.P.C. soon began appearing in terrorism cases elsewhere in North Africa and in Europe.

In 2005, Moroccan authorities arrested a man named Anour Majrar, and told Italy and France that he and two other militants had visited G.S.P.C. leaders in Algeria earlier that year.

His interrogation led to arrests in Algeria, Italy and France, where Mr. Majrar's associates were quickly linked to an attempted robbery of 5 million euros at an armored car depot in Beauvais, north of Paris. A hole had been blown in a wall at the depot with military-grade C4 plastic explosives, but it was not big enough for the men to get through.

A later investigation turned up Kalashnikov assault rifles, French Famas military assault rifles, rocket-propelled grenades, TNT and two more pounds of C4. French counterterrorism officials say the group was planning attacks on the Paris Metro, the city's Orly Airport, and the headquarters of the Direction de la Surveillance du Territoire, France's domestic intelligence agency.

Italian prosecutors say a related cell in Milan was planning attacks on the city's police headquarters and on the Basilica of San Petronio in Bologna, whose 15th-century fresco depicts the Prophet Muhammad in hell.

The G.S.P.C. or its members in Algeria appear to have become a touchstone for groups suspected of being terror cells across the region, in much the way that Qaeda representatives in London were a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0133575

Wiretaps, interrogation of terrorism suspects and recovered documents suggest that the network has associates in France, Italy, Turkey and even Greece, which is favored as an entry point to Europe because of its relatively lax immigration controls, counterterrorism officials say.

There had been hints that the North African groups were planning more formal cooperation as far back as 2005, when Moroccan intelligence authorities found messages sent by Islamic militants to Osama bin Laden, according to European counterintelligence officials.

Evidence of an Alliance

Indications that a cross-border alliance was under way came in June 2005, when the G.S.P.C. attacked a military outpost in Mauritania, killing 15 soldiers. The attackers fled into Mali, according to the United States military.

Moroccan police officers raiding suspected Islamic militant cells last summer also found documents discussing a union between the G.S.P.C. and the Islamic Combatant Group in Morocco, the Islamic Fighting Group in Libya and several smaller Tunisian groups, intelligence officials say.

In September, Al Qaeda's second in command, Ayman al-Zawahri, released a videotape in which he said that his global terrorist network had joined forces with the G.S.P.C.

The video was followed by an unsettling increase in terrorist attacks across the region, including one against Halliburton employees in Algeria in December that left one Algerian dead and nine people wounded.

But the strongest evidence yet of the G.S.P.C.'s North African cross-border cooperation came in January when Tunisia announced that it had killed 12 Islamic extremists and captured 15 of them. Officials said that six of the extremists had crossed into the country from Algeria.

Their 36-year-old leader, Lassad Sassi, was a former Tunisian policeman who ran a terrorist cell in Milan until May 2001 before fleeing to Algeria, according to an Italian prosecutor, Armando Spataro.

Mr. Sassi, now dead, is still listed as a defendant in a current terrorism trial in Milan, which began before he died. He was charged in absentia with providing military clothing and money to the G.S.P.C. while financing and planning suicide bomb attacks in Italy.

Tunisian officials say that Mr. Sassi and five other men — four Tunisians and one Mauritanian — crossed the rugged border from Algeria into Tunisia months ago.

They set up a base in the mountains of Djebel Terif, where Mr. Sassi trained 20 other Tunisian men in the use of automatic weapons and explosives.

A Trail of Violence

The decision to move against the group began when the police in the Tunis suburb of Hammam Lif detained a young woman in December who led them to a house where a gun battle left two suspected terrorists dead, two officers wounded and two other men in custody, a police officer involved said. His account of the events could not be independently verified.

Another arrest led the police into the hills toward the training camp.

Three of the militants and a Tunisian Army captain were killed during a chase through the mountains. Tunisian security forces mounted a search in which 13 more men were arrested and Mr. Sassi was killed.

The remnants of the group fled and members were later tracked down and killed in another gun battle.

Tunisian officials have sought to play down the G.S.P.C. link, and have said the recently dismantled group's target was the West.

In fact, according to Samir Ben Amor, a Tunisian attorney who defends many young Tunisian Islamists, more than 600 young Tunisian Islamists have been arrested in the past two years — more than 100 in the past two months — trying to make their way to Iraq to fight the United States.

"It's the same thing that we saw in Bosnia, Kosovo and above all Afghanistan," said Mr. Bruguière, the French magistrate. "Al Qaeda's objective is to create an operational link between the groups in Iraq and the G.S.P.C."

Tunisia is among the most vulnerable of the North African countries, because its rigid repression of Islam has created a well of resentment among religious youth, and its popularity as a tourist destination for Europeans makes it a target.

DOJ_NMG_0133576

Tunisian security forces found Google Earth satellite images of the American and British Embassies as well as the names of diplomats who worked in both buildings. But according to the police officer involved in the case and journalists in Tunisia, the targets also included hotels and nightclubs.

An attack on those sites would have dealt a heavy blow to Tunisia's tourist industry, one of the country's most important sources of foreign exchange. An April 2002 bombing of a synagogue on the Tunisian tourist island of Djerba, for which the G.S.P.C. claimed responsibility, helped sink the country's economic growth that year to its slowest rate in a decade.

Terrorist Networks Lure Young Moroccans To War In Far-Off Iraq (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

TETOUAN, Morocco -- In the Arab world, this hilly North African city is about as far as you can get from Iraq. But for many young men here, the call to join what they view as a holy war resonates loudly across the 3,000-mile divide.

About two dozen men from Tetouan and nearby towns in the Rif Mountains have traveled to Iraq in the past 18 months to volunteer as fighters or suicide bombers, according to local residents and officials. Moroccan authorities said the men were recruited by international terrorist networks affiliated with al-Qaeda that have deepened their roots in North Africa since the invasion of Iraq four years ago.

To stanch the flow, U.S. intelligence and military officials have tried to trace the fighters' steps. On the basis of DNA evidence recovered from the scenes of suicide attacks, as well as other clues, officials have confirmed that at least two bombers came from Tetouan, a city of more than 320,000 across the Strait of Gibraltar from southern Spain.

One of them, Abdelmonaim el-Amrani, a 22-year-old laborer, abandoned his wife and infant child in Tetouan to go to Iraq. On March 6, 2006, just before sunset, he drove a red Volkswagen Passat stuffed with explosives into a funeral tent in a village near Baqubah, Iraq, according to witnesses. Six people were reported killed and 27 injured. It was months before Amrani's family in Tetouan learned of his fate from Moroccan police.

Foreign fighters in Iraq account for only a small percentage of the combatants attacking U.S. troops and their Iraqi allies. U.S. military officials and independent analysts peg the number at no more than a few thousand. But as the war drags on, it continues to serve as a powerful rallying tool for radical Islamic networks around the world that have developed recruiting pipelines as far afield as Europe and Southeast Asia.

Moroccan authorities said they have identified more than 50 volunteers who have gone to Iraq since 2003, and many more are believed to have made the journey undetected. Security officials here said the problem is worse in other Arab countries.

Under U.S. pressure to act, Moroccan officials have tried to disrupt the recruiting networks in recent months, arresting more than 50 people since November.

"We have chosen to be extremely vigilant," Interior Minister Chakib Benmoussa said in an interview in Rabat, the capital. "These cells all have international connections. They can function because they certainly all have support, especially in regard to training and in regard to logistics."

But Morocco and its neighbors are finding it increasingly difficult to suppress the militants. Several networks that used to operate independently in North Africa have put aside their differences, united in part by the ongoing violence in Iraq.

Last month, for example, a group in Algeria that has waged a decade-long insurgency against the government there announced that it had changed its name to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb -- a reference to African lands north of the Sahara -- and joined forces with affiliates in Tunisia, Morocco, Libya and Mauritania.

The organization asserted responsibility for a coordinated operation on Feb. 13 in which seven targets, mostly police stations, were bombed in a district east of Algiers. Six people were reported killed and 13 injured. In a telephone call to the Arab satellite television network al-Jazeera, an unidentified spokesman said the group was looking to expand its targets to focus on American interests. "Wherever we can find a U.S. presence, we will, God willing, pursue it and its agents," he said.

In December, the same group attacked a bus loaded with foreign contractors in a military-controlled zone of Algiers, killing the Algerian driver. Nine people were wounded, including four Britons and an American.

DOJ_NMG_0133577

In Tunisia, a cell belonging to the same network engaged in a gun battle Jan. 3 with police outside Tunis, the capital, resulting in 12 deaths. According to European news media, the cell had drawn up plans to attack the U.S., Italian and British embassies.

Despite the surge in local strikes, North African intelligence officials and analysts said that al-Qaeda affiliates in the region remain focused on Iraq and rely on the faraway conflict as a recruiting tool.

"The big state for al-Qaeda is Iraq," said Mohamed Darif, a political science professor and terrorism expert at Hassan II-Mohammedia University in Morocco. "Al-Qaeda has the same strategy as the United States: It wants to win in Iraq so it can transform the whole region. They are fixated on Iraq."

In Tetouan, the local economy and culture lean more toward Europe than the Middle East. The narrow streets and whitewashed buildings appear to have changed little since the first half of the 20th century, when the city was the colonial capital of Spanish Morocco. Most storefronts feature signs in both Spanish and Arabic. Young men wear the jerseys of their favorite European soccer teams, particularly those from Barcelona and Madrid.

Although it is still not clear why so many men from Tetouan decided to abandon their lives and go to Iraq, there are some clues. Relatives and friends said several of the men were well-educated -- many took classes at local community colleges -- but struggled to make ends meet. They noted that the men's religious beliefs appeared to have deepened and that they had begun wearing long beards and loose-fitting Afghan-style clothes.

Moncef ben Masaoud, 21, died in a suicide attack in Baqubah last fall, according to neighbors and relatives. Skilled in computers and math, he had attended college classes in nearby Tangier. On July 27, 2006, he left home as usual for school, but never returned.

"He told me he'd be coming back the same day," his father, Haj Ahmed Masaoud, a tire dealer in a Tetouan market, told the Moroccan newsmagazine Le Journal Hebdomadaire. "In mid-August, he called me and told me he was doing fine. He said he was in Syria. That was the last contact we had with him."

Masaoud was a close friend of Amrani, the young father who also carried out a suicide bombing near Baqubah, as well as a third Tetouan man, Yones Achebbak, 23, who left for Iraq last fall. Achebbak's fate is unknown.

All three men attended the same mosque in Tetouan, a white-arched building perched on a slope in the slum district of Mezouak. The mosque's imam, Fatal Abdelillah, was arrested in November as part of the investigation into the Iraqi recruiting ring.

It was not the first time the mosque and the Mezouak slum had drawn the attention of counterterrorism investigators. Five men from the area are suspects in the March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid, which killed 191 people and injured more than 1,800.

Al-Qaeda recruiters have focused on Tetouan because it has several extremist mosques but also because of its proximity to Europe, Moroccan officials and analysts said. Spanish counterterrorism authorities have warned that recruiting networks are also active in the nearby Spanish territories of Ceuta and Melilla, enclaves on the northern Moroccan coast that are a holdover from the days when the region was a Spanish colony.

"Al-Qaeda was working very hard to create coordination cells in Tetouan, because it's a close point of contact to Europe," said Darif, the Moroccan terrorism analyst. He said the Moroccan cells smuggle recruits and other operatives across the Mediterranean Sea to Spain, where they pick up false passports and move on to Turkey or Syria before slipping into Iraq.

The recruiters screen rigorously, according to counterterrorism officials. Designated "watchers" hang around radical mosques and other places to look for young men angry about the conflicts in places such as Iraq and the Palestinian territories. For months, the watchers try to whip up the potential volunteers' emotions further and convince them that they have a religious duty to intervene.

"The recruitment does not exclusively take place in the poorest parts of society, nor in the category of illiterates," said Benmoussa, the interior minister. Instead, he said, recruiters "target a category of people that is extremely sensitive to what they consider international injustice."

Candidates are subjected to psychological assessments from a distance to determine if they are really willing to die for the cause. Background checks are run to ensure that they are not informers, officials said. Those who make the final cut are assigned to "handlers," who arrange the trip to Iraq.

The volunteers are sometimes trained to use explosives and weapons before they leave, but it is rare that they are taught more than the basics, said Nick Pratt, a retired Marine colonel and terrorism expert at the George C. Marshall European Center for Security Studies in Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Germany.

The recruits are valued more for their zeal than their skill because of their primary mission: suicide attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces, as well as Shiite foes in the nation's sectarian conflict. Pratt said research has shown that suicide bombings are embraced by networks affiliated with al-Qaeda because they are more lethal and generate more publicity. He said a suicide attack, on average, causes six times as many deaths and 12 times as many injuries as a conventional attack, such as a roadside bomb explosion.

"The recruiters for al-Qaeda are some of the most important players right now in that organization," Pratt said. "They have a profile, and they know what they're looking for in terms of recruits." Counterterrorism officials, he added, are more concerned with stopping the recruiters than the volunteers. "They're not so much concerned with the guys who become cannon fodder," he said.

Moroccan authorities have made several rounds of arrests since November, many of them in Tetouan. Most recently, on Jan. 4, the government said it had arrested 26 people and "smashed a terrorist structure with international connections specializing in the recruitment and transport of volunteers to Iraq."

Some Moroccan lawmakers and relatives of those arrested said U.S. officials have pressured Morocco to act since they discovered the Tetouan connection to Iraq. The U.S. Embassy in Rabat declined to comment.

Mustapha Khalfi, a member of Parliament from the opposition Justice and Development Party, said the government was arresting suspects, based on little evidence, to please U.S. officials. "They are pushing us to do some bad things," he said. "This conflicts with U.S. policy to strengthen democracy and to strengthen human rights."

Khalfi said the number of Moroccans joining the fight in Iraq had been exaggerated. At the same time, he added, as long as the U.S. military remains in Iraq, many Moroccans will feel duty-bound to help the resistance.

"There's a long tradition in the Muslim world of solidarity against occupation," he said. "It's rooted in our society. To explain it and understand it is easy."

Afghan Forces Retake Western Town (AP)

By Amir Shah,

AP, February 20, 2007

Afghan security forces supported by NATO troops on Tuesday retook a town in western Afghanistan that briefly had fallen to Taliban militants, an official said.

About 200 Afghan police and soldiers moved into the remote town of Bakwa in Farah province at 5 a.m. and faced no resistance, said Gov. Muhajuddin Baluch. He said some NATO troops joined the operation.

The Afghan forces were searching the vicinity for the militants, who moved into Bakwa on Monday and briefly held it and then left, taking three seized vehicles with them, he said.

It was the second time this month that the government has lost control of a district in the region.

Meanwhile, a U.S. soldier was killed during combat operations on Monday in the Naray area of eastern Kunar province, the U.S. military said in a brief statement.

At least 297 American soldiers have died in and around Afghanistan since U.S. forces invaded in late 2001 to topple the hard-line Taliban regime. The name of the latest fatality was being withheld pending notification of next of kin, the statement said.

U.S.-led coalition forces dropped a 2,000-pound bomb on a cave where insurgents retreated after a clash in southern Uruzgan province on Monday, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta said. He had no details on insurgent casualties.

Afghan Forces Retake District Briefly Held By Taliban (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133579

Afghan and international troops retook a district capital in southwestern Afghanistan early on Tuesday, easily pushing out Taliban rebels who held the town for around 24 hours, according to the government.

The town of Bakwa in the western province of Farah was under government control and security reinforcements were there, the interior ministry said.

"We occupied Bakwa this morning at 5:30 am (0100 GMT) and the Taliban were pushed back," spokesman Zemarai Bashary told AFP. The rebels had heard the security forces were arriving and had moved out, he said.

"Currently security has been brought back to the district. The district headquarters is okay, it is not destroyed," Bashary said.

About 300 Taliban stormed the town Monday, forcing out a weak police force that fled the area, provincial officials said.

Taliban insurgents last year captured a handful of districts in this manner but were pushed out by international forces backing the fragile Afghan government.

However, they have been holding the southern town of Musa Qala -- about 150 kilometres (93 miles) east of Bakwa -- for more than two weeks. The authorities say they are waiting for the right time to retake the area.

Citing security reasons, Bashary would not say how many security forces were involved in the early morning operation in Bakwa -- capital of a district of the same name -- or how many were in the town.

He said that the Taliban group that arrived Monday was around three times larger than the police force that had been there and numbered around 40.

Afghanistan's government is unable to establish a presence and maintain authority in vast swathes of the volatile country.

The police force is particularly stretched at 60,000 policemen for roughly 29 million people.

A priority for Afghanistan's internationally-backed efforts to find stability after three decades of fighting is to train up and boost the police.

The country is also putting in place a 11,200-strong "auxiliary police force" of men who are given guns and badges after 80 hours' training.

Asked about the weak resistance Taliban encountered in remote towns, Bashary said: "We are trying to reinforce these districts, especially the southern districts. We are trying to send auxiliary police as soon as possible."

"We have the power to reoccupy every place of country that is attacked by the enemy. But we are waiting in Musa Qala. As soon as we find a proper and good time, we will occupy the district."

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) has killed two of the commanders of the Musa Qala takeover in precision strikes but this has failed to dislodge the rebels.

The capture of the town, in the province of Helmand, is significant because the government asked British ISAF there to keep out of the area on the request of tribal elders who believed they could also keep the Taliban out.

The extremist religious Taliban movement is trying to claw its way back into power with an insurgency launched months after it was removed from government in 2001 in a US-led invasion.

The insurgency was at its deadliest last year with more than 4,000 people killed, most of them rebels, and 2007 is expected to be just as intense.

Taliban Seize Rural District In Southwest As Police Flee (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 19 — Taliban insurgents seized control of a district in southwestern Afghanistan on Monday as the Afghan police abandoned their post and fled, officials said.

The district is the second to fall into Taliban hands this month, and its capture underlines the precarious hold of the government and NATO troops in the remote districts of southern Afghanistan.

The midmorning attack occurred in the Baqwa district of Farah Province, where few NATO or Afghan troops are deployed. A small number of American soldiers run a reconstruction team in the provincial capital, but the districts are left to the local police, who lack staff and weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0133580

The police in Baqwa town warned their provincial headquarters that the Taliban were advancing in such large numbers they could not hold the district office, according to Baryalai Khan, the secretary to the provincial police chief.

"At 11:30, we lost telephone and radio contact with our police in Baqwa district, and it seems the district is in the hands of the Taliban," he said. "According to the people of the town, our policemen escaped in different directions, and the Taliban are in the district, although not in the center for fear of bombardment."

"We don't know if there are any casualties among our police," he said. "We have no contact with them." Four policemen were killed and three wounded by a remote-controlled mine in the same district on Sunday, he added.

Taliban forces have often overrun district offices in the past, sacking them and then usually leaving after a few hours. But this year they have seized and held entire regions.

British NATO forces and Afghan troops, however, claimed success in an attack over the weekend on a Taliban stronghold in Helmand Province, just east of Farah.

The operation unfolded south of Gamsir and concentrated on three major compounds, destroying a tunnel complex linking them.

"We were able to hit them hard in the largest deliberate operation there has been down there, and disrupt their command and control," Lt. Col. Rory Bruce told [a news agency] on Monday from the British task force headquarters.

He said that a "significant number" of enemy fighters had been killed, but did not give a precise figure. There were no British casualties.

On Sunday, insurgents fired twice on a Canadian military convoy moving at night through the southern city of Kandahar, a NATO statement said. Two Afghans — a homeless man and a police officer — were killed by the Canadians in the ensuing firefight, the statement said. NATO said both shootings were under investigation.

British Troops Attack Taliban Stronghold (USAT)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

British NATO forces destroyed a "major Taliban headquarters and stronghold" in Garmsir, in Afghanistan's Helmand province, Lt. Col. Rory Bruce said Monday at the British task force headquarters in London. He said the troops killed a "significant number" of Taliban fighters and disrupted their command system. The forces destroyed a network of trenches and tunnels and pushed the Taliban guerrillas from where they were massing for a spring offensive, Bruce said.

Priest, 4 nuns jailed over fatal exorcism

Romanian Orthodox priest Daniel Petru Corogeanu was sentenced to 14 years in prison in the death of a nun during an exorcism ritual at Holy Trinity convent in Tanacu, Romania, in 2005. Maricica Irina Cornici, 23, died after she was bound to a cross and left without food for three days. Corogeanu said he was trying to take evil spirits out of her and that she was restrained because she was violent. Four nuns were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to eight years.

Mexico's anti-drug troops get big pay raise

Mexican soldiers fighting drug traffickers will get a nearly 50% pay increase to insulate them from corruption. President Felipe Calderón said the raise, retroactive to Jan. 1, will increase monthly take-home pay for troops to $474 from $319. Corruption is widespread in law enforcement, and drug traffickers routinely buy off low-paid officers. Calderón has spearheaded anti-drug efforts since taking office.

Russia warns against anti-missile bases

Poland and the Czech Republic risk being targeted by Russian missiles if they agree to host a proposed U.S. missile-defense system, the head of Russia's missile forces warned. Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov said it would take less than six years to build nuclear missiles if Moscow pulls out of a U.S. agreement that banned them. He said the missile-defense plan would upset stability.

Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek said his country and Poland favor the U.S. plan to put 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar site in the Czech Republic. Russian President Vladimir Putin has said he does not trust U.S. claims that the missile-defense system is meant to counter threats from Iran.

Opium Wars (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness. NATO's crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail.

It is not that NATO should simply turn a blind eye to the opium trade. But it should focus on where it can make a difference. Success in counterinsurgency requires the ability to establish a permanent presence in ever-larger sectors and to consistently protect the population from insurgent reprisals, thus winning the minds part of the hearts-and-minds struggle. NATO's troop density in Afghanistan is still far too low to provide such security, despite the extension of duty tours for several thousand U.S. soldiers. Expanding their mission to include drug eradication will only further thin NATO's presence, while jeopardizing its ability to control areas and persuade the population that it can protect them from the Taliban. Without this assurance, the population will at best sit on the fence, and at worse succumb to Taliban pressure.

Even more important, it will cost NATO the loss of the population's hearts. The rural population is critically dependent on the opium economy for a basic livelihood. Without any viable alternatives, destroying the crop greatly antagonizes the population against those who carry it out -- local tribal elites, state officials and Kabul.

Drug eradication efforts so far have allowed the Taliban to reintegrate itself into the opium economy and rebuild some of its political capital with the population, by offering itself as a protector of the population and its poppy fields. Meanwhile, the damage to the crops has generated a new wave of economic refugees to Pakistan, many of whom have been replenishing the ranks of the Taliban. There's another critical problem. Reliable, accurate and actionable human intelligence is the key to winning a counterinsurgency campaign. The willingness of the population to provide such intelligence on the Taliban is already minimal, and NATO's direct participation in eradication will halt it altogether.

Yes, the Taliban is profiting financially from the Afghan drug trade (in addition to profiting politically from eradication), but eradication will not cut off financial resources to the Taliban, rendering it physically weak and easy to defeat. The Taliban was able to regroup and rebuild its organization in Pakistan and Afghanistan between 2002 and 2004 without access to large profits from the opium economy, which was at that time dominated by various warlords, many of whom are now government officials at all levels of the Afghan government. It was able to replenish its physical resources by donations from the Middle East and collections in Pakistan, as well as by participating in other smuggling activities. In fact, no belligerent group has been bankrupted by the effort to eradicate drugs. For example, even after years of fumigation and under pressure from the Colombian military, the FARC guerilla group is showing no signs of hurting financially. Eradication will also fail to weaken the Taliban physically; indeed it will only strengthen them politically, while undermining NATO's intelligence acquisition.

Participating in interdiction which focuses on apprehending traffickers and destroying labs is somewhat less problematic for NATO, but even such a mission is not without crucial problems. Steadily expanding in Afghanistan since the 1980s (with the 2000 eradication campaign by the Taliban being temporary and unsustainable), the opium economy deeply underlines much of Afghanistan's political, economic and social life. The traders and traffickers are not alien criminals. Many are members of tribal elites with crucial sway over the population.

Drug interdiction will at the least induce these traders and traffickers to pressure the population to stop cooperating with NATO, if not more directly support the Taliban. This could easily jeopardize as well the reconstruction and economic functions of the provincial reconstruction teams, thus further weakening the minimal efforts at long-term alternative development. Interdiction should be carried out -- by special national interdiction units -- to eliminate at least some corruption and impunity of the key traffickers, but NATO should stay out of it.

NATO does have an important role to play in counternarcotics -- namely, to defeat the insurgency. Without stability throughout the country and security on the ground, counternarcotics measures will not succeed. Alternative livelihood programs will not have a chance to take off. Without stability, even repressive measures, such as eradication, will only lead to cycles of replanting, social strife, and a strengthened insurgency.

Remember Al Qaeda? They're Baaack (LAT)

By Bruce Hoffman,

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

Defeating Osama bin Laden's resurgent terrorist network requires far more than military might.

'AL QAEDA," President Bush declared confidently in October, "is on the run." The extremists, he said, had "played their hand." The masterminds of the organization had been "brought to justice."

But just as we underestimated Al Qaeda before 9/11, we risk making the same mistake now. Although Al Qaeda is often spoken of as if it is in retreat — a broken and beaten organization incapable of mounting attacks, its leadership cut off, living in caves somewhere in remotest Waziristan — the truth is that the organization is not on the run but on the march. It has regrouped and reorganized from the setbacks it suffered during the initial phases of the global war on terrorism and is marshaling its forces to continue the epic struggle begun more than 10 years ago.

Rather than being degraded to the point that it can threaten only softer, more accessible targets like hotels and mass transit, Al Qaeda is very much sticking with its classic playbook of simultaneous, spectacular strikes against even hardened objectives. In other words, we have more to fear from this resilient organization, not less.

Ongoing investigations increasingly suggest that recent terrorist threats and attacks — the foiled 2004 plan to stage simultaneous suicide attacks in the United States, the 2005 suicide bus and subway bombings in London and the August 2006 plot to blow up 10 planes over the Atlantic — were all coordinated in some way by Al Qaeda and not by homegrown terror groups.

Consider what we have learned since the London bombings. Initially, British authorities concluded that the attacks were the work of disaffected British Muslims, self-radicalized and self-selected and operating purely within the country. We have subsequently learned, however, that the cell's ringleader, Mohamed Sidique Khan, and a fellow bomber visited Pakistani terrorist camps between late 2004 and early 2005 and met there with Al Qaeda operatives.

In addition, following the London attacks, a reliable source working for Britain's security service recognized Khan from news reports and claimed to have seen him at an Al Qaeda camp in Afghanistan in 1999 or 2000.

The London bombings' pedigree is familiar. Exactly a year earlier, British and American authorities had disrupted a plot by a London-based Al Qaeda cell to carry out simultaneous suicide attacks on the New York Stock Exchange, the Prudential Center in Newark, N.J., and the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Washington. The trail again led to Pakistan.

And this summer's plot to simultaneously bomb U.S. airliners was foiled after arrests in Pakistan again led British and U.S. officials to another British terrorist cell planning to attack American targets.

Rather than "Al Qaeda R.I.P.," we face an Al Qaeda that has risen from the grave. It has been able to adapt and adjust to the changes imposed on its operations by the U.S.-led war on terrorism and reestablish its command and control over international terrorism from the sanctuary it has established in Pakistan's North Waziristan.

Just last month, this alarming development produced a dramatic reversal in the Bush administration's public assessment of the Al Qaeda threat. In contrast to long-standing White House claims, the annual threat assessment presented by outgoing National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence painted a disquieting picture of a highly resilient terrorist movement that, he said, is cultivating stronger operational connections to affiliates throughout the Middle East, North Africa and Europe.

Al Qaeda's stunning resurrection, before the very eyes of American military forces stationed across the border in southern Afghanistan, begs the question of how the most powerful country in the world can launch a six-year, no-holds-barred, global war on terrorism — at great cost to its pocketbook and international standing — only to find the main target of these Herculean efforts still alive and kicking.

In retrospect, it appears that Iraq blinded us to the possibility of an Al Qaeda renaissance. The United States' entanglement there has consumed the attention and resources of our country's military and intelligence communities — at precisely the time that Osama bin Laden and other senior Al Qaeda commanders were in their most desperate straits and stood to benefit most from this distraction. What's more, even as we took solace in the president's argument that we were "fighting terrorists over there, so that we don't have to fight them here," Al Qaeda was regrouping.

Pakistan is both the problem and the solution to the most salient terrorist threat still directed against us. Al Qaeda and its Taliban allies could not function without the passive connivance of Pakistani authorities. Moreover, agreements concluded over the past two years between President Pervez Musharraf and the restive tribes along the Afghan border have assured Al Qaeda the noninterference with its activities that enables it to thrive. At the same time, the pivotal role played by Pakistan in the disruption of major attacks and the arrests of low-level plotters shows how dependent the U.S. remains on even this partial cooperation.

Defeating Al Qaeda requires, foremost, that our assessments and analyses be anchored firmly to sound, empirical judgment and not blinded by conjecture and wishful thinking. Second, we need to refocus our attention and efforts on Pakistan and Afghanistan, where, in the months after 9/11, Al Qaeda was indeed on the run. Third, Al Qaeda cannot be defeated by military means alone because it relies on propaganda and radicalization.

Accordingly, the U.S. needs a strategy that better combines the tactical elements of systematically destroying and weakening Al Qaeda's capabilities alongside the equally critical imperatives of countering the resonance of that movement's message and breaking the cycle of terrorist recruitment and replenishment that has both sustained and replenished Al Qaeda.

Syria's Terror Networks (WT)

By Farid N. Ghadry

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

The Syrian regime is just as complicit as Iran in moving forward hostile activities specifically designed to kill Americans. The evidence is there and widely acknowledged by those in the know, but U.S. political and military leadership have proved hesitant to publicly pursue a tandem case against both Iran and Syria, despite the very prominent linkages that exist between the two in fermenting a wide spectrum of terror operations targeting U.S. forces.

The recent implication of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard Qods Force in facilitating the movement of deadly weapons and "super" IEDs specially designed to inflict maximum casualties and penetrate armor speaks to only one half of the real story.

Regional intelligence services and inside sources from within Sunni officer corps opposed to the Assad regime have identified major foreign-fighter training camps in northern Syria and just outside Damascus overseen by Syrian Military Intelligence and run by former Iraqi Ba'athi Generals and senior Saddam Fedayeen commanders.

One major foreign fighter camp exists in the Latakia province in northern Syria, a mountainous area replete with Syrian Military Intelligence facilities and wide swaths of ostensibly government property closed to the public. The Iraqi officer in charge there is one Maj. Gen. Majid Sulayman. Yet another such camp exists 40 kilometers to the west of the border town of Qamishli, which lies in the Kurdish area in the northeastern tip of Syria bordering Iraq and Turkey; it is run by Maj. Gen. Qays al-Adhami. The al-Shaybani camp lies 30 kilometers south of Damascus and also trains foreign fighters. The al-Ikhals camp lies in the heart of the Qaysun mountain range near Damascus.

The al Qaeda connection is not that far removed. Arab papers report that the recent movement of large numbers of al Qaeda in Iraq fighters from Syria into Palestinian refugee camps in northern Lebanon and Beirut are sounding alarm bells that the Syrian security services are preparing to use these heavily armed and visibly well-funded cells to launch attacks against the anti-Syrian democratic government of Lebanon.

These cells are directed by Syrian extremists such as Shakir Absi, Abu Qa Qa, Sheikh Hashem Minqara and Abu-Khalid Imlah, who have historical ties with Syrian intelligence; all were formerly imprisoned in special detention centers run by the Political Security Directorate and then suddenly released by the good graces of Syrian security around the same time in 2005. Absi and Imlah maintain the strongest ties to Syrian intelligence. Absi -- a former officer in the Syrian air force -- and Imlah -- the former head of SMI -- supported Fatah al-Intifadah -- who later created his own Fatah al-Islam offshoot.

What's more, European security services are warning that senior al Qaeda leadership figures Abdul Hadi al-Iraqi and Atiyah Abdul-Rahman have tasked al Qaeda assets in the Levant to prepare for major international operations targeting Western Europe and even the U.S homeland. Operational planning is said to be progressing with potential targets already cased out. And these are just the Sunni extremists that the Syrians support.

Mr. Chizari, one of the major IRGC commanders netted by Coalition Forces in December, was present in Damascus a month prior to his capture where he was meeting with senior Syrian leadership and the Lebanese Hezbollah officials in charge of a specially designated "Force 2800" which focuses on supporting fellow radical Shi'ite groups like the ones responsible for the recent kidnapping and execution of four U.S. soldiers in Karbala.

Mr. Chizari is the deputy for Iraq operations to Brig. Gen. Qasim Soleimani, who in turn heads Qods Force external operations and is strategic guide to IRGC activities in the Palestinian territories, Lebanon, Iraq and Afghanistan. The super IEDs, also known as explosive formed penetrators, would never have proliferated so widely in Iraq had it not been for the work of IRGC officials like Gen. Soleimani and Mr. Chizari. Gen. Soleimani's other right-hand man, Ja'afar al-Ibrahimi, aka Abu Mahdi al Muhandis, also attended these meetings. Muhandis is a senior Badr Brigade operator with close ties to Hezbollah and a central node to the IRGC supply network to anti-U.S. Shi'ite militias in Iraq. Mr. Muhandis was also recently identified by the United States as being behind the bombing of the U.S. embassy in Kuwait in the early 1980s as well.

The Syrian-Iranian regime terror connection is further underscored by Gen. Soleimani's participation in high-level discussions on a monthly basis with Syrian leadership, including Assad's brother and brother-in law.

Imad Mugniyeh, the infamous Hezbollah special operations super-terrorist who still retains a $5 million bounty on his head -- placed by the FBI due to his role in planning the Marine barrack and embassy bombings in Beirut in 1982 -- is also said to attend these meetings. Sources say that Mugniyeh was designated by Hezbollah Secretary-General Hassan Nasrallah as the head of Force 2800.

The case is apparent and it goes beyond the circumstantial. The Syrian regime is not merely dabbling in terror sponsorship in an ad hoc manner. This is a concerted and strategic effort designed to inflict the maximum punishment upon the United States and its allies, not just in the region but across the globe.

The full scope and depth of regime involvement in enabling acts of self-sustaining terror might never be known. But enough indicators have subsequently arisen within the shadow of Iran's own pernicious designs against the United States and struggling democratic allies in the Arab world, to realize that, left unchecked, we might find ourselves suddenly overwhelmed and outflanked by an enemy that, for the sake of expediency, was ignored.

Moral Waivers And The Military (NYT)

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

The Iraq war has plunged the Army into a vicious cycle of declining standards. Multiple, extended tours of duty have sapped morale and blighted recruiting. New plans for a larger overall force could reduce pressures but would also mean that recruiters would have to meet higher quotas.

To keep filling the ranks, the Army has had to keep lowering its expectations. Diluting educational, aptitude and medical standards has not been enough. Nor have larger enlistment bonuses plugged the gap. So the Army has found itself recklessly expanding the granting of “moral waivers,” which let people convicted of serious misdemeanors and even some felonies enlist in its ranks.

Last year, such waivers were granted to 8,129 men and women — or more than one out of every 10 new Army recruits. That number is up 65 percent since 2003, the year President Bush ordered the invasion of Iraq. In the last three years, more than 125,000 moral waivers have been granted by America’s four military services.

Most of last year's Army waivers were for serious misdemeanors, like aggravated assault, robbery, burglary and vehicular homicide. But around 900 — double the number in 2003 — were for felonies. Worse, the Army does no systematic tracking of recruits with waivers once it signs them up, and it does not always pay enough attention to any adjustment problems. Without adequate monitoring and counseling, handing out guns to people who have already committed crimes poses a danger to the other soldiers they serve with and to the innocent civilians they are supposed to protect.

There is a long and honorable history of young people who have had minor scrapes with the law joining the military and successfully turning their lives around. But those who have committed more serious crimes, especially those involving weapons, vehicular homicide or sexual abuse, should generally be denied moral waivers. And those who do qualify for waivers should be monitored, counseled and carefully supervised.

The fastest way to drop the rate of moral waivers would be for the Army to rebuild its recently tarnished reputation among less problematic young Americans. That will require an end to involuntarily extended tours of duty and accelerated, multiple redeployments into combat. The military is America's face to much of the world. It ought to present the best face of American youth.

The Firing Of Carol C. Lam (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, February 19, 2007

A decision by Justice Department officials to fire federal prosecutor Carol C. Lam in San Diego for unspecified performance-related reasons is getting curiouser and curiouser.

Ms. Lam is among a dozen U.S. attorneys around the country who have been told to resign. Justice Department officials say the firings are for just cause; in Ms. Lam's case at least, the decision appears to be just political.

Ms. Lam headed the investigation into former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a prominent San Diego Republican who pleaded guilty last year to tax evasion, conspiring to commit bribery, wire fraud and mail fraud. Prosecutors say Mr. Cunningham accepted at least $2.5 million in bribes from defense contractors.

On Tuesday, a San Diego grand jury returned an 11-count indictment against Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's executive director from November 2004 to May of last year. Mr. Foggo is accused of steering business to his friend, Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman and top Republican fundraiser. Mr. Foggo gave Mr. Wilkes classified information pertaining to the CIA, competing contractors and "other matters," according to the indictment.

The Cunningham and Foggo probes are pieces of a larger, ongoing investigation into the way lawmakers directed federal contracts toward friends and campaign supporters.

Both inquiries were overseen by Ms. Lam.

Her firing appears to have less to do with performance-related deficiency than it does political retaliation by high-level Justice Department officials who may also be attempting to derail an investigation that's potentially embarrassing to other members of Congress and the White House.

John McKay's Mysterious Exit (SEAPI)

By Carl Tobias, GUEST COLUMNIST

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 20, 2007

The controversy involving December's forced resignation of U.S. Attorneys, who are the chief prosecutors for six federal districts in the West, has heated up and focused on John McKay, who recently stepped down as the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington.

On Feb. 6, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing to analyze whether the Department of Justice was sacrificing prosecutorial independence by politicizing U.S. Attorney firing and hiring. Because it is unclear why McKay was forced out, Congress must continue evaluating his departure, and, if he resigned for questionable reasons, it should address them.

The hearing produced certain information, yet it provoked new questions. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified that the resignations were for non-specific "performance-related" reasons. This prompted an immediate, sharp response from Western District of Washington Chief Judge Robert Lasnik and his colleagues: "We unanimously agreed that (John McKay) was an absolutely superb U.S. Attorney (and for DOJ) to suggest otherwise is unfair." He elaborated that local prosecutors and sheriffs and the FBI "never had the kind of service" in terms of "cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under McKay's leadership."

The expeditious, thorough, informed response by the Western District judges is extraordinary. Federal judges rarely and with extreme caution publicly address Department of Justice interaction with U.S. Attorneys' offices because of separation of powers concerns and mutual respect. However, this response's unusual nature and its thorough, expert character suggest how deeply the judges feel about McKay's abilities. Moreover, district judges know much about U.S. attorneys' competence, because that office appears daily in the judges' courtrooms.

Many others admire McKay's professionalism. Seven months before McKay was asked to resign, he earned a stellar DOJ performance review, which found him "an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the (office) and the District's law enforcement community." King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng also lauded McKay: "He did an outstanding job and took the office to a new level." In short, McKay was the U.S. Attorney's U. S. Attorney.

Like a true professional, McKay quietly tendered his resignation when asked, understanding that U.S. Attorneys serve at DOJ's pleasure. However, the suggestion that McKay's resignation was performance-related apparently proved too much and he challenged it, stating "that is unfair." The suggestion "reflects on my former colleagues in the office and the good work that we did, and I know that's not true." McKay said DOJ ordered him to resign on Dec. 7, but he "was given no explanation (and) certainly was told of no performance issues."

One concern lawmakers voiced is that U.S. Attorney resignation and appointment have become too politicized and are based on political factors, not merit, which can erode U.S. Attorneys' independence. Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., contended that even the departure and appointment of leading "federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political" considerations. Top DOJ officials strongly deny that politics prompted the resignations. In January, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stated he would not force a U.S. Attorney to leave for political reasons or stop an ongoing investigation and, at the recent hearing, McNulty agreed.

Some lawmakers have taken action. Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., said "McKay has worked diligently for our region, and it is deeply disconcerting that he could have been let go for political reasons," while Congress and the public "have no tolerance for the politicization" of his office.

Murray asked DOJ to inform her "exactly what it means by 'performance-related' reasons and reassure (her) that McKay was not dismissed solely on the basis of partisan politics."

Lawmakers should continue investigating why John McKay resigned and, if he departed for inappropriate, politically animated reasons, initiate action.

Legislators who agree with those notions must cooperate with others to ascertain why McKay left and adopt any correctives that are required.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Emails Reveal Backdating Scheme (WSJ)

By Mark Boslet And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, February 19, 2007

Mercury Complaint Claims Wide Efforts Among Executives

As part of a years-long scheme to backdate stock options at Mercury Interactive Corp., former executives allegedly altered documents, repeatedly changed the dates of some option grants, and sent each other emails discussing the improper practice, according to a court document that has been at the center of a battle over confidentiality in the case.

In one 2000 email quoted in the court document, filed in state court in California by shareholders suing the former executives, a Mercury finance executive wrote to another official about using "magic backdating ink" to manipulate the date of an options grant. Another employee whose grant allegedly was backdated was told in an email that "the stock price drop made us change the grant date" and "you will be happier with the new price."

In another incident described in the filing, insiders allegedly covered up fax headers on documents to disguise the fact that an options grant was approved by directors long after its purported date.

The court document appears to provide some of the most vivid evidence yet of how options backdating took root and flourished inside a company, depicting a culture of lax controls in which top executives openly discussed how to manipulate the dates of options to make them more favorable to themselves and other insiders.

Mercury was one of the first companies ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, and it previously has admitted that its top executives improperly altered the dates of more than 50 option grants between 1996 and 2002. The Mountain View, Calif., software company, which was acquired by Hewlett-Packard Co. late last year for $4.5 billion, previously restated years of financial results, reducing its pretax income by $566.7 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all because of options-related problems. Most of its top executives from the period in question have left the firm.

Mercury is one of about 140 companies being investigated in a broad federal probe of options backdating. Last week, a former chief executive of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. separately pleaded guilty to options-related criminal charges in New York.

Stock options, a popular compensation tool, give employees the right to buy a company's stock at a preset "strike price," typically the market price on the date of grant. In theory, recipients can't profit unless the share price rises. At some companies, executives improperly backdated grants by pretending options were issued at an earlier time when the market price was lower, thus increasing the potential profit.

The new information about the Mercury case is contained in a 35-page shareholder-derivative complaint, originally filed in September under seal in Superior Court in Santa Clara, Calif., against four former top executives of the company. On Feb. 5, the judge overseeing the case, James P. Kleinberg, ordered it dismissed on a matter of standing, ruling that the plaintiffs no longer have a stake in the company after H-P's purchase. It is unclear if the plaintiffs will appeal that order, which didn't address the complaint's merits.

Several news organizations have been waging a legal battle to have some documents in the case unsealed. The former Mercury executives have opposed unsealing the documents. Judge Kleinberg has ordered the documents opened to public view, but they remain sealed pending appeal.

A copy of the complaint was appended to another filing in the case, and a Dow Jones News Service reporter obtained the document from the court's files late Friday. Neither Dow Jones & Co. nor The Wall Street Journal is a party to the legal attempt to unseal the documents.

Although filed on behalf of two shareholders, the complaint says it was prosecuted "at the request of" a special committee of Mercury's board, which last year decided to support the shareholder suit against the four former executives. The complaint appears to lean heavily on documents and other information from an internal probe overseen by Mercury's board.

The defendants in the case are: Sharlene Abrams and Douglas P. Smith, both former chief financial officers; Susan Skaer, a former general counsel; and Kenneth Klein, a former chief operating officer. The complaint alleges the four granted themselves more than three million backdated options, locking in a total of $54.3 million in immediate paper gains. In total, the four made "millions in illicit profit" by selling Mercury shares valued at about $88 million, the complaint alleges.

Jared Kopel, an attorney for Mr. Klein, said only "we can't comment on a document that the courts ordered to remain under seal." Brandon Wisoff, an attorney for Ms. Abrams, also cited the confidentiality order in refraining from commenting.

Patrick Robbins, who represents Mr. Smith, said: "This complaint contained irresponsibly inaccurate and incomplete recitations of events involving Mr. Smith, who did nothing wrong. We are gratified that the court has dismissed these claims."

An attorney for Ms. Skaer couldn't be immediately reached to comment. In past news reports, an attorney for Ms. Skaer has denied she did anything wrong.

Email messages discussing backdating were frequent among Mercury executives, the court complaint says. In one exchange from May 1999, officials debated how to set the date of an April 1999 grant, even though the purported date had passed weeks before. "[W]hat is the date for the April grant going to be?" Susie Fregoso, a payroll manager, asked Ms. Abrams on May 5. "Right now I have it as April 7 with a price of $27.125. You had mentioned that this might change, any news?"

In another email exchange from Aug. 3, 2000, discussing whether an employee could be retroactively included in an already-issued option grant -- which would have been improper unless the company took a special earnings charge -- Assistant Controller Kathy Hawkes tells Ms. Fregoso: "I betcha that Sharlene [Abrams] will overrule these types of things...and we will use her magic backdating ink," according to the court records.

Another April 2000 email appears to describe how former Chief Executive Amnon Landan and Ms. Abrams supposedly backdated a grant to a new employee, who was promised stock options in her job-offer letter. The trouble was, Mercury's stock price was falling, and the officials wanted to wait to lock in a lower price. "The reason the paperwork was not sent out is because the stock price drop made us change the grant date so that you could get the lower price," says the April 28, 2000 message to the new hire from Ms. Fregoso, the payroll manager, as quoted in the filing. "The 'New' grant is being approved next week by Sharlene [Abrams]/Amnon [Landan]. I know it has been a while, but believe me, you will be happier with the new price." It ended with a smiley-face emoticon.

In a mid-March 2002 email, general counsel Ms. Skaer wrote to Mr. Smith, the finance chief, suggesting they use a date two weeks earlier for a grant to 30 new employees, "unless we think the price will be better than that later this month" according to the complaint. "Let me know what you'd like to do," she added.

In addition, Mercury officials falsified records, including hiring agreements, to cover their tracks, the court document asserts. Mr. Smith was hired as an executive vice president in mid-2000. According to the complaint, the board approved a grant of 450,000 options to Mr. Smith on July 25, 2000, when Mercury's stock price was $94.69.

It claims Ms. Abrams and Ms. Skaer falsified Mr. Smith's employment letter to make it appear he was hired on May 23, 2000, and then priced his options on that date, when the share price was $65.20. The backdating added $13.3 million in potential profit to the grant, according to the complaint.

A May 22 employment letter was drawn up for Mr. Smith, which he signed and dated May 23, the complaint says. Bogus compensation committee minutes dated May 23 also were drawn up, claiming the board approved Mr. Smith's grant on that date, the complaint says. But electronic "metadata," or electronic tagging information, shows that the minutes weren't created until July 26, it adds.

Other documents were falsified in early 2002, according to the records. At the time, Mercury's share price was rising, and the defendants allegedly decided to backdate an option grant to Mr. Smith and Ms. Skaer to early November 2001, when the stock was significantly lower. In January, Mr. Landan, the former CEO, sent an email to outside directors seeking their consent for the earlier date, the complaint claims. When the directors faxed back the consent forms bearing the November grant date, the complaint says, "Skaer, or someone at her direction, intentionally falsified and altered [the documents] by whiting out the January 20, 2002 fax dates at the top of the return faxes."

The supposed alteration failed because one of the faxes was sent upside down, and the original date was left on one of the documents, the complaint alleges. Final approval for the grant wasn't obtained until a Feb. 12, 2002, board meeting, when the defendants allegedly changed the date yet again, to one several days earlier in November that was even more favorable to them, the complaint says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Defendant Isn't The Only Player With A Personal Stake In The Libby Verdict (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133589

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18 — As lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. make their final argument to the jury on Tuesday, they face the daunting task of raising sufficient doubts about the government's assertion that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and federal investigators.

Prosecutors have built a detailed case to support their charges, presenting several plausible witnesses whose testimony conflicts with Mr. Libby's sworn statements. Still, the prosecution has the burden of convincing the jurors of Mr. Libby's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, an imprecise concept that makes the outcome of most complicated criminal trials unpredictable.

Peter Zeidenberg, a Justice Department prosecutor, is to begin the summation case for the government. He will be followed by Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer. As is customary in federal criminal trials, the prosecutors will have the last word, and it will be by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor. Each side will have a total of three hours.

While there are numerous lawyers on both sides, it is Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald who have emerged as the leading adversaries. They have argued dozens of legal issues before Judge Reggie B. Walton, politely jostled each other at the lectern and less politely complained about each other's tactics.

The stakes are obvious for Mr. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, who faces five felony charges for allegedly lying during an investigation of who leaked to reporters the name of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. But there are significant stakes as well for Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald.

At the end of 2003, Mr. Fitzgerald, the chief federal prosecutor in Chicago, was chosen as special counsel to investigate the leak of Ms. Wilson's identity. Her name was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak only days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, had accused the Bush White House of knowingly distorting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain material for its nuclear program in order to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Fitzgerald successfully pressed reporters to give evidence about their confidential interviews, even sending one, Judith Miller of The New York Times, to jail for 85 days before she agreed to testify to the grand jury.

Mr. Fitzgerald discovered who leaked Ms. Wilson's name to Mr. Novak — Richard L. Armitage, a deputy secretary of state and Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser — but did not bring criminal charges against them. He did, however, charge Mr. Libby, who he said had obstructed justice and committed perjury by giving untruthful answers to the grand jury and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

It was a serious crime, he told reporters, because it was like "throwing sand in the umpire's face," impeding the prosecutor's mission. For Mr. Fitzgerald, the outcome of the trial will in part be a verdict on his decision to seek Mr. Libby's indictment.

Mr. Wells, a renowned defense lawyer, has characteristically thrown himself into his work. He has bested prosecutors in the past in defending public officials, and in this case he has battled over every sliver of an issue. Mr. Wells, along with William H. Jeffress Jr., put on a short defense last week; much of their strategy was based on discrediting Mr. Fitzgerald's witnesses during cross-examination.

Lawrence Barcella, a former federal prosecutor and experienced white-collar defense lawyer in Washington, said that closing statements were important but often not as crucial as nonlawyers might think.

"Actually, opening statements are more important," Mr. Barcella said, saying that studies and conventional wisdom among trial lawyers showed that jurors typically made up their minds early in the trial.

Dan K. Webb, also a prominent defense lawyer who was the chief federal prosecutor in Chicago, disagreed. Mr. Webb said in an interview that he thought closing statements were often "the most important part of a trial" because a lawyer could weave a persuasive closing argument as well as a favorable factual summary of the case.

"It's a combination of skilled closing argument and effective cross-examinations that win most cases," he said.

In their closing arguments, both sides will strive to project believability, but with markedly different styles. Mr. Wells's closing speeches are filled with emotion and motion, as his arms wave and he strides about in front of the jury, expressing indignation at the government's case.

Mr. Fitzgerald, along with Mr. Zeidenberg, is expected to offer straightforward and unemotional presentations.

DOJ_NMG_0133590

The prosecution wants to offer a streamlined and simplified argument that Mr. Libby lied in two grand jury appearances and two F.B.I. interviews when he said he had not discussed Ms. Wilson with two reporters. To believe that, the jurors will be told by prosecutors, they will have to disbelieve several witnesses, including the two reporters.

In addition, they will have to discount the testimony of several officials who said Mr. Libby knew of Ms. Wilson's identity before he said he learned it from Tim Russert of NBC News.

Mr. Wells will probably focus on inconsistencies he and Mr. Jeffress exposed in cross-examination, demonstrating that nobody's memory is perfect.

In two days of cross-examination of Mr. Russert, for instance, Mr. Wells nicked and slashed at his credibility and character. But it was unclear if he had cast doubt on Mr. Russert's essential testimony, that Mr. Libby was lying when he swore that he had learned about Ms. Wilson from Mr. Russert.

In his opening statement, Mr. Wells said that Mr. Libby had been made a scapegoat by unnamed White House officials who wanted to protect Mr. Rove because of his political importance to Mr. Bush.

But Mr. Wells did not present any testimony to support that thesis, and will probably be barred from repeating it in his closing statement.

Trial Spotlights Cheney's Power As An Infighter (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — A picture taking shape from hours of testimony and reams of documents in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. shatters any notion that the White House was operating as a model of cohesion throughout President Bush's first term.

The trial against Mr. Libby has centered on a narrow case of perjury, with days of sparring between the defense and prosecution lawyers over the numbing details of three-year-old conversations between White House officials and journalists. But a close reading of the testimony and evidence in the case is more revelatory, bringing into bolder relief a portrait of a vice president with free rein to operate inside the White House as he saw fit in order to debunk the charges of a critic of the war in Iraq.

The evidence in the trial shows Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Libby, his former chief of staff, countermanding and even occasionally misleading colleagues at the highest levels of Mr. Bush's inner circle as the two pursued their own goal of clearing the vice president's name in connection with flawed intelligence used in the case for war.

The testimony in the trial, which is heading for final arguments as early as Tuesday, calls into question whether Mr. Cheney, known as a consummate inside player, operated as effectively as his reputation would hold. For all of his machinations, Mr. Cheney's efforts sometimes faltered as he tried, with the help of Mr. Libby, to push back against critics during a crucial period in the early summer of 2003, when Mr. Bush's initial case for war was beginning to fall apart. In some of their efforts, Mr. Cheney and his agent, Mr. Libby, appeared even maladroit in the art of news management.

While others on the White House team were primarily concerned about Mr. Bush, the evidence has shown that Mr. Libby had a more acute concern about his own boss. Unbeknownst to their colleagues, according to testimony, the two carried out a covert public relations campaign to defend not only the case for war but also Mr. Cheney's connection to the flawed intelligence.

In doing so, they used some of the most sensitive and classified intelligence data available, information others on Mr. Bush's team was not yet prepared to put to use in a public fight against a war critic.

A Quiet Scramble

At one point in the trial an adviser to Mr. Cheney recounted leaving a room in discomfort when she heard Mr. Libby sharing information from one of the government's most highly classified documents, not knowing Mr. Libby had secret presidential approval in hand. In his own testimony, Mr. Libby told of a failed effort to stanch negative coverage from Chris Matthews of MSNBC by trying to exploit a rivalry between him and Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief at NBC News.

Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby were trying in particular to distance the vice president from an assertion that Saddam Hussein had sought large quantities of nuclear material in Africa that was ultimately deemed questionable.

Mr. Cheney was given ownership of the claim by a former ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who wrote in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, that he had been dispatched to Africa because of questions by Mr. Cheney's office. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0133591

Wilson wrote that he returned from Africa highly doubtful about the claim and reported that to the Central Intelligence Agency and the State Department.

When Mr. Bush repeated the claim months later — in a 16-word sentence of his 2003 State of the Union address weeks before the Iraq invasion — Mr. Wilson wrote that he was compelled to question publicly whether Mr. Cheney had ignored his findings because they were inconvenient to the case against Iraq.

Even prosecution witnesses have testified that while Mr. Cheney had asked for more information about the accusation that Mr. Hussein sought uranium in Africa more than a year before the invasion, he did not know that Mr. Wilson was sent to investigate. And, witnesses said at trial, he did not learn about the trip until Mr. Wilson began to make his case publicly. This might explain why Mr. Cheney was so intent on debunking Mr. Wilson.

News of Mr. Wilson's mission, its findings and Mr. Cheney's supposed role in his assignment first surfaced two months before he stepped forward with his article, in reports that described him only as an anonymous former ambassador. Mr. Wilson decided to reveal himself after concluding that his anonymous account was not being taken seriously enough, according to testimony.

But those earlier reports prompted a quiet scramble by Mr. Libby to figure out who this anonymous ambassador was, who had sent him on his mission and what had happened with his findings. By the time Mr. Wilson came forward, Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney knew that Mr. Wilson had been dispatched to Africa by the C.I.A. unit where his wife, Valerie, worked. The eventual exposure of her identity as a covert operative set forth the investigation that led to Mr. Libby's trial this year.

Mr. Libby faces charges that he lied to authorities who were looking into whether, in defending against Mr. Wilson's accusations, the administration intentionally exposed the identity of Mrs. Wilson to undercut her husband and clear Mr. Cheney. A jury will decide if Mr. Libby misled investigators or, as his defense asserts, lost track of what he said or learned amid a hectic schedule.

White House officials denied several requests for comment about the testimony and the story it generally tells, citing a reluctance to comment on anything involving the trial.

Declassifying and Leaking

Mr. Wilson's July 6 article was, in Mr. Libby's view, "a very serious attack." In his grand jury testimony, which was shared in the current trial, he said the charges amounted to a potentially severe blow to the administration credibility.

And the day after the Op-Ed article ran, the president's press secretary, Ari Fleischer, said the White House had lost confidence in the uranium assertion.

Mr. Libby's notes from a White House meeting of senior presidential advisers on the morning of July 8 — the sort of meeting that staff members rarely discuss publicly — read, "Uranium story is becoming a question of the president's trustworthiness." The notes quote Karl Rove, the presidential adviser tasked with Mr. Bush's re-election, as lamenting, "Now they have accepted Joe Wilson as credible expert." The notes reflected a general concern that the White House was not moving swiftly enough to contain the damage.

What others present at that White House meeting did not know was that Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney were already conducting their own quiet campaign. Its purpose was to show not only that the White House had ample reason to believe the flawed intelligence even after Mr. Wilson's mission but also to defend against Mr. Cheney's alleged connection to the uranium claim.

Mr. Libby testified to the grand jury that an angry Mr. Cheney had by then already directed him to approach a reporter he regarded as suitable, Judith Miller of The New York Times, to make his case. Mr. Libby was under instruction to describe the vice president's ignorance of Mr. Wilson's mission and to discuss parts of the National Intelligence Estimate from October 2002 as well as another intelligence document showing the C.I.A. continued promoting the theory about Iraq's efforts to acquire uranium months after Mr. Wilson's trip.

The release of the intelligence estimate was a sensitive issue. Others in the administration had considered doing so that spring when Mr. Wilson's claim first surfaced, but faced resistance from the C.I.A. One investigator questioned in the trial testified that Mr. Libby's notes indicated that George J. Tenet, then director of central intelligence, was personally opposed to doing so.

Mr. Libby said he found a way around that resistance by getting backdoor approval from the president. In a hush-hush meeting described in testimony, Mr. Libby asked the vice president's chief counsel, David S. Addington, whether the president could declassify intelligence personally, effectively without C.I.A. knowledge or approval.

Mr. Addington testified that as he explained to Mr. Libby that indeed the president could do so, Mr. Libby shushed him. "He extended his hands out and pushed down a little like that, that would indicate, 'Hold your voice down,' " Mr. Addington said at the trial. Mr. Libby testified that Mr. Cheney then went to Mr. Bush and got a presidential declassification.

White House officials have said Mr. Bush did not know how Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby intended to use the intelligence.

Mr. Libby's attempt to use the newly declassified data with Ms. Miller failed. He met with her for two hours at the St. Regis Hotel on July 8.

But, as Mr. Libby told the grand jury, going to Ms. Miller was "a poor choice" because she never used the information.

Cathie Martin, Mr. Cheney's former communications director, recalled her discomfort at seeing Mr. Libby reading from the estimate later in the day while he called back reporters covering the story, at Mr. Cheney's direction, among them Andrea Mitchell of NBC News.

Other senior officials were perplexed when they apparently saw some of Mr. Libby's handiwork from those phone calls in action. After Ms. Mitchell reported that night on NBC News that "The White House blamed an October C.I.A. report for ignoring Wilson's information," the president's deputy national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, indicated that he had got an earful from Mr. Tenet, according to Ms. Martin's testimony.

Ms. Martin testified that at a senior staff meeting the following morning Mr. Hadley strongly hinted he thought she was responsible and told her the finger-pointing had been a disservice to the president. According to Ms. Martin's testimony, Mr. Libby let her take the blame and "looked down" as Mr. Hadley shared his chagrin. Mr. Cheney, she said, later told her not to worry about it.

Spinning Wheels

It was one of several times when Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney were portrayed as disregarding Mr. Hadley, who now holds Condoleezza Rice's former title of national security adviser but was then her second in command.

At a meeting on July 10, Mr. Hadley had suggested to Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney that the intelligence estimate could be leaked to a friendly reporter, Mr. Libby testified that his notes said. But neither he nor Mr. Cheney told Mr. Hadley that they had started trying to do so days earlier.

But all the same, their effort was by no means a smashing success.

Mr. Libby was frustrated that Mr. Matthews of MSNBC, for instance, was continuing to assert that Mr. Cheney had ignored Mr. Wilson's findings.

His notes indicate that Mary Matalin, the longtime Cheney political adviser, suggested that he call Mr. Russert to complain. NBC is a co-owner of MSNBC. "Call Tim. He hates Chris," Mr. Libby's notes read, according to testimony. His later call to Mr. Russert, he lamented to the grand jury, did not bear fruit.

The notes also indicated that Ms. Matalin said the White House needed a "Tenet-like" statement to clear the president. In fact, Mr. Tenet released a statement the following day — after tense negotiations with Mr. Libby and Mr. Hadley — taking responsibility for the bad intelligence.

Mr. Fleischer testified that he was pleased with the statement as the president's spokesman; Ms. Martin testified that it did not go far enough from the perspective of her office. And under the direction of the vice president, Mr. Libby continued his public relations push.

With the West Wing and the C.I.A. seemingly in open feud, it ultimately fell to Mr. Hadley to step forward and say on July 22 that it was his fault that the questionable claim wound up in the president's speech.

The Mystery Man In Scooter Libby Trial (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

Richard Hohlt is the heavy hitter you've never heard of.

DOJ_NMG_0133593

Robert Novak, as usual, had a scoop to unload—only this time, it was from the witness stand. Testifying last week in the trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, the conservative columnist gruffly described how he first learned from two top Bush administration officials that Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, was a CIA officer. But then Novak injected a new name into the drama—one that virtually nobody in the courtroom knew.

Asked by one of Libby's lawyers if he had talked about Plame with anybody else before outing her in his column, Novak said he'd discussed her with a lobbyist named Richard Hohlt. Who, the lawyer pressed, is Hohlt? "He's a very good source of mine" whom I talk to "every day," Novak replied. Indeed, Hohlt is such a good source that after Novak finished his column naming Plame, he testified, he did something most journalists rarely do: he gave the lobbyist an advance copy of his column. What Novak didn't tell the jury is what the lobbyist then did with it: Hohlt confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he faxed the forthcoming column to their mutual friend Karl Rove (one of Novak's sources for the Plame leak), thereby giving the White House a heads up on the bombshell to come.

The trial of Libby—who is charged with lying about his own alleged role in the disclosure of Plame's identity—has revealed much about how government officials and journalists swap secrets. But Hohlt's outing was especially revealing. Unlike many of the high-profile Washington players who have populated the Plame affair, Hohlt is a Beltway power broker of a different sort. He works quietly, rarely makes the papers and likes it that way. Hohlt, 58, came to Washington more than 30 years ago as an aide to Sen. Richard Lugar. He now represents A-list clients like Bristol Myers, Chevron, JPMorgan Chase and the Nuclear Energy Association. At the same time, he raises buckets of cash for the Republican Party: he was designated a "Super Ranger," a fund-raiser who raked in more than $500,000 for President Bush's re-election.

But Hohlt's more significant role may be his leadership of a secretive social group of GOP heavy hitters and, occasionally, White House officials, who convene to smoke cigars and mull over politics. The group's name: the Off The Record Club. Hohlt is the club's "keeper of the flame," says one participant who, like others contacted for this story, didn't want to be named because it violates the group's rules. Each month or so for more than 15 years, Hohlt has booked a room at a posh Washington hotel or restaurant and invited the guests for dinner. Among the regulars, according to three participants: fellow lobbyists Ken Duberstein, Charlie Black and Vin Weber. Rove and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten "have both attended these meetings on occasion," says a White House spokesperson. (Duberstein and Weber did not respond to requests for comment. Black wouldn't talk about the club because "one of the purposes of it is to be off the record," he says.) "It's really just a bunch of old-timers who like to shoot the breeze," Hohlt tells NEWSWEEK. "We can complain about our clients, complain about what's going on on the Hill." (Hohlt's most recent gripe: a new D.C. smoking ban that has snuffed out the after-dinner stogies.) The club, participants say, helps the White House with damage control—they prodded GOP pols to back the president's post-Katrina cleanup—and thinks up ways to get the party's message across to the press.

That's where Hohlt has proved most valuable. An accomplished information trader, Hohlt serves as a background source for a select group of Washington journalists—Novak above all. "He's known as the person you go to to try to get stuff in Novak's column," says one semiregular OTR participant. (Novak says it is "ridiculous" to suggest he writes what Hohlt wants.)

After Novak first told Hohlt that he was working on a hot story about ex-ambassador Joe Wilson, Hohlt says he e-mailed Rove to expect a phone call from Novak. Then Hohlt began pressing Novak to learn the juicy details. On July 11, 2003, three days before the column was published, Novak gave him a preview copy. (Unknown to Hohlt, Rove had already confirmed to Novak that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.) That same day, Hohlt e-mailed details about the column to Rove, and later faxed him the entire unpublished article. (Rove's lawyer confirms this account.) "I was just trying to be helpful," Hohlt says. His role as a go-between later earned him a visit from the FBI, but it stayed secret until now. And that was just fine with Hohlt, who says that his greatest accomplishment as a lobbyist has been "staying out of the press." Thanks to last week's testimony, his cover—like Valerie Plame's—is now blown.

WHAT VINCE CAN DO (PHDN)

By Michael Hinkelman

Philadelphia Daily News, February 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133594

WHEN THE FEDS delivered a hefty 267-page, 139-count indictment against state Sen. Vince Fumo on Feb. 6, they were trying to show they've got the goods on him, a former federal prosecutor said.

But is it really a "slam dunk" case against the Prince of Philadelphia, who has pleaded not guilty to the charges?

Or are there strategies that Fumo can use to beat the case?

Yes, say defense lawyers and legal experts. This case is winnable for Fumo.

Fumo is charged with defrauding the state Senate and a South Philly charity of more than $2 million by using Senate staffers and charity workers for his personal and political benefit.

His lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, calls the indictment malicious and politically motivated, and says the feds didn't appreciate or understand how Fumo's office operates.

Sprague said he didn't want to tip his hand about how he'll defend Fumo, so the Daily News contacted some prominent defense attorneys to see how they might defend the embattled pol.

Here are some strategies they suggested.

Delay, delay, delay

A prominent criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor said he would do everything he could to keep the case from going to trial.

"I'd use every legal maneuver I could," said Carmen C. Nasuti. "I'd try to get the indictment dismissed, I'd try to get evidence excluded and I'd file as many pretrial motions as I could."

Nasuti said once the trial starts and evidence is admitted, there are "little things" that can't be readily explained or easily defended.

In this case, he said, one of those little things is the allegation that Fumo hired a private eye with state money to snoop on his political rivals and his ex-wife and ex-girlfriends.

The O.J. Simpson defense

The feds investigated Fumo for four years, and Sprague has said prosecutors want to "destroy" Fumo.

Some lawyers said this could be the linchpin of a strategy where the defense tries to paint prosecutors as overzealous or having misplaced enforcement priorities.

Who else gets investigated for four years? And what else could the feds have been investigating if they didn't divert so many resources to "destroy" Fumo?

"This could be just like the O. J. Simpson case where the jury was more interested in sending a message about misconduct in the L.A. Police Department than convicting Simpson of murder," even though the evidence pointed to Simpson's guilt, said attorney Charles A. Peruto Jr.

Even if jurors have evidence of Fumo's guilt, they might "hand it back to him," Peruto said, if they think prosecutors unfairly targeted Fumo.

"Jurors would focus more on the good things Fumo has done, and the people he's helped," Peruto said.

Fumo as his own best defense

Many white-collar defense lawyers don't want their high-profile clients to testify because it's high-risk and could undermine previous gains they've made with jurors.

But Fumo's situation is different, some say.

"My own experience is, if you have an engaging client and you know he has a plausible explanation for conduct the government claims is illegal, then put him on the stand," said Jack Meyerson, a former federal prosecutor who prosecuted Fumo in 1980 on fraud charges.

Fumo, who is smart and charming, testified in his own defense in his 1980 trial.

A jury convicted him and two others in that case, but the convictions were tossed out by a federal judge and his decision was upheld on appeal.

The senator will almost certainly see the jury this time as a small group of voters he can - and must - win over. As he told his fellow senators on Feb. 5, he wasn't just in a fight to save his political career but a fight for "everything that I hold dear."

If that's the case, how can he not tell his story to the jury?

DOJ_NMG_0133595

"This case is going to hinge on Fumo's testimony," predicted attorney William Spade, a former city prosecutor who defended ex-city treasurer Corey Kemp in 2005.

"It's his to win or lose because it's all about his character, and jurors are going to want to hear from him. It's not even debatable," Spade said.

Make it about Pat, not Vince

Sprague has said the indictment was "born of political ambition," referring to U.S. Attorney Pat Meehan.

Pundits have speculated that if Meehan bags Fumo, his political upside is sky-high. He would be seen as taking down one of the state's most powerful Democratic pols and cleaning up the city's political cesspool.

"Find an explanation for [the prosecution] which is different from the government's case and try to build on that," said NiaLena Caravasos, a partner in the firm of former Philadelphia District Attorney F. Emmett Fitzpatrick.

Winning high-profile cases can launch political careers, she said.

Caravasos noted that Rudolph Giuliani first made a name for himself when, as Manhattan's U.S. attorney in 1989, he got a 98-count racketeering and securities fraud indictment of then-Wall Street junk bond king Michael Milken.

Milken copped a plea to six lesser charges and served almost two years in prison. And Giuliani? He became a two-term mayor of New York and is now a leading candidate for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008.

Play the politics card

A study by two retired communications professors of federal investigations of more than 300 local officeholders and candidates from 2001 to 2006 by the Bush Justice Department found that 85 percent of the targets were Democrats.

The Justice Department has declined to comment on the study and Meehan has said that politics plays no role in his office's investigations.

More recently, the Bush Justice Department has come under fire for removing the sitting U.S. attorney for Arkansas and replacing him with a former political operative for Karl Rove, Bush's chief political adviser.

A defense based on the Bush Justice Department's bias would almost certainly hinge on jury selection, several defense lawyers said.

"If there are an equal number of Democrats on the jury panel as Republicans, the defense might be able to take advantage of the anti-Bush administration sentiment out there," said Meyerson.

Fumo is a 24/7 guy

Fumo said during a speech on the Senate floor on Feb. 5 that his staffers "routinely" work at all hours of the day and no public business is ever slighted.

"I have a 24/7 operation," he said.

Defense attorneys said it wouldn't be difficult to find Fumo staffers to testify to this.

"I could see myself putting on a 24/7 defense," said Spade.

It's "not disingenuous" to think that Fumo staffers allegedly doing personal favors for Fumo during regular working hours made up for it by working on their own time.

"People who work hard or who love their boss or job know that you take your work home with you and you work on weekends. Jurors can understand that," Spade said.

Whichever strategy is employed, the case is fraught with potential peril for both the feds and Fumo, Caravasos said.

"This is a case that has the potential to explode for either side," she said. "The prosecution could be seen as pushing an agenda. The defense could be viewed as being disingenuous with the jury. For both sides, humility will go a long way, if they can dial it back and recognize that."

Justices To Revisit Thorny Issue Of Sentencing Guidelines In First Cases After Recess (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133596

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — The Supreme Court returns on Tuesday from a monthlong recess to face a daunting and urgent task: explaining what it meant two years ago when it ruled that the federal sentencing guidelines were to be treated as "advisory," no longer binding on federal judges.

The decision that dropped that bombshell on the criminal justice system, United States v. Booker, has not penetrated public consciousness in the way that, say, the Miranda decision on the right against self-incrimination did a generation ago. But in its own way, it has been no less revolutionary, creating turmoil in criminal sentencing.

The justices will hear arguments on Tuesday morning in two cases that will provide the latest chapter, although almost certainly not the final one, in the court's continuing and, to many, profoundly unsettling reappraisal of the roles of juries and judges in criminal sentencing.

The Booker decision came in two parts, each decided by a different 5-to-4 majority, with only Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg joining the majority in both halves. The court ruled on the one hand that the sentencing guidelines violated defendants' Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury by giving judges, rather than juries, the power to make the factual findings that determined where to set the actual sentence within the range provided by the guidelines.

It then ruled that the guidelines system could nonetheless be saved as long as the guidelines were considered advisory rather than mandatory, to be consulted by judges in the course of imposing sentences that would be upheld on appeal as long as they were not "unreasonable." A debate over the meaning of "unreasonable" lies at the heart of the two cases the court will hear on Tuesday.

The court has acquired two new justices since the Booker decision, adding still more uncertainty to this complex picture. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. replaced two justices, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who believed that the guidelines were constitutional. Those justices were thus dissenters from the first half of the opinion and joined the majority in the second half to permit the continued use of "advisory" guidelines.

But last month, Chief Justice Roberts joined the court's 6-to-3 decision striking down California's sentencing law on the ground that it gave judges more power than the court's recent precedents permit. Chief Justice Rehnquist would almost certainly have come down on the other side. Chief Justice Roberts's vote in that case, Cunningham v. California, at least suggests the possibility that the new chief justice may believe that the guidelines pose a constitutional problem that cannot be remedied by the device of calling them advisory.

In the Booker decision, the justices expected Congress, which established the guidelines system in the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, to respond by amending the law to meet the court's objections; "the ball now lies in Congress's court," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote for the majority in the decision's second half.

But Congress has not acted and shows little appetite for doing so. After allowing dozens of sentencing appeals to accumulate and watching conflicts among the federal circuits over how to interpret the Booker ruling grow more entrenched, the justices in November accepted two cases that frame different aspects of the same basic question: what is the role of the sentencing guidelines in the post-Booker world?

The new cases break down that broad question into a series of smaller questions of great practical importance:

If a sentence is within the range set by the guidelines, should that sentence be presumed to be reasonable? Does a sentence outside the range carry a presumption of unreasonableness and require a special justification? What kind of justification? If the guidelines are entitled to more weight than the other sentencing factors that Congress included in the Sentencing Reform Act, how much more weight?

On the other hand, if the guidelines are simply one factor among others, how are their often harsh terms to be reconciled with the statute's instruction to judges to "impose a sentence sufficient, but not greater than necessary"?

Of all these issues, the reasonableness presumption for a guidelines sentence is the most important, for the reason that judges have continued to impose sentences within the guidelines most of the time — in 86 percent of all sentences, according to a study last year by the United States Sentencing Commission. Of the 12 regional appellate circuits, 7 have adopted the presumption.

To the Justice Department and the sentencing commission, the agency that determines the sentencing guidelines for all federal offenses, the presumption of reasonableness is the correct response to the Booker decision, consistent with both the ruling and the statute. To the defense bar and others who criticize the sentencing guidelines as overly rigid and mechanistic, the presumption defies the constitutional holding of the Booker ruling.

The presumption "simply resurrects the system rejected in Booker," Thomas N. Cochran, an assistant federal public defender in Greensboro, N.C., told the court in the brief he filed on behalf of Victor A. Rita Jr., the defendant in one of the two new cases. Mr. Cochran will argue Mr. Rita's case, Rita v. United States, No. 06-5754. It is an appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, Va., one of the circuits that has adopted the reasonableness presumption.

Mr. Rita is a retired marine and former criminal investigator for the immigration service, 57 years old and in poor health in part because of injuries suffered in Vietnam and the Persian Gulf war. He was convicted of obstructing justice and making false statements to a federal grand jury that was investigating the sale of kits for making machine guns.

He argued that his military and government service and poor health warranted a sentence below the 33-to-41-month range provided by the guidelines. But the trial judge imposed a 33-month sentence, which the Fourth Circuit, applying the reasonableness presumption, affirmed.

In the second case, Claiborne v. United States, No. 06-5618, the trial judge was notably more sympathetic to the defendant, Mario Claiborne, who pleaded guilty in Federal District Court in St. Louis to possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Mr. Claiborne, then 20 years old, faced a sentence of 37 to 46 months.

But the trial judge imposed a sentence of only 15 months, telling Mr. Claiborne that a higher sentence "would be tantamount to throwing you away." The government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled that the "extraordinary" variance, 60 percent lower than the low end of the guidelines range, could be justified only by equivalently extraordinary circumstances, which it found were not present.

Mr. Claiborne, who is also represented by an assistant federal public defender, Michael Dwyer, has served his 15 months. If the justices uphold the Eighth Circuit, he faces resentencing and a possible return to federal prison.

Supreme Court Revisits How Much Leeway Judges Can Have In Sentencing (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON

Two years ago, the US Supreme Court struck down the federal sentencing guidelines system because it forced judges in some cases to increase a criminal's punishment based on information that had never been proved to a jury.

The Constitution says that every defendant has a right to a jury trial, and the high court ruled that such a mandatory sentencing system violates that right.

Instead of invalidating the entire guidelines system and leaving it to Congress to fix the problem, five justices agreed to craft a remedy to retain most of the guidelines. But the result has confused many judges across the country and caused federal appeals courts to rule in conflicting ways.

Tuesday, the high court is set to hear oral argument in two cases that analysts say may help clear up some of the confusion. The decision will be closely watched.

"We are talking about the rules that govern every federal case – 80,000 cases a year," says Marc Miller, a law professor and sentencing scholar at the University of Arizona College of Law.

In its 2005 decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the sentencing guidelines were no longer mandatory, only advisory. "The district courts, while not bound to apply the guidelines, must consult those guidelines and take them into account when sentencing," Justice Stephen Breyer, declared in a second part of that decision.

Justice Breyer didn't stop there. He and his four colleagues empowered the appeals courts to police this new sentencing system by examining whether sentencing judges were being unreasonable in the way they determined punishment.

In a dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia warned that Breyer's remedial action would "wreak havoc" in federal district and appeals courts. Although it is unclear exactly how much havoc has been wreaked, there is no doubt that many courts are struggling to interpret the decision.

At issue is how much weight judges should give to the guidelines now that they are only advisory?

DOJ_NMG_0133598

On one side are those who argue that sentencing judges should be free to adopt or reject the guidelines on an equal footing with several other factors Congress has identified as important sentencing objectives. The key, they say, is that judges rely on reasoned judgment rather than a mechanical guidelines formula to mete out punishments.

On the other side are those who say the guidelines must be afforded an exalted status among sentencing factors since they represent the collective wisdom of the US Sentencing Commission created by Congress.

Five of the nation's 12 appeals courts have embraced the former approach, while seven have embraced the latter approach.

Specifically, the question is whether appeals court judges should award a presumption of reasonableness to any sentence imposed within the range of the guidelines.

Such an approach promotes clarity, stability, and uniformity in the sentencing nationwide, supporters say.

Critics say it erodes the advisory nature of the guidelines and judicial flexibility at sentencing, potentially raising the same constitutional objection that led to mandatory guidelines being struck down in 2005.

The two cases being heard Tuesday had been decided by appeals courts that award a presumption of reasonableness to sentences imposed within the guideline range.

One involves Victor Rita, a decorated combat veteran of the Vietnam and Gulf wars, who was convicted in North Carolina of making two false statements to federal agents about a parts kit he had purchased for a vintage battle rifle. Mr. Rita had no prior criminal history and there were no aggravating characteristics related to his background. But a pre-sentence report prepared under the federal sentencing guidelines classified Rita as an "accessory after the fact" to alleged import violations by the company that sold him the parts kit.

That classification – never presented to the jury at his trial – doubled his potential prison term from 15 to 33 months.

The judge sentenced Rita to 33 months in prison in accord with the guidelines. The Fourth US Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the sentence as presumptively reasonable since it was within the guidelines.

Rita's lawyers say the courts placed too much weight on the guidelines and never explained why other factors pointing to a lesser sentence were rejected.

The other case involves an example of a judge imposing a sentence that is less than half as long as the guidelines suggest.

Mario Claiborne pleaded guilty to distribution and possession of crack cocaine. He had evidence of a stable home life, no prior criminal history, and no one was threatened or injured during the crime. But the bag of crack cocaine weighed 5.03 grams. The extra 0.03 grams significantly increased his potential prison term.

Nonetheless, Mr. Claiborne's sentencing judge rejected the suggested guidelines sentence of 37 months and instead imposed a 15-month prison term.

Federal prosecutors appealed, and the Eighth US Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the sentence. The appeals court said that a guidelines sentence is "presumed reasonable" and that a sentencing judge who rejects the guidelines sentence must offer a compelling justification to warrant the difference between the higher and lower sentence.

The Bush administration is urging the court to declare that guidelines are entitled to a presumption of reasonableness.

"The guidelines are written and revised by an expert agency, with an intent to integrate [all other sentencing] factors and with input from Congress and sentencing judges across the country," writes US Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief.

Lawyers for Claiborne and Rita say the sentencing judge should consider all the relevant sentencing factors and hand down a fair and just sentence. If the guidelines are truly advisory, a judge's sentence should be upheld, they say, even when it deviates from the guidelines.

The ruling is not likely to change dramatically the leniency or severity of most sentences, analysts say, but if the court rejects the presumption-of-reasonableness approach, it will probably trigger a somewhat greater variation of sentences.

DA BOOTS PROBER-TURNED-MOB-SWEETIE (NYPOST)

By Larry Celona

The New York Post, February 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133599

An investigator for the Brooklyn DA's Office has been forced to resign amid allegations she fell for a jailed mobster - and hatched a plan to bear his love child, The Post has learned.

The 37-year-old prober had been assigned to protect the "mob associate" while he was being held in secret hotel rooms for interviews about the bombshell corruption case involving ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio, sources said.

The sources identified her as Maria Biagini, a 15-year veteran of DA Charles Hynes' office who left her job last week.

A Hynes spokesman confirmed the investigator's resignation, but declined to elaborate.

The former investigator, who is now the subject of a federal probe, could not be reached for comment.

Hynes had temporarily taken custody of the federal prisoner to interview him about DeVecchio, the sources said.

DeVecchio is the one-time star FBI supervisor accused of giving sensitive - and deadly - information to Colombo boss Gregory "The Grim Reaper" Scarpa.

Biagini was assigned to keep the mobster under wraps and protect him while he was out of jail, the sources said.

She allegedly loosened her prisoner's strings and allowed him to contact his family and take money from relatives. He used the cash to throw dinner parties, attended by his family and the investigator - all in violation of DA policies, the sources said.

After the prisoner was returned to jail, the investigator allegedly wrote him several letters and visited - which led authorities to uncover their relationship.

In one letter, she suggested a bizarre scheme to get him released to a fertility doctor, who would collect sperm that could be used to impregnate her.

Authorities declined to identify the witness, but insisted he hadn't been a major player in their case and wasn't expected to testify in court even before the relationship was discovered.

Once the FBI's most famous gangland agent, DeVecchio was indicted almost a year ago on four murder charges for allegedly providing inside information to the mob, which then ordered the killings.

Brooklyn prosecutors charged DeVecchio had a "corrupt" relationship with Scarpa, who allegedly had the agent on his payroll in the 1980s.

Scarpa died in 1994 from AIDS.

DeVecchio has maintained his innocence, and his lawyer called word of the investigator's resignation "disturbing."

"If it's true, it's obviously very disturbing," said the lawyer, Mark Bederow.

FBI Probes Edmund Ford's MLGW Bills (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 20, 2007

Action News 5 has learned federal agents have subpoenaed records from Memphis Light, Gas and Water concerning City Councilman Edmund Ford's previous utility payments.

Sources tell Action News 5 the FBI has interviewed a number of City leaders during the past week and a statement from the public utility confirms that officials there have responded to a subpoena for records. Their interest - we've learned - revolves around embattled Councilman Edmund Ford, recently indicted on charges he took bribes in exchange for votes.

Sources confirm that agents have subpoenaed three years worth of utility bills in Ford's name.

FBI Questions MLGW About Edmond Ford (WHBQ)

WHBQ-TV, February 20, 2007

-- Memphis, Tenn. (WHBQ FOX13 MyFoxMemphis.com) -- The FBI and MLGW are working together as part of a federal investigation that involves a Memphis City Council member.

FOX13 has confirmed that FBI agents questioned several MLGW employees about a former customer, who was also the former chairman of the city's utility committee, Edmond Ford.

Last week MLGW hosted some unexpected guests.

"Last Tuesday and Wednesday we were visited by representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation," said Odell Horton, Jr., an MLGW attorney.

MLGW said the federal agents, armed with a subpoena, spent several hours over the two days talking to four employees.

"They were asking about a particular person's accounts...They were asking in particular to an ongoing investigation. It is my understanding that at this point and time it is inappropriate to talk about a particular person's account," said Horton, Jr.

Horton said the company had no idea the FBI agents were coming, but said MLGW cooperated completely.

The visit by the FBI comes amid a federal corruption investigation into Memphis City Councilman Edmund Ford, the former chairmen of the council's Utility Committee.

"I think at this point in time it is inappropriate to talk about any customer's account," said Horton. "They were asking about billing. Issues with billing, what type of issues were they looking for in terms of billing in terms of payment plans and those types of things," said Horton.

Despite MLGW's statement, FOX13 has confirmed that federal investigators did question employees about Councilman Ford.

So what happens next?

MLGW said it expects to forward some paperwork to the FBI over the next couple of days.

It's not clear if the agents will be returning to MLGW.

Ford's attorney Michael Schools had no comment for the story. He said neither he nor his client has any idea what the feds are looking for or what it's connected to.

FOX13 was unable to get in contact with with the FBI.

Councilwoman Carol Chumney, the current chair of the utility committee, said she didn't know about the FBI visit, but she plans to make inquiries into what happened and why she wasn't informed.

Councilman Once Oversaw Budget, Hasn't Been Paying (MCA)

By Trevor Aaronson

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 20, 2007

Indicted City Councilman Edmund Ford hasn't been paying his power bills -- and federal authorities want to know why.

Last week, the city's publicly owned utility company, Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division, received federal grand jury subpoenas requesting all billing information for three of Ford's MLGW accounts as well as internal communications related to those accounts.

Advertisement

MLGW general counsel Odell Horton Jr. confirmed that money is owed on the accounts but would not say how much. He refused to disclose the property addresses to which the utility accounts were assigned.

"MLGW is cooperating with an ongoing investigation," Horton said. "At this point in time, we think it is inappropriate to discuss any particular customer's account regarding this investigation."

Horton said MLGW will comply with the subpoenas by Friday.

The owner of E. H. Ford Mortuary Service, Ford was until recently chairman of the council's General Services & Utilities Committee, which oversees MLGW's budget and spending.

It's unclear whether the subpoenas relate to a new investigation of Ford or an inquiry into possible malfeasance at MLGW.

Ford did not return calls, and MLGW president and chief executive Joseph Lee III declined to comment.

This isn't the first time Ford, who has declared bankruptcy three times, proved to be a problem customer for MLGW.

In January 2003, before Ford was appointed chairman of the committee that provides oversight to MLGW, The Commercial Appeal reported that the councilman's electricity service had been disconnected multiple times for overdue bills ranging from $120.66 to $4,342.18. At the time, Ford advocated flexible billing plans at MLGW.

"Sometimes my business is good, sometimes it's bad," he told the newspaper in 2003. "That's not the issue. It's not about my bill."

Now, it is about Ford's bill. And MLGW already has begun to combat the public-relations problem.

On Feb. 15, two days after MLGW's attorney said the company received the first subpoena, the public utility announced a plan to increase collection efforts on nearly $6 million in delinquent accounts.

Money has been at the root of the council member's recent legal problems. On Dec. 19, 2006, federal prosecutors indicted Councilmen Ford and Rickey Peete on bribery and extortion charges following an FBI sting starring lobbyist Joe Cooper.

FBI Unit Aims To Focus The Inquiry On Child Abductions (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 20, 2007

Special Agent Dirk Tarpley was working a routine day on the FBI's violent crime squad last month in Kansas City when he got the call.

"Can you go?" was the question, even before he was told where or why.

Within an hour, Tarpley was rushing across Missouri, astounded to be headed to a place he had been just four months before, after someone kidnapped a girl named Abby Woods.

This time the missing child was a boy named William "Ben" Ownby.

Tarpley is a member of the bureau's 48-member Child Abduction Rapid Deployment Team, a year-old unit designed to rush experienced help to local police dealing with a suspected abduction.

Neither Tarpley nor other investigators interviewed for this report would comment on the case against Michael J. Devlin, who has been charged with kidnapping Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck, or the specifics of the investigation.

But they are eager to talk about what their new setup offers, saying they hope it causes local authorities to call them more quickly and more often.

Both Ben and Abby were taken from Franklin County, where Sheriff Gary Toelke worked closely with the team.

"I couldn't ask for better help than what we got," Toelke said. "If this was a member of my own family, I'd want them investigating."

Before the formation of the team, each FBI office relied on its own expertise, said Roland Corvington, special agent in charge at St. Louis. It could reach out to other offices or to a child abduction unit at Quantico, Va., but most of that help would be by phone.

Now, specialists arrive in person within hours, drawn from across the region. Some agents drove or flew to Franklin County from Oklahoma, Texas, Ohio and Wisconsin.

In the Ownby case, the family notified the sheriff's office, which summoned the FBI. Supervisory Special Agent Tom Blades said an agent was sent from Rolla, Mo., who assessed the situation and called for the rapid deployment unit.

In such a case, calls go out to assemble a team of four to six of the members who are closest and available to leave immediately.

They bring equipment, training and experience investigating kidnapping, violent crime and all kinds of offenses against children. Contrary to common misconceptions, the FBI doesn't have to wait 24 hours or until there is evidence a state line was crossed.

The most hectic time in any investigation is the start, Tarpley said, calling it "controlled chaos." The unit specializes in taming it.

Agents advise local investigators on steps to take and leads to follow. "We're there to help focus the investigation," he said. The FBI teams, said Tarpley, "aren't going to solve any cases per se. The one thing the bureau can bring is an incredible amount of experience and resources..."

Corvington says the team keeps the local strategy on the right track. He noted, "We can't allow ourselves to waste time following one particular path when we should be on another."

Sheriff Toelke called the outside help "just unbelievable."

Local investigators may be good, Tarpley said, but they may have never seen a child abduction before — or not seen as many as the members of the Child Abduction Rapid Deployment team.

He had high praise for local officials on the Franklin Couny cases.

Contrary to the FBI's common portrayal on TV, Tarpley said, agents don't come in and take over. "We're just there to assist," he emphasized.

DOJ_NMG_0133602

"It's not about credit. We come in under the radar, and we leave under the radar. And that's the way we like it. Anything that happens is the result of the hard work of the local and federal investigators on the ground," Tarpley said. "We just act to focus it."

Once the focus is achieved, the team may slip away. In fact, members of the team were gone before Ben and Shawn were found in Devlin's apartment, Tarpley explained. "We had done our job."

A Few Degrees Of Separation From Hillary Clinton's Top Adviser (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Mark J. Penn is a man who wears many hats: high-paid political and corporate pollster, chief executive of an international communications and lobbying company, and chief strategist to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Enough connections for you?

Well, there are more. Penn's firm, Burson-Marsteller Worldwide -- with 2,000 employees and $300 million a year in revenue -- owns BKSH & Associates, the major lobbying firm chaired by Charles R. Black Jr. That's right, Black, counselor to Republican presidents, reports to Clinton's top strategist.

The connections get even more entangled. Burson-Marsteller is a subsidiary of WPP Group, a London-based advertising and PR giant that owns many of the biggest names on K Street. These include Quinn Gillespie & Associates, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, Timmons & Co., Ogilvy Government Relations Worldwide (formerly the Federalist Group), Public Strategies Inc., Dewey Square Group and Hill & Knowlton.

To be more precise, Penn's parent company employs as lobbyists and advisers an ex-chairman of the Republican National Committee (Edward W. Gillespie), a former House GOP leader (Robert S. Walker), a top GOP fundraiser (Wayne L. Berman), and the former media adviser to President Bush (Mark McKinnon).

WPP's Democrats are just as well known. They include an ex-aide to President Jimmy Carter (Anne Wexler), an ex-aide to President Bill Clinton (Jack Quinn), an ex-Cabinet officer for Clinton and Bush (Norman Y. Mineta), and a former top presidential campaign adviser for Al Gore and John Kerry (Michael J. Whouley).

The range of interests represented by these people is a staggering list of corporate America's who's who, with Penn himself a longtime adviser to Microsoft.

"This is a classic example of how big money has inextricably intertwined the campaign advising and lobbying worlds of modern-day Washington with potential conflicts of interest all over the place," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

WPP insists that things are not quite so intertwined and that its units are strictly segregated. "The various WPP businesses are purposely run independently, and there is no risk of any conflict between clients," said Howard Paster, who is Penn's boss, an ex-aide to President Clinton and a high-level volunteer for Hillary Clinton's campaign.

"I also, personally, don't do any lobbying," added Penn, 53.

But WPP does encourage cross-referrals, especially to avoid conflicts within its firms. "We occasionally will do things with one of the other companies," said Quinn, whose firm worked with Burson-Marsteller's polling firm, Penn, Schoen & Berland Associates, on the reelection of Italy's former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi. The polling firm, of which Penn remains president, is the WPP unit that will be paid millions by the Clinton campaign for Penn's attention.

And Clinton will be happy to pay it. "He's a critical member of our campaign, and we're lucky to have him," Clinton spokesman Phil Singer said.Jefferson's Reprieve?

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has reversed the conviction of a former District police detective in a case that experts believe might make it tougher for the feds to prosecute Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

The court voted 7 to 5 on Feb. 9 to overturn the 2002 conviction of Nelson Valdes on three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450.

But the court ruled that the gratuities law did not apply to Valdes's conduct -- his use of the databases was not "an official act" because it did not spur a police investigation.

The same issue hovers around Jefferson. He's under investigation for allegedly taking cash -- $90,000 of which was famously found in his freezer -- in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange business deals. Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to giving Jefferson money to promote a company marketing new technology in Africa. But was that promotion an "official act"?

"Prosecutors are not only going to have to prove that a gratuity was given," said ethics expert Kenneth A. Gross, "but that it was for an action that was within the official duties of the government official." That's now harder after Valdes.Earmarks We're Us

Citizens Against Government Waste is Washington's leading opponent of pork-barrel spending. Its annual Pig Book, which lists the government's narrow giveaways, is used by news outlets worldwide to ridicule federal earmarks.

But now that these pet projects are being scaled back -- the Pig Book this year will be more a pamphlet than a book -- CAGW is expanding its other efforts against government wastefulness. It is stepping up campaigns against farm subsidies and federal interference on the Internet. It's also going global, fostering affiliates as far flung as South Korea and Jamaica.

Luckily, its donations remain strong despite the decline of earmarks, said President Thomas A. Schatz, who has worked for the $5 million-a-year group for two decades. "We haven't seen the end of waste -- to say the least," he said.Democratic Hires of the Week

Democrats, who are now in demand thanks to their takeover on Capitol Hill, are shuffling jobs all over town. Bruce Andrews was stolen away from Quinn Gillespie & Associates to run the Washington office of Ford Motor Co. He will be replaced at Quinn Gillespie by Chris McCannell, former chief of staff to Rep. Joseph Crowley (D-N.Y.).

Elsewhere, Stephen Brown left Dutko Worldwide to open the Washington office for Tesoro, an oil refining and marketing firm. R. Scott Silverthorne left the Capital One Financial's lobby shop to become vice president for government affairs of MasterCard Worldwide. And Broderick Johnson, a former chief House lobbyist for President Bill Clinton, is moving to Bryan Cave Strategies from AT&T. Johnson, one of Washington's top African American lobbyists, was pursued for weeks by several firms and was represented by superlawyer Robert Barnett.

Democratic job jumping has been particularly pronounced among high-tech groups. Former congressman Dave McCurdy (D-Okla.) departed the Electronic Industries Alliance after nine years to head the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers. Harris Miller, former president of the Information Technology Association of America, was named president of the Career College Association. And David Hantman, chief of staff to Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), will join Yahoo's lobbying office.It's All in a Name

RightClick Strategies, a consulting firm that has long helped Republican lawmakers design their Web sites, changed its name after last year's elections to Adfero Group, erasing any implication that it's only right-leaning. The firm said the switch was planned before the Democratic sweep.

Parry, Romani DeConcini & Symms, on the other hand, is extremely straightforward. Its Web site is LobbyCongress.com.

Gunman Ignites Frederick Inferno (WP)

By Philip Rucker And William Wan

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

A gunman entered a liquor store in Frederick yesterday, shot at police, locked himself in the store during a 30-minute standoff and ignited a fire that engulfed and gutted a two-story shopping plaza along one of the Western Maryland city's major commercial corridors, police said.

James Douglas, 29, of Frederick walked into Jim's Liquors at Antietam Village Center about 12:30 p.m., showed the owner a handgun and told him, "Get out," Frederick Police Lt. Thomas Chase said. Police said the store's owner, whose name they would not release, called Douglas a frequent customer and knew him by a nickname, "Menace."

Nobody else was in the store, Chase said, and the owner left to call police. When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door. Police then surrounded the shopping plaza and ordered nearby businesses to lock their doors and windows.

DOJ_NMG_0133604

Alone in the store, Douglas called friends and relatives on his cellphone. Police crisis management officers reached him on the line, Chase said.

"While we were negotiating with him, he set the store on fire," Chase said.

Authorities had not located Douglas last night, and police said it is likely that he died in the fire. Nobody else was injured, Chase said. He added that a search of the liquor store will begin this morning.

Douglas apparently lit boxes of liquor to ignite the blaze, which spread quickly and destroyed all 14 stores in the center, Chase said. "It's completely gutted," he said.

The 1970s-era shopping center, in the 1500 block of Opossumtown Pike, is at the heart of Frederick's commercial corridor. Roads around the center were closed for nearly four hours, snarling holiday traffic.

Businesses destroyed in the blaze included a branch of Frederick County Bank, a Dunkin' Donuts, a Quiznos sandwich shop, a medical supply store, a hair salon and a dry cleaner. A restaurant on the bottom floor, Latino Grill, was going to open next week, but it was destroyed.

Police have not determined why Douglas targeted the liquor store but said there are no confirmed past grudges with the owner. Authorities characterized the incident as an attempted armed robbery.

"Anytime a guy walks into a liquor store with a gun, it would draw us to conclude that he's robbing the place," Chase said.

Douglas lived one block from the store in the three-story Country Hill Apartments, according to several neighbors who said they were his friends. They said when they heard sirens, they went out to watch.

Leslie Horner, 33, said she listened as a friend and Douglas talked to each other on their cellphones. The friend asked Douglas, " 'Do you have anyone in there with you? Do you have any hostages?' " said Horner, who said she has known Douglas for 10 years. She said she will never forget his answer: " 'No, it's just me and God in here now.' "

Another friend, Shantel Harris, said Douglas "said he wanted to come out, but he was so scared they'd shoot him."

While firefighters hosed down the ambers, a woman who identified herself as Douglas's sister ran through the police tape screaming and cursing at authorities.

"I lost a life!" she yelled, pointing at the charred shopping center. She would not give her name to reporters.

The fire let off billowing clouds of black smoke and a pungent odor from burning brick and metal across Frederick, witnesses said.

Bottles of alcohol accelerated the fire, Chase said.

"You could hear muffled popping sounds as the liquor bottles were burst from the flames," he said.

Bystanders said they could feel heat from the fire a block away.

Flames tore through the shopping center surprisingly fast, said George William, manager of a Roy Rogers restaurant across the street.

"I was in shock," he said. "It was dark. We have a fog all over the place. The roadway was just covered in smoke."

Eyewitness Jim Conway said: "The cannons of water were just pouring into the building. When I came here, the middle of the roof was still up, and now just look at it."

The flames melted the center's brown metal roof, which was left hanging in slivers.

It took nearly one hour for firefighters to control the blaze in the smoldering shopping center. As late as 5 p.m., small fires were still burning in one of the shops.

Staff members at La Petite Academy, a child-care center across the street from the plaza, who were supervising more than a dozen children, locked the center's doors for 3 1/2 hours after learning that a gunman was in the area. "As soon as we heard about the incidents going on, we immediately went on lockdown," employee Nicole Ohanian said. "It was just for the children's safety."

Employees in an accounting firm, also across the street and also under lockdown, said they watched the blaze from their office windows.

A man who would identify himself only as Kim said he has owned Antietam Village Dry Cleaners in the center for 12 years. He was evacuated and left his papers, car keys and coat in the store.

"Someone started shouting, 'Get out! Get out!' " Kim said, standing coatless in the frigid winter air.

DOJ_NMG_0133605

Danielle Poe, on her way to her job as a medical assistant at Plastic Surgery One, pulled into the parking lot and found police officers with guns aimed at the liquor store. She was not allowed to get out of her car.

"There were cops with assault weapons," said Poe, 26.

One officer "told everyone to get back because they were in the line of fire," she said. "I saw some people run. . . . Two seconds later, there were flames inside the store. Within minutes, the whole top floor of the building was in flames."

Nancy Piper, 58, who has lived a block away for 30 years, was a longtime customer of Jim's Liquors.

"It had a great bunch of people working there," Piper said. "They would even carry your purchases out to the car for you. Everyone was on a first-name basis with them."

After A Rampage, Trying To Grasp What Led A Son To Kill (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 19 — At 1 a.m. last Tuesday, the parents of Sulejman Talovic called the police to report him missing. After watching television news coverage, they feared he might be among those dead or wounded in a shooting rampage at a mall here. One hour later, with the arrival of detectives, they discovered the shocking truth, that their son, 18, was the gunman.

In six minutes on the night of Feb. 12, Mr. Talovic shot nine customers at the Trolley Square mall, killing five and seriously injuring four others. The attack ended when the police shot and killed Mr. Talovic after he refused to surrender his 12-gauge shotgun.

Mr. Talovic's motive remains a mystery, investigators say.

In the week of grief and confusion since the shooting, the Talovic family has been struggling to unearth some explanations. Their reflections, inadequate as they may seem, revolve around a handful of formative experiences: war in his native Bosnia, rejection at school and difficulty in assimilating in the United States, they said Sunday in the living room of his aunt's tidy apartment.

If the public has come to see Mr. Talovic as a deranged killer, the family knew him as a shy and generous boy.

The gunman's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, and his father, who was visibly exhausted, spoke to a reporter just hours after Mr. Talovic's body was cleansed in an Islamic ritual in preparation for its burial in Tuzla, Bosnia, expected later this month, and after days of funerals for shooting victims across the Salt Lake Valley.

At the funerals, two of the victims' families called on the public to forgive the teenager and to support his family in their sorrow.

The Talovics are saddened and bewildered, said the father, Suljo Talovic, 42. The last time he saw his son alive was at home after work, he said. Sulejman had returned from his job at a uniform laundry company, showered and left without comment. At 2 a.m., detectives came to the door and informed the family of his crime and death. Within hours, Sabira Talovic, Sulejman's 37-year-old mother, collapsed and was hospitalized with what her husband said was a heart attack.

"It's very painful," Suljo Talovic explained, his syntax slightly imperfect but his message clear. "I have pain for my son. I have pain for everybody who has died. I am sorry for everybody."

The Talovics had no information on how Sulejman had obtained his weapons and ammunition. The police could not be reached to comment on a report in The Salt Lake Tribune that the shotgun had been bought legally at a sporting goods store.

In Bosnia, the Talovics lived on a small subsistence farm in the village of Talovici. Suljo Talovic, also a carpenter, often worked on construction projects in Switzerland and in Belgrade, the Yugoslav capital. Until Serbian forces began a siege of Talovici in April 1992, they said, theirs had been a humble but happy life, surrounded by more than 100 relatives.

When the Serbian militias arrived, Suljo hid in the hills. In the village, his family went without food for days at a stretch. Life was defined by explosions and gunfire. The family said Sulejman, then 4, had seen his baby sister die at home because of a lack of medicine. Some family members believed he had seen his grandfather's execution, though there was disagreement over that.

After a year, Sabira escaped with Sulejman on foot and on a relief supply truck to Srebrenica. Some weeks later, her husband was reunited with the family in Tuzla, where they remained for several years.

DOJ_NMG_0133606

In 1998, Sulejman and his family moved to Utah, where his aunt, Ms. Omerovic, the sister of Suljo, had established roots. In the Sunday interview, Ms. Omerovic expressed gratitude to Americans, who she said had helped the refugees to "forget about the war," a sentiment expressed repeatedly in recent days by Bosnian-Americans in Utah.

Sulejman, a bashful child, struggled with English and with relationships. Ms. Omerovic, who sometimes supervised him as a dishwasher at the Utah Jazz arena, said she had seen her nephew joking with co-workers. "He was willing to be friendly," she said. "He just didn't find his way on how to do it."

In 2004, two classmates threatened Sulejman with a knife, his father said. His mother, frightened, then signed a form releasing him from attending school, the family said.

Sulejman began accompanying his father to construction jobs, and he readily handed over his earnings to help his parents and three younger sisters.

Police investigators are now trying to assemble a psychological profile of Sulejman.

His father, who says he abhors violence, said that perhaps his son had been affected by an accumulation of bad experiences, "a little bit, little bit, little bit, and after too much, he's like an explosion."

The Talovics said they wished they could question Sulejman and understand the shooting. Ms. Omerovic said the Bosnian civil war alone as an explanation made no sense to her because all Bosnians had been "touched by war" but had not committed crimes.

"We are praying to God," the aunt said, "and asking God to forgive Sulejman for what he did and to forgive his soul."

Florida Executioner Says Procedures Were Followed (NYT)

By Lynn Waddell And Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

TAMPA, Fla., Feb. 19 — A member of Florida's execution team told a panel studying lethal injection protocols on Monday that intravenous lines had been placed properly in the arms of a condemned inmate who took 34 minutes, twice as long as normal, to die.

The man, who testified by phone and whose voice was electronically altered to shield his identity, said he had medical qualifications but would not elaborate. He added that in any event he did not consider the execution a medical procedure.

"Absolutely nothing is remotely connected with medicine," the man told the panel, which former Gov. Jeb Bush appointed in December to study whether Florida's lethal injection system could be improved. "From that point on, the condemned inmate will not leave the chamber alive. It is done as quickly as possible. It is done as humanely as can be done under the circumstances."

The man, who identified himself only as "medically qualified," was the second member of Florida's execution team to address the panel this month.

On Feb. 9, the lead executioner in the case of Angel Diaz, who took 34 minutes to die, told the panel, "I have no medical training or qualifications."

Some witnesses to the execution have said that Mr. Diaz, who was put to death on Dec. 13, gasped and appeared to grimace in pain as the procedure stalled. But state corrections officials have told the panel that he did not voice discomfort or appear to be in pain.

A preliminary medical examiner's report suggested that intravenous needles placed in Mr. Diaz's right and left arms plunged through his veins into tissue, preventing the drugs from quickly entering his bloodstream. An autopsy found a 12-inch chemical burn on Mr. Diaz's right arm and an 11-inch burn on his left.

Mr. Bush halted executions in Florida on Dec. 16, when the preliminary autopsy results came out, and appointed the panel to study lethal injection protocols. The panel is to submit recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist by March 1.

Monday was the fifth time that the lethal injection commission met. It has heard testimony from doctors and prison officials as well as from members of the execution team. State Senator Victor Crist, a member of the panel who helped write Florida's lethal injection law, said Monday that based on the testimony so far, he did not think anything had gone wrong with Mr. Diaz's execution other than the unusual amount of time it took.

Like most states with lethal injection, Florida uses three drugs: one to put the inmate to sleep, one to paralyze his body and a third to stop the heart.

Senator Crist, who is not related to the governor, said he planned to recommend several changes to ensure that future executions did not raise questions about whether the execution was done properly and whether the inmate suffered. He said camera surveillance should be added so that the execution team, stationed outside the execution chamber, could view the inmate from angles other than through the existing window.

He also said that the inmate's IV line should be checked after the administration of each drug to make sure it was properly inserted, and that the inmate should be "thumped or shaken" to make sure he was unconscious after receiving anesthesia.

"Doggone it, go out there and thump on them, shake the body to make sure they are out," Senator Crist said. "If the first drug is administered properly, then regardless of what else is pumped into his system he will never know it."

Armed And Dangerous (WP)

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

CPL. KEITH Washington, the Prince George's County police officer who shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen in a dispute at his home three weeks ago, one of them fatally, is on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into the incident. That status notwithstanding, he remains certified as a police officer, meaning he is still authorized to carry a weapon issued by the department. Given what is known about his past, and his repeated problems with anger management, you'd think Prince Georgians might justifiably be nervous about that.

But not Jack Johnson, the Prince George's county executive. Mr. Johnson is an old associate and booster of Cpl. Washington's, having hired him first as his driver and then, two years ago, as his deputy director of homeland security, despite public warnings about Cpl. Washington's checkered past, volcanic temper and tendency to turn routine encounters into tempestuous ones. Now that Cpl. Washington has killed one man and badly injured another, Mr. Johnson says the officer will not be returning to his position in the county department of homeland security. Well, that's comforting. Less comforting, however, is Mr. Johnson's prescription -- that Cpl. Washington resume work as a police officer.

In fact, it's hard to think of a worse place for Cpl. Washington than the police department. In incident after incident over the years, on duty and off, including ones involving his daughter, his homeowners association and a fender bender that he was investigating, Cpl. Washington is alleged to have exhibited rough, menacing or violent behavior, often in response to seemingly ordinary circumstances. Three years ago he was suspended from the police force for an off-duty scuffle. Now, using his service weapon, a 9mm Beretta, he has shot two unarmed Marlo employees who were delivering a bed set to his home; both were apparently hit multiple times.

We hope an ongoing investigation will reveal how a dispute over the delivery of a bed set escalated to the point where Cpl. Washington not only brandished a weapon but felt it necessary to pull the trigger again and again. The facts surrounding those shootings are still uncertain: One man is dead; another hasn't yet talked to police, prosecutors or a grand jury; and Cpl. Washington's own account hasn't been heard in public. So we won't prejudge the outcome of the investigation. But it seems fair to wonder whether Mr. Johnson's cavalier prescription -- to send Cpl. Washington back to active duty as a police officer -- is not premature, at the very least.

CIVIL LAW:

Hillary's Brother Due Back In Court (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

A federal judge has reopened a bankruptcy case in which a trustee is demanding that one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's brothers repay more than $100,000 in purported loans from a carnival outfit whose owner was pardoned by President Clinton.

Anthony D. Rodham received $107,000 in payments from Tennessee-based United Shows of America Inc. before the company went bankrupt in 2002, according to court records.

DOJ_NMG_0133608

United Shows' owners -- Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory -- were pardoned by Mr. Clinton in March 2000, despite an objection by the Justice Department. The couple was convicted of bank fraud in 1982 for illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004.

After court-appointed trustee Michael Collins took over the company's finances, he obtained a default judgment against Mr. Rodham, saying he "received the benefit of the loans without making any repayment."

Mr. Collins' collection effort spawned court actions last year against Mr. Rodham in D.C. Superior Court and the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Alexandria.

In September, an attorney for Mr. Rodham, of Vienna, Va., persuaded a federal judge to set aside the default judgment, saying he did not get proper notice of some of the proceedings.

After setting aside the default judgment, the case was essentially closed because of what Mr. Collins called a procedural glitch.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Marian F. Harrison on Jan. 30 granted a request by Mr. Collins to reopen the case.

A status hearing was scheduled for today in Nashville, Tenn., but likely will be continued until next week, Mr. Collins said.

"We want to get the case on a scheduling track, so we can proceed to trial," he said.

Mr. Rodham has declined to speak about the case, and his attorney did not return a phone call yesterday.

Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, announced last month that she was forming a presidential exploratory committee. Yesterday, a spokesman for her presidential exploratory committee had no comment.

When Mr. Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Mr. Rodham reportedly said he worked for United Shows as a consultant. He denied taking money to lobby for the couple's pardon.

Mr. Rodham has not filed an answer to Mr. Collins' complaint. But in legal pleadings, his attorney, Samuel Crocker, said Mr. Rodham says the money that he received from United Shows was compensation, not loans.

"Defendant was owed compensation for the services he rendered," Mr. Crocker stated in the filings.

However, Mr. Collins, in bankruptcy filings last year, said each of the 16 checks from United Shows to Mr. Rodham had a note at the bottom indicating that the payments were loans.

In addition, Mr. Crocker said Mr. Rodham received a summons but never found out that there had been a motion for a default judgment because the notice was sent to the wrong address. Mr. Rodham previously lived in the District.

Once Mr. Collins obtained a default judgment last year, he hired attorneys to file collection judgments to pursue Mr. Rodham's assets in the District and Virginia.

Mr. Collins said he is not ruling out a settlement in the case. He said an out-of-court agreement seemed to be a possibility.

Although the default judgment was set aside, Mr. Rodham has been ordered by Judge Harrison to pay more than $19,000 to cover Mr. Collins' legal expenses in connection with the collection efforts.

Mr. Collins said Mr. Rodham has complied with that court order.

Don’t Fall For Hot Pink Camels (NYT)

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

Wall Street analysts may be applauding R. J. Reynolds for introducing a feminized version of its macho Camel cigarette brand, and company executives clearly think they have hit on an innovative marketing strategy. But this new attempt to woo women smokers can only be viewed as another cynical blow to public health.

The Reynolds executives apparently don’t care that lung cancer among women is the only major form of cancer whose death toll is rising. Lung cancer kills far more American women than does the much more feared breast cancer. And smoking is overwhelmingly the leading cause of lung cancer, not to mention its contribution to heart disease, emphysema and all sorts of other health problems.

So now comes R. J. Reynolds with its new female-friendly Camel No. 9 and a campaign to promote it costing an estimated $25 million to $50 million. The name is supposed to evoke “cloud nine” or being “dressed to the nines,” according to Reynolds marketers, although some think it may also suggest luxury perfumes like Chanel No. 19 and romantic songs like “Love Potion No.

9." As described by Stuart Elliott in last Thursday's Times, the company is reaching out to women with slogans like "light and luscious," hot pink and teal packages and ads adorned with flowers.

This would all seem laughable if it were not so pernicious. No doubt Reynolds will fall back on a tobacco company mantra: it's not trying to woo new smokers to a dangerous product; it's just trying to convert existing ones to its brand. But we all know that the tobacco business will wither away unless it finds new smokers to replace those who quit or die.

Bipartisan bills were introduced in both houses of Congress last week to give the Food and Drug Administration needed authority to regulate tobacco products and restrict marketing to young people, consistent with free-speech principles. That may not do much to wean their elders from the habit. But it could stop young women from being entrapped by cynical marketers.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Hearing Without Being Heard (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

JACKSONVILLE, Ala. -- Lilly M. Ledbetter says she almost stopped breathing when she heard her name called that day, her eight-year battle over alleged pay discrimination finally reaching the ultimate legal forum, the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We'll hear argument next in Ledbetter versus Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. announced.

The odds are akin to being struck by lightning, having your case plucked from the thousands of others who have vowed, like you, to take the fight all the way to the Supreme Court. And then you find it's not so much about you anymore.

It was the only time that November morning that any of the nine justices spoke Lilly Ledbetter's name.

When she thought back last week on the arguments before the court, she remembered them as not being much about her complaints about Goodyear, or Goodyear's complaints about her. "Except when my lawyer got up, it [seemed to be] based on changing the law somewhere down the line," she said. "That's what it boils down to, I guess. It tends to leave the person out."

At a forum late last year, Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer, usually the court's yin and yang on matters of constitutional interpretation, agreed that that is how it should be. They were asked whether their duty was to provide justice for those who came before the court or simply to interpret the law.

"The point of the law is to satisfy a human desire for justice," Breyer explained, but he added: "You don't necessarily get to that end by simply trying to look for what is the intuitively nicer result in each case."

Scalia was blunter. "By the time you get up to an appellate court -- and lawyers ought to learn this -- I don't much care about your particular case," he said. "I am not about to produce a better result in your case at the expense of creating terrible results in a hundred other cases."

A specific Supreme Court decision may contain obvious benefits for the winner -- see George W. Bush, circa 2000. But it can often be an inconclusive way station for the plaintiff, sometimes leading only to additional years of litigation.

Jose Antonio Lopez, for instance, has already won his case at the Supreme Court this term. The justices ruled 8 to 1 that the Bush administration cannot automatically deport legal immigrants convicted of minor drug crimes.

But the decision came a little late for Lopez, who had returned to Mexico rather than remain in jail to see if the Supreme Court would take his case. His lawyer is trying to get him a new hearing in this country. But the more lasting impact of Lopez v. Gonzales is that thousands of immigrants may now contest the government's deportation plans.

Supreme Court cases outlive the individuals who give them a name, and give rise to legal precedents beyond the specific cases. That explains why Ledbetter finds herself supported by a large contingent of women's groups and civil rights organizations that she had never given much thought to -- "The ACLU is supporting me; I don't know how we picked them up" -- and opposed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Bush administration.

She knows it's not personal.The Law's Fine Print

What justices find interesting in Ledbetter's case, according to the language of the Supreme Court, is this:

DOJ_NMG_0133610

Whether and under what circumstances a plaintiff may bring an action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 alleging illegal pay discrimination when the disparate pay is received during the statutory limitations period, but is the result of intentionally discriminatory pay decisions that occurred outside the limitations period.

What Ledbetter and Goodyear have been fighting over since 1998 when, at the company's urging, she took the early-retirement offer is this:

Whether she was paid less than the men she worked with because of discrimination or because she wasn't a very good worker.

There's no dispute that after nearly 20 years at the Goodyear plant in Gadsden, Ala., most of them in a salaried managerial position, Ledbetter, 68, was paid less than any of the men she worked with, even those with less seniority.

Ledbetter had always thought that was the case -- some of her bosses had even told her so. But it was spelled out clearly in an anonymous letter she received after she stopped working for Goodyear that contained the rankings and salaries of everyone she worked with.

Her lawyers showed it to the jury on a huge board.

But Goodyear contended that the salaries must be looked at with the rankings. The company said Ledbetter's lower pay was the result of a merit pay plan meant to even the field, and reward supervisors for good work rather than longevity. Ledbetter was typically at the bottom of the rankings, the company argued, and even then she received raises, albeit smaller than those of the men ranked above her.

The jury sided with Ledbetter, saying it was "more likely than not" that she had been paid "an unequal salary because of her sex." Jurors awarded her $3,514,417.

Which was reduced to $360,000 by the judge, who said that was the maximum the law allowed.

Which was reduced to $0 by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, which said Goodyear may have discriminated against Ledbetter at some point, but not in the 180 days before she filed her complaint, as the Title VII law prescribes.

Which is what has the justices interested.

Ledbetter's lawyers, backed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, said that the 11th Circuit's decision is contrary to law the Supreme Court itself has established, and that many other lower courts have followed. They argue, in effect, that pay decisions tainted by discrimination become new violations of Title VII each time that employee receives a paycheck. So the discriminatory action fell within the time guidelines in the law, they say.

But Goodyear's lawyers said that the 11th Circuit had gotten the standard right, and that the law is intended to stop ongoing discrimination. Ledbetter could not show that the company had discriminated against her the last time it decided to approve or withhold a pay raise. The solicitor general -- the lawyer who represents the official position of the government before the court -- agreed, and in a notable break, said the EEOC was misreading the Supreme Court's earlier decisions.Awaiting a Decision

Ledbetter flew up from Alabama for the oral arguments, scheduled for the Monday after Thanksgiving. From her spot in the second row, she watched for signs. She knew that it takes at least four justices to agree to hear a case, and although those sessions are secret, she assumed they were for her. But she didn't know who they were, nor whose vote could be the fifth one she needed.

She didn't think it would be Roberts. Genial in public appearances, he's a sharp-edged questioner, and she recalled his comments being all about whether a finding for Ledbetter would undo the statute of limitations and open employers to decades-old discrimination complaints, she said.

Ledbetter was intrigued by Justice Clarence Thomas, who she'd been told might not automatically be on her side. As is his custom, Thomas did not ask a question during the hour-long argument, but Ledbetter thought he seemed unusually interested.

"He kept sending out for law books -- he had that poor guy running -- and by the end he had a stack of books up to there," she said.

And Ledbetter had a good feeling about the only woman behind that long mahogany bench; Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's questions sounded most supportive, she said. Out on the court plaza later that day, after the reporters had gone, a Georgetown professor introduced herself to Ledbetter and told her that Ginsburg had been discriminated against early in her legal career.

But sympathies are one thing, as Breyer and Scalia indicated in that December forum, and the law is another.

DOJ_NMG_0133611

"If you're incapable of producing a policy result that you don't like simply because the statute requires it," Scalia told his audience, then look for another line of work. "Run for Congress or something."

Waiting in Jacksonville for a decision that could come anytime before the court finishes its term at the end of June, Ledbetter said she thinks it could go either way.

"I think it's moved on to the law," she said. "Strictly the law."

Study: Stricter Voting ID Rules Hurt '04 Turnout (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Voter identification requirements designed to combat fraud can reduce turnout, particularly among minorities, a new study shows.

A study by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University shows turnout in 2004 was about 4% lower in states that required voters to sign their name or produce documentation. Hispanic turnout was 10% lower; the difference was about 6% for blacks and Asian-Americans.

The study, presented to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission this month, comes as voter identification requirements are being subjected to increased scrutiny. Two researchers last year told the Election Assistance Commission that they found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places.

Thomas O'Neill, who led the Eagleton research team, said the new study shows that "the harm may be as great as the benefit."

The commission's chairwoman, Donetta Davidson, called the study "premature." More work needs to be done, she said. "You can't make determinations based on one year," she said. "We have new states that have ID requirements now that weren't in that review."

In 2005, Indiana enacted the nation's stiffest photo ID law. Yet turnout increased 2% in November compared with 2002, the previous non-presidential federal election year.

In local races before the November elections, "we could not find one instance where a legitimate voter could not vote," said Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita, a Republican.

Under federal law, first-time voters must verify their identity. Nearly half the states go further, requiring some identification from all voters — ranging from a signature to a government-issued photo ID, which is required only in Indiana.

Photo ID laws in Georgia and Missouri have been blocked in court. A photo ID law in Florida allows voters to choose from many forms of identification.

Liberal groups such as Common Cause have fought the measures on claims that they disenfranchise the poor, minorities and seniors.

Several states are considering photo ID laws this year, including California, Colorado, Kansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Texas and Washington. Most of the efforts face substantial opposition. "We've been beating that horse for two or three years now," said Tim Storey, an elections expert at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "The states that were going to do it have mostly done it."

The Eagleton Institute research relied on data from 2004, before some of the toughest ID laws were passed. It shows that as requirements stiffen — from stating a name to signing it to presenting documentation — turnout drops slightly. The researchers considered other factors, including contested elections, registration requirements, race, ethnicity, age, education and income. They used a 2004 Census Bureau survey to determine racial and ethnic breakdowns.

"It validates some of the things that have been said all along about the problems of voter ID," said Kimball Brace of Election Data Services. Taken together with the earlier research by Tova Wang and Job Serebrov that found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places, it shows voter ID laws can have more of a negative than a positive impact, Brace said.

Advocates of tougher ID requirements cite Indiana. The state did extensive voter education before the election and allowed voters without ID to cast provisional ballots, which are less likely to be counted.

DOJ_NMG_0133612

"It wasn't the horrible thing that some feared," said Thor Hearne of the conservative American Center for Voting Rights. Hearne predicted continued support for state ID laws if they are carefully drafted and implemented to avoid a drop in turnout.

Campaign Strengthens For A Voting Paper Trail (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Efforts are intensifying in Congress to pass legislation that would require electronic touch-screen voting machines used in federal elections to provide paper trails that could be checked in the case of a recount.

The new momentum is the result of lingering concerns about the machines as the 2008 presidential primaries fast approach, as well as strong support for changes by the new Democratic majority, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), chair of the Rules Committee, taking a leading role.

"We are closer to paper-trail legislation than we have been before," said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, an elections clearinghouse.

"Democrats are committed to election-reform legislation that requires all voting machines produce a paper trail," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

The work at the national level echoes moves in many states. Often under pressure from voting-rights groups, 27 states have decided to require paper trails.

Last month, Gov. Charlie Crist of Florida went a step further, asking the legislature to pay for replacing touch-screen machines by next year with optical-scan devices, which read paper ballots. Virginia and Maryland are considering similar moves.

Florida has special significance because it was home to the recount dispute in the 2000 presidential election that began the national focus on how Americans vote. In response to that election, Congress passed a law in 2002 that provided billions of dollars to the states to replace outdated voting machines.

The new, high-tech machines were in many cases easier to use and more accessible for disabled people. But a coalition of computer scientists and voting-rights groups argued that the touch-screen devices without printers were vulnerable to tampering and that results could not be verified if they broke down.

In Congress, Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) has introduced legislation to require paper trails and audits that test the paper results against the electronic tally, among other things. The bill has nearly 200 co-sponsors, and Holt wants it to take effect before the first primaries in January. Feinstein plans to introduce a similar bill soon.

"In basic terms, it would reestablish the principles of reliability and auditability," Holt said. "Citizens are disturbed that they feel they can't rely on the results of the election."

Weighing heavily on the minds of Democrats is last year's congressional race in Sarasota, Fla. Congress has seated Republican Vern Buchanan, but Democrat Christine Jennings says the Electronics Systems & Software touch-screen machines failed to count 18,000 votes that were cast for other offices but did not indicate a vote for Congress.

Without a paper record, there is no way for the machine to do a recount; Jennings has asked in court for access to the machines' source code -- the inner workings of the software that runs the machines -- to see whether there was a glitch. So far, she has not received access and has filed a protest with the House Administration Committee.

"Imagine what would happen if a similar undercount occurred in a swing-state election in the presidential contest and there was no independent means of verification," Feinstein said during a hearing on election administration this month. She asked government auditors to probe the Sarasota case.

Not everyone agrees paper trails are a panacea. Daniel Tokaji, assistant law professor at Ohio State University and associate director of its election-law program, said Holt's bill's focus on paper trails reflects a desire for a simple fix.

"It could well create more problems in terms of both creating post-election litigation and creating administrative problems in counting these paper strips," Tokaji said. "We know they can be compromised, torn, crumpled," and have printing problems, he said.

While Congress considers voting machine legislation, the Election Assistance Commission, the federal agency that helps states run elections, is taking a more direct role in testing the machines before they are used.

DOJ_NMG_0133613

In the past, an association of state election directors had certified testing labs on a volunteer basis. That approach generated concerns that labs would use varying standards and would not be subject to sufficient oversight.

These concerns were heightened last month when it was revealed that a Colorado company had been temporarily banned from testing equipment, after authorities said it was failing to exercise proper quality control.

Now the Election Assistance Commission will certify labs in consultation with the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST).

"It's the first time the federal government has ever been involved in testing voting equipment and, with NIST recommending their accreditation, that puts a more stringent position on the labs to meet all of the qualifications," said the chairman of the Election Assistance Commission, Donetta Davidson. "That definitely puts more credibility in the process."

New Jersey Begins Offering Civil Unions To Gay Couples (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Hundreds of gay couples received the same legal protections as married couples early Monday when a law took effect to make New Jersey the third U.S. state to offer civil unions.

The civil unions -- which offer the legal benefits but not the title of marriage -- were granted automatically to the hundreds of gay New Jersey couples who have been joined in civil unions or married in other states or nations.

At least one couple held a ceremony at the first possible moment. Steven Goldstein and Daniel Gross reaffirmed their Vermont civil union shortly after midnight. They would have had the rights in New Jersey even without holding a midnight ceremony here.

State Sen. Loretta Weinberg, a prime sponsor of the civil unions law who hosted ceremonies for couples including Messrs. Goldstein and Gross in her office, called the day "a big giant step forward." A handful of town halls across the state also opened at 12:01 a.m. to accept civil union license applications from couples who had not been so joined previously. They must wait 72 hours before they can hold civil union ceremonies, and several plan to exchange vows early Thursday.

Among those couples were Marty Finkle and Michael Plake of South Orange. A few dozen friends, Mr. Finkle's 17-year-old daughter and several local officials showed up to cheer the couple as they filled out paperwork in their town hall. The couple also was one of the first in the state to register in a domestic partnership in 2004. Domestic partnerships offered a handful of the benefits and obligations of civil unions.

New Jersey lawmakers hastily created civil unions last December, less than two months after a state Supreme Court decision held that gay couples had a right to the same benefits as married couples.

Gay rights activists in the state say they will continue to press for full marriage rights through both political channels and lawsuits. Some social conservative groups, meanwhile, are pledging to block same-sex marriage by pressing for an amendment to the state constitution that prohibits such unions. Forty-five states have legal or constitutional bans on same-sex marriages. Only Massachusetts allows gay couples to marry, while California offers domestic partnerships.

Mr. Goldstein, the chairman of the gay rights group Garden State Equality, and Mr. Gross, a vice president at Goldman Sachs, held their ceremony behind a desk in a cramped office instead of a more idyllic or religious spot. There were several kisses, a prayer reading, friends and journalists, but no music, no dancing and none of the breaking-of-the-glass that is traditional in Jewish weddings. The couple did that in a Jewish wedding service in Canada in 2002 -- the first same-sex union featured in the wedding pages of the New York Times -- and promised even grander festivities if they can gain the right to marry in New Jersey.

As part of their ceremony, their rabbi, Elliott Tepperman, asked the people gathered: "Do you vow to continue your support for true marriage equality?" "This was really all about receiving a piece of paper that had some recognition of our status," Mr. Gross said. Teaneck registrar Laura Turnbull finished processing their civil union license -- No. 1 -- at 12:09 a.m.

Meanwhile, in Asbury Park -- a community revived largely by a growing gay population and one where two men were married, though it was not recognized in 2004 -- five gay couples completed civil union licenses in the first hour of the day.

Eagerness And Some Resignation As Civil Union Law Takes Effect (NYT)

By Ellen Barry

DOJ_NMG_0133614

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

ASBURY PARK, N.J., Feb. 19 — Mark Rado and Degn Schubert could be forgiven for sounding a little jaded on Monday, as they waited with four other couples in the lobby of the Asbury Park Municipal and Police Complex.

This would be, by their own count, the seventh time that they had tried to make their union official. They twice registered as domestic partners in California, organized an elaborate commitment ceremony, and then married, ecstatically, under the watch of Mayor Gavin Newsom of San Francisco. Then the state annulled that marriage, along with other same-sex marriages, and Mr. Rado and Mr. Schubert once again registered as domestic partners.

Now they were doing it again: Waiting, with a bouquet of alstroemeria and purple tulips, for Asbury Park's deputy city clerk, D. Kiki Tomek, to take their application for a civil union in New Jersey.

"It becomes sort of a chore," said Mr. Schubert, who is 40 and lives in Asbury Park. They discussed which of their proliferating anniversaries they would celebrate. June 28? Feb. 13? Or the date three days from Monday, when their civil union can be performed, Feb. 22?

"I wish they would just call it marriage," Mr. Schubert said, "and be done with it."

About a dozen couples visited clerks' offices in New Jersey on Monday, the first day on which people were allowed to submit applications for civil unions, which guarantee all the rights and benefits of heterosexual marriage. New Jersey is the third state to offer civil unions, following Vermont, which introduced them to rapt national attention in 2000, and Connecticut, which quietly followed suit in 2005.

Massachusetts is the only state in which same-sex couples can marry. California has a domestic partnership law that guarantees many of the rights of marriage.

A handful of couples in New Jersey were so eager to take advantage of the new law that they waited outside clerks' offices until 12:01 on Monday, when the first civil unions could be processed. Among that group, some said the experience was bittersweet; activists had held out hope that New Jersey would follow Massachusetts as the second state to grant same-sex couples the right to marry.

But Beth Asaro, 47, who submitted an application for a civil union with her partner, Joanne Schailey, in Lambertville, could not contain her happiness. She said her outright joy at forming a civil union could be a function of her age and the hostility she faced when she was younger.

"Being gay, you're used to kind of hiding it and not making it front and center of your personality," Ms. Asaro said, "but last night, man, we were out there — that we had gotten these rights from our state. It was pretty exciting, very validating and very liberating."

Civil unions, she said, are "enough for right now."

"I know it sounds so trite," she said, "but it's true."

There was a jovial atmosphere on Monday outside Asbury Park's vital statistics office, where couples filled out their applications beside stacks of recycling bulletins and annual water quality reports. The star of the show was Ms. Tomek, who is beloved among gay people in Asbury Park for processing marriage licenses for same-sex couples for three days in March 2004, an act of guerrilla clerkship that was almost immediately blocked, via a faxed letter, by the state attorney general.

Ms. Tomek opened up the office for the occasion Monday morning — a federal holiday — wearing an animal-print tunic, high-heeled boots and big gold-hoop earrings; when Tom Pivinski, 64, said he had not brought government identification, she good-naturedly agreed to identify him by examining one of his tattoos. One by one, she swore in applicants and told them where to sign.

"Come to Asbury Park, baby, where it all happens," said Terence J. Reidy, Asbury Park's city manager.

The new law stemmed from a lawsuit filed in 2002, when seven same-sex couples were denied marriage licenses. The case, Lewis v. Harris, was eventually appealed to the New Jersey Supreme Court, which ruled in October that the State Constitution guarantees same-sex couples all the rights and benefits of marriage.

But the court passed on to the Legislature the thorny question of whether same-sex unions could be called "marriage," reasoning that "the great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process." On Dec. 21, Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a law that created a legal structure for civil unions.

Applicants for civil unions — like prospective brides and grooms — must wait three days before a license is granted and a ceremony performed, so couples who submitted applications on Monday are planning to hold rapid-fire civil union ceremonies early Thursday morning — at 12:01, 12:05, 12:07 and 12:10 a.m.

Others will not have to wait. The state attorney general, Stuart J. Rabner, announced on Friday that gay couples with marriages or civil unions performed in other states or countries would have their status recognized as civil unions in New Jersey. The state's first civil union ceremony was performed at 12:01 a.m. Monday, in Teaneck, for Steven Goldstein, the chairman of Garden State Equality, and his partner, Daniel Gross, whose civil union had been performed in Vermont.

Mr. Goldstein, who fought vigorously last fall to legalize gay marriage in New Jersey, said the ceremony was "one of the most bittersweet moments" of his life. He said the small turnout Monday morning was proof that other gay couples felt the same way.

"There's a bit of happiness on one hand, but no satisfaction," he said. "Before, we in the gay community sat in the back of the bus. Now, we're allowed to sit in the middle of the bus."

But Bill Whitefield, 40, who stopped by Ms. Tomek's desk Monday afternoon, said the light showing proved just the opposite. Three years ago, he said, gay couples in Asbury Park crowded into this office to apply for marriage licenses, panicked that their rights would be taken away by new laws.

Since the ruling in Lewis v. Harris, he said, that urgency is gone. He and his partner are in no rush; they are thinking of marrying in two years. Mr. Whitefield, a native of Nashville, said he had heard plenty of grumbling about the civil union law, and he wishes his friends would look at the bright side.

"We have a lot of New York radicals here," he said. "I say that with the utmost affection."

ANTITRUST:

Merger Would End Satellite Radio's Rivalry (NYT)

By Richard Siklos And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

The nation's two satellite radio services, Sirius and XM, announced plans yesterday to merge, a move that would end their costly competition for radio personalities and subscribers but that is also sure to raise antitrust issues.

The two companies, which report close to 14 million subscribers, hoped to revolutionize the radio industry with a bevy of niche channels offering everything from fishing tips to salsa music, and media personalities like Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey, with few commercials. But neither has yet turned an annual profit and both have had billions in losses.

While there had been speculation of a merger, neither side had engaged in serious negotiations until December, when both companies determined it was in their best interests to complete a deal while the Bush administration was in power, people in the negotiations said.

The companies said yesterday that their $13 billion merger — code-named Project Big Sky by XM — would give consumers a broader range of programming, while eliminating overlapping stations that focus on genres of music. At the same time, they said, they could cut duplicated costs in sales and marketing.

A merger would require antitrust approval from the Justice Department and would have to be considered in the public interest by the Federal Communications Commission.

Under their operating licenses, XM and Sirius were prohibited from ever owning each other's license. The commission could waive that rule. But critics pointed to its rejection of the merger of the satellite television broadcasters EchoStar and DirecTV four years ago.

Questioned last month about a possible Sirius-XM merger, the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin, initially appeared to be skeptical, but later said that if such a deal were proposed, the agency would consider it.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Martin acknowledged that the F.C.C. rule could complicate a merger but said the commission would evaluate the proposal. "The hurdle here, however, would be high," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0133616

The proposed merger, first reported yesterday by The New York Post, promises to be a test of whether regulators will see a combination of XM and Sirius as a monopoly of satellite radio communications or whether they will consider other audio entertainment, like iPods, Internet radio and HD radio, to be competitors.

"If the only competition to XM is Sirius, then you don't let the deal through," said Blair Levin, managing director of Stifel Nicolaus & Company and a former F.C.C. chief of staff. But Mr. Blair said he expected the F.C.C. to approve the merger.

"It's my view that in looking at this picture, the Justice Department is going to conclude that the market is contestable, that there's various ways these services compete and they'll allow this merger."

Both Sirius and XM have been rapidly adding customers since they began selling the concept of subscription-based radio available coast to coast about six years ago. XM ended 2006 with nearly eight million customers but Sirius increased its subscriber base by 80 percent last year, to about six million, after it signed Mr. Stern in a $725 million cash and stock deal.

Still, both companies had expected faster growth, and the real number of subscribers may be less than appears at first glance. Many receive the service free for a trial period when buying a new car or truck.

The two services have some $6 billion in accumulated losses. Both companies' share prices have slumped recently as investors cooled on the companies' prospects for generating profits, given the heavy costs of acquiring programming talent like Mr. Stern and the radio rights to the National Football League and Major League Baseball.

The companies' services are, for the moment, not compatible. If the merger were approved, officials said yesterday, they would provide subscribers with technology that would allow them access to both services.

Each sells subscriptions for $12.95 a month. The cost of the combined service is yet to be determined.

Pricing the service is only one of many commercial and operational challenges the merger would face. For one thing, XM has prided itself on being advertising-free while Sirius sells ads on its talk radio fare, including Mr. Stern's shows.

Craig E. Moffett, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, said it was not clear that Mr. Stern, Ms. Winfrey and some of the other major draws on the channels would be readily accessible to the merged companies' wider audience.

Mel Karmazin, the longtime broadcasting executive who has been chief executive of Sirius for the past two years, said he had tried to reach Mr. Stern, who is on vacation, but had not yet done so, and a company spokesman said Sirius does not discuss its contracts.

The new company's name and where it would be based — Sirius is in New York and XM in Washington — have not yet been determined. Mr. Karmazin would continue as chief executive while Gary Parsons, XM's chairman, would remain as chairman of the merged company.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons said they believed they could prove the combination would be in the public interest.

Mr. Parsons said that unlike EchoStar and DirecTV, whose only rival was cable television, the satellite radio companies have a very small audience compared with the ways people get music, information and entertainment in audio formats, including iPods and the Internet. "The only thing that you could even think of as similar between those companies and us is that they both use satellites," Mr. Karmazin said.

But critics are lining up. The National Association of Broadcasters, a trade group that represents broadcast radio and television stations, issued a statement within hours of the XM-Sirius announcement.

"In coming weeks, policy makers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly," it said.

XM and Sirius had been in a mating dance for years, with Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons flirting both publicly and privately. According to people involved in the talks, they began serious talks just before Christmas.

Anxious about Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons being spotted together, the two sides decided to meet in an inconspicuous spot: the Upper East Side apartment of one of Mr. Parsons's bankers, Dennis S. Hersch, a former lawyer who joined JPMorgan Chase two years ago.

Mr. Karmazin met with Mr. Parsons for several hours in Mr. Hersch's living room one morning in late December, these people said. They sat on sofas flanked by their advisers, James B. Lee and Mr. Hersch of JPMorgan Chase, which represented XM, and Paul Taubman of Morgan Stanley, which worked for Sirius. The men decided to pursue a deal.

An army of merger and antitrust lawyers for both sides worked several marathon weeks of conference calls and trips to Washington to gauge the political climate for the transaction before opining that the deal should pass regulatory muster. Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Wiley Rein are representing Sirius; XM is being advised by Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom; Jones Day; and Latham & Watkins.

About a month later, the two sides reconvened, this time at Mr. Karmazin's apartment in the Trump International Hotel and Tower just off Columbus Circle overlooking Central Park. It was a daylong negotiation. But both sides were far apart on price : Mr. Karmazin didn't want to pay much of a premium and Mr. Parsons was seeking an even higher one than he got yesterday. Mr. Parsons and his advisers left the apartment thinking the talks might collapse.

About a week later, after talking to their boards, the two sides were coaxed back together, both giving a little on price. Two weeks ago, Mr. Parsons returned to Mr. Karmazin's apartment. This time, the men reached a deal and shook hands on it.

Sirius To Acquire Larger Rival XM For $4.57 Billion (Correct) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, February 20, 2007

(Corrects dateline.)

Feb. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. agreed to buy larger rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. for $4.57 billion in stock to combine the only pay radio companies and stem billions of dollars in losses.

Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer of New York-based Sirius, will be CEO of the combined company, and Gary Parsons, chairman of Washington-based XM, will continue as chairman, the companies said today in a statement.

Sirius and XM faced pressure to merge after losing a combined $7 billion to attract subscribers over the past eight years and signing talent including Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. The merger will face antitrust scrutiny and must also be approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission.

``To make themselves stronger in the long term, they really need to benefit from the synergies a combination offers them," said David Bank, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets in New York. ``I see it as a huge positive."

The combined companies will attempt to cut costs by negotiating new programming agreements and deals with automakers who install the devices in cars, said Bank, who rated XM shares ``outperform" and Sirius ``sector perform."

Under the terms of the accord, which the companies describe as a merger of equals, XM investors will receive 4.6 shares of Sirius common stock for each share they own. Shareholders of each will own about 50 percent of the combined radio company.

New Board

The deal values XM at $17.02 a share, based on Feb. 16 closing prices, the last trading day in the U.S. markets before Presidents Day. That represents a 22 percent premium over XM's close of $13.98. Sirius closed at $3.70. The companies have combined debt of $2.56 billion and cash of about $638 million as of September.

The new company's board will consist of 12 members, including Karmazin, 63, and Parsons, 56, four independent members named by each company, and one representative from each of General Motors Corp. and American Honda. Hugh Panero, 50, CEO of XM, will continue in his role until deal closes, which both companies expect this year.

Sirius and XM will operate independently until the deal is completed, the companies said. The name of the combined company and the location of its headquarters will be decided later.

Regulatory Scrutiny

Sirius and XM anticipate a rigorous review by the Justice Department and FCC. The companies said today they are competing for customers in a broad media landscape that includes products such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, cell phones that play music and Internet music stations.

``What this is really about is war," said Karmazin, who has spent four decades in the radio industry and was president of Viacom Inc. before joining Sirius in November 2004.

When the FCC authorized XM and Sirius to offer satellite radio service in 1997, it barred the two companies from merging. The FCC envisioned the two would compete with each other and provide consumers with an alternative to traditional radio.

DOJ_NMG_0133618

The proposed merger will face a high level of scrutiny at the FCC, Chairman Kevin Martin said in an e-mailed statement.

``The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," Martin said.

Sirius and XM will argue the competitive landscape has changed since the commission passed the rule barring them from combining 10 years ago.

Competes with iPod?

``From a government perspective, it's tricky," said Blair Levin, a media policy analyst with St. Louis-based Stifel Nicolaus & Co. ``Does something like the iPod really compete with satellite radio?" If federal regulators decide it doesn't, the deal is likely to be rejected, Levin said.

Shares of both Sirius and XM declined 47 percent last year on concern over losses and subscriber growth.

XM finished the year with 7.63 million subscribers, shy of the 7.7 million to 7.9 million it had forecast in November. The number of users rose 29 percent from 2005.

Sirius subscribers increased 82 percent to 6 million last year, in line with its forecast.

As of Feb. 16, Sirius had a market value of $5.2 billion, while XM was valued at $3.75 billion.

Sirius And XM Agree To Merge, Despite Hurdles (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride, Dennis K. Berman And Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

The proposed $11.4 billion merger of struggling satellite-radio operators XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. sets up a crucial test for the nation's regulators: how to weigh the limits of consolidation against rapid changes in media technology.

The deal is structured as a 50-50 "merger of equals," giving XM and Sirius shareholders an equal stake in the combined company, and potentially uniting a roster of talent that includes Sirius's shock jock Howard Stern and daytime-TV personality Oprah Winfrey, one of XM's biggest stars. The agreement calls for Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin to serve as CEO of the new entity, which would have more than $2.3 billion in long-term debt. XM Chairman Gary Parsons would be chairman.

TEXT OF STATEMENT

Read the text of the statement1 by XM and Sirius on their merger of equals. • Tale of the Tape: XM and Sirius2

But because XM and Sirius are the only two companies licensed by the Federal Communications Commission to offer satellite radio in the U.S., the deal is likely to face significant regulatory obstacles.

Broadcasters said yesterday that they will fight the proposed merger, and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin released an unusually grim statement saying that the two companies will face a "high" hurdle, since the FCC still has a 1997 rule on its books specifically forbidding such a deal which would need to be tossed. The transaction also requires the Justice Department's blessing.

Indeed, XM and Sirius may be rushing into a deal because they sense the regulatory terrain will only get tougher. People close to the matter said that the two companies acted because the climate is already changing with the election of a Democratic-controlled Congress. Future developments -- such as the possibility of a Democratic president -- could make it even harder for the proposed merger to pass muster.

In their strategy, the two companies may be subtly acknowledging the risks before them: By conceiving their deal as a merger of equals and declining to say which company name would emerge ascendant, they minimize the business risks should the deal fall through. If, for example, the combined company were to be dubbed Sirius, XM could be vulnerable to a decline in sales during a regulatory review period that could last a year. A person familiar with the negotiations said the two companies have set March 1, 2008, as their "drop-dead date," after which either side can walk away if approval is not granted.

The coming regulatory battle is likely to focus on the definition of satellite radio's market. The two companies are expected to argue that the rules established a decade ago, which require two satellite rivals to ensure competition, simply don't apply in today's entertainment landscape.

Since 1997, a host of new listening options have emerged, making the issue of choice in satellite radio less important for consumers. Executives cite a new digital technology called HD radio, iPod digital music players, Internet radio and music over mobile phones as competitors that didn't exist when the satellite licenses were first awarded.

Just a few years ago, the two satellite rivals were the hot new technology on the media scene, offering consumers greater choice in both music and talk programming in exchange for a monthly subscription fee. But while both companies have continued to add subscribers steadily, their growth has slowed, in part because of the other new devices and services competing for the same potential listeners.

Both XM and Sirius have continued to lose money. In 2005, the companies had combined losses of $1.5 billion, after losing a combined $1.4 billion the year before. Their 2006 results haven't been released, but Goldman Sachs analyst Mark Wienkes estimates that Sirius lost $1.1 billion on revenue of $628.8 million last year, while XM lost $658.2 million on revenue of $914 million.

Consumers and their advocates are likely to worry that a combined company would mean higher prices for satellite-radio service. Both companies now charge $12.95 a month.

But company executives say market forces would limit the possibility of higher prices. "We are competing with companies that give away their product for free," said Mr. Karmazin, alluding to conventional over-the-air radio.

Satellite-radio customers will still be able to use their existing satellite radios for the foreseeable future, but to take advantage of a combined service, they probably would need to upgrade to a newer radio. Currently, Sirius and XM run on separate, incompatible systems, although a team of engineers from both companies has been working on a radio that could pull in both signals.

"The benefits to the subscribers are awesome," Sirius's Mr. Karmazin said in an interview. "We can combine [research and development] resources and come up with cooler, more advanced products that will satisfy them more. We're going to have the ability to negotiate better with our receiver manufacturers."

The companies could also eliminate duplicative services. For example, XM features a Christian-music-themed channel called "The Message," while Sirius has its own Christian pop channel dubbed "Spirit." By Mr. Karmazin's reckoning, the two companies could eliminate such overlap and concentrate on unique shows and new technology to deliver it. "There's going to be more consumer choice," Mr. Karmazin said.

It remains to be seen whether the FCC shares that view. In his statement yesterday evening, Mr. Martin said the FCC would certainly review the deal, but "the companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off -- with both more choice and affordable prices."

A larger problem for the companies, however, is opposition from broadcasters, to whom Mr. Martin has been an ally in the past. Two years ago, the National Association of Broadcasters lobbied hard against XM's effort to acquire WCS Wireless LLC for $195 million. The deal would have given XM additional radio frequencies and allowed it to expand its service.

Broadcasters, however, complained that XM would use the acquisition to provide local programming, which isn't allowed under its current license. Ultimately, the deal fell through after languishing without action at the FCC for nearly a year.

The broadcasters quickly went on the offensive yesterday. "When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," said NAB spokesman Dennis Wharton. "Now, with their stock prices at rock bottom and their business model in disarray because of profligate spending practices, they seek a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace."

The FCC's five commissioners will need to be convinced that there's enough competition in the market to support a merger. One issue the agency will likely consider, FCC officials say, is satellite radio's popularity with consumers and the two companies' long-term prospects if they don't merge.

With the FCC currently immersed in what's likely to be a protracted fight over changes to media-ownership limits, it may not be an auspicious time to propose a deal to consolidate the satellite-radio industry.

Democrats at the FCC have been more assertive since their party took control of Congress. And some lawmakers have already begun to express doubts about the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0133620

Massachusetts Democrat Edward Markey, chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees the FCC, said yesterday that he will review the proposed merger's effect on consumers. "In light of the dramatic consolidation of radio ownership...I believe that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a similar, deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting," he said in a statement.

Under the deal, XM shareholders will receive a fixed exchange of 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares. Based on stock prices Friday, that meant that XM holders would receive $17.02 for each of their shares, a premium to Friday's close of $13.98. XM Chairman Parsons had argued for more, people familiar with the matter said, based on his company's more-extensive deals with auto makers and its 7.6 million subscribers, compared with Sirius's six million. But Mr. Karmazin stuck to his guns, stressing Sirius's bigger market capitalization and faster growth rate.

The market was already responding to the possibility of a deal on Friday, bidding XM stock up by nearly 8%. In agreeing to a premium for XM, Sirius is getting a larger ownership stake than if it had simply contributed its business into a new company.

So-called "mergers of equals" have had a dubious track record, according to a number of academic studies of big corporate transactions. That's largely because under such plans, companies can end up bickering over managerial control and strategy, which can be distracting and ultimately costly to shareholders.

Sirius and XM executives played down that prospect. "Synergies have become such a very large element of value compared to the individual values of the companies," said Mr. Parsons, though he conceded that the two sides debated for months about who should own the biggest part of the company. "That drove us to look at it together."

Sirius has performed better in recent quarters at retail, winning large numbers of customers who walk into a store to buy a satellite radio to add to their car. But XM has positioned itself better for the future, signing up more deals with auto makers such as General Motors Corp., so cars roll off factory lines with satellite radios preinstalled.

Expensive programming one-upmanship has weighed on the stock prices at both companies. For example, in 2004, Sirius said it would pay $500 million over five years, not including performance-based bonuses, to broadcast a morning show starring the colorful Mr. Stern. Two weeks later, XM said it would pay $650 million over 11 years to broadcast Major League Baseball.

"The strategic benefits of a merger would be tremendous," said Craig Moffett, an analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein. "Programming contract renewals would no longer be the subject of bidding wars. Automotive revenue-sharing agreements and retailer commission deals would suddenly be uncontested."

Sirius was advised on the deal by Morgan Stanley and law firms Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP and Wiley Rein LLP. XM was advised by J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and law firms Skadden Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom; Jones Day; and Latham & Watkins.

How Sirius-XM Merger Would Cut Companies' Costs Still Unclear (USAT)

By David Lieberman

USA Today, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK — The vision of a robustly competitive satellite radio business came crashing to Earth on Monday, as the industry's once bitter rivals — Sirius (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio — agreed to merge, creating a company valued at $13 billion, including $1.6 billion in debt.

Each of the two has created an array of radio channels, and they've amassed more than 13 million subscribers between them but never made a profit.

The announcement also created uncertainty, and provided few answers, for current subscribers and those considering buying one of the services. The two systems are incompatible, and virtually all satellite radios are designed for one and can't receive the other.

PRESS RELEASE: Sirius and XM deal

Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin, who would hold that job at the still-unnamed combined company, sought to reassure consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0133621

"You should assume that we're going to continue for a very, very long period of time to offer the Sirius and XM service," he says. "Once this merger is approved, we'll be able to work with receiver manufacturers and chip-set designers to have a next-generation radio that can pick up both services."

Left unanswered is what will happen to consumers who have one of the current generation of radios once it's time to blend the companies.

"The companies will have to announce a fairly complicated technology-migration plan," says Sanford C. Bernstein analyst Craig Moffett.

More may become known today in a conference call the companies plan for analysts and the press.

In addition to the tech hurdles, the companies will have to get the deal to pass muster with antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission.

"The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement. "The hurdle here, however, would be high."

Congress also might have something to say. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., who chairs the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said in a statement, "The merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a … deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting."

The potential for a drawn-out merger transition, following a lengthy approval process, makes it uncertain when executives might find as much as $7 billion a year in savings that they say they can realize, for example by eliminating redundant channels and expenses for transmission and marketing.

Consumer advocates, for their part, likely will pressure regulators and lawmakers for major concessions — if they don't ask for the deal to be rejected outright.

"We're going to raise questions," says Consumers Union's Gene Kimmelman. "I'm not going to say we're going to oppose. I don't know enough about the economics."

He adds that the group likely will call for a la carte pricing, enabling consumers to pay just for the channels they want, and for the merged company to carry additional public-interest programming.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Broadcasters trade association says it'll use its muscle to fight the proposed merger.

"In the coming weeks, policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes (shock jock) Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming," NAB Executive Vice President Dennis Wharton said in a statement.

But the deal should find lots of fans on Wall Street.

Investors and analysts have been disappointed by the slowing growth rate for new subscriptions at Sirius and XM. They picked up a combined 1.8 million subscribers in the fourth quarter of 2006, which is down 12% from the same period in 2005, UBS estimates.

Automakers, led by General Motors, Toyota and Honda, are the biggest contributors to XM's subscriber base. They offer the radios in almost all of their new cars. Sirius has similar deals with Ford, DaimlerChrysler and VW/Audi.

Meanwhile, both companies are grappling with high costs for high-profile content, including XM's deals with Major League Baseball and Oprah Winfrey and Sirius' pacts with the NFL and Stern.

It has become unclear when either of the young companies might be profitable. As a result, "The benefits of a merger are simply too good to pass up," Moffett says. "There are obvious financial synergies from the fact that these two companies run similar operations."

Sirius will offer 4.6 of its shares for each XM share, leaving each side with 50% of the new venture. Sirius closed Friday at $3.70 while XM was at $13.98.

If approved — something the companies expect by year's end — it will be run by Karmazin, a blunt New York native who built Infinity Broadcasting into a power in conventional radio and helped to make Stern one of the medium's most popular personalities.

DOJ_NMG_0133622

XM Chairman Gary Parsons would be chairman. XM Chief Executive Hugh Panero would stay on until the merger closes.

Antitrust fight ahead

It's hard to predict how the bruising fight in Washington will play out. "I think it's more likely than not the government approves it," says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin. "But it's a close call."

Antitrust officials will examine whether a satellite radio monopoly would have too much power to raise subscription fees and ad rates, and to force programmers to accept lower payments.

If they can show that broadcast radio will keep the cost of satellite radio from skyrocketing, then "they have a good chance" of winning approval, says William Baer, former head of the Federal Trade Commission's competition bureau and a lawyer with Arnold & Porter.

The NAB and others are expected to argue that a national satellite radio monopoly could overwhelm free, over-the-air local broadcasters. For example, the new company might gobble up top talent — and possibly win additional business in the biggest markets by offering them channels with local news, weather and information.

"That would put them in direct competition with the NAB constituents," Moffett says. "And the NAB is a force to be reckoned with in Washington."

The FCC would have to reverse its mandate in 1995, when it allocated satellite radio spectrum, that "one (satellite radio) licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining" one.

A few weeks ago, the companies' stock dropped when Martin cited the rule as an impediment to a linkup. Two days later, however, he noted that the companies could seek a waiver of the rule.

"When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," Wharton says. "Now, with their stock prices at rock bottom and their business model in disarray because of profligate spending practices, they seek a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace."

Sirius and XM say that they're optimistic. "We would not be announcing this if we did not believe that we could be getting approval," Karmazin says.

They say that they're making the market more competitive, not less.

"Ten years ago, when these satellite radio licenses were being awarded, there were not any iPods; there was no (digital) HD Radio; there was no (community broadband) WiMax; there were not cellphones with music on them," Parsons says. "You've seen an explosion of these alternatives, which are very attractive to the consumer, but they're things that we have to compete with. And if you look at the size of all of those industries putting forth those choices, we're still the young upstarts in the early stages of our growth phase."

If the FCC approves a deal, it's still likely to impose some conditions, Levin says. For example, it could require the combined company to create a family-friendly tier of stations to shield children from risqué shows and to agree to not raise prices for a certain period.

If the companies get their way and merge, they'll face a host of other potentially vexing challenges.

Each has a distinct corporate culture. XM prides itself on its frugality, building its headquarters in a transitional neighborhood in Washington. Sirius spent freely on talent and built a lavish, high-tech studio in Rockefeller Center.

About 34% of XM's revenue goes to programming and marketing expenses, while 47% of Sirius' revenue is eaten up by those costs.

Satellite Radio Firms Plan To Merge (WP)

By Charles Babington And Thomas Heath

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

XM and Sirius, the two satellite radio companies that have spent millions of dollars trying to woo pay-for-service customers, yesterday announced plans to merge in hopes of stemming losses and offering an even larger smorgasbord of music, talk and sports.

If approved by federal regulators, the merger would give all satellite subscribers access to Sirius's Howard Stern, pro football games and NASCAR races, as well as XM's Oprah Winfrey, Major League Baseball and Bob Dylan.

DOJ_NMG_0133623

Before XM Satellite Radio Holdings of the District and Sirius Satellite Radio of New York can combine, however, the companies must persuade the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission that they are complying with antitrust laws, a claim that land-based broadcasters and consumer groups are likely to dispute. XM and Sirius contend that customers have ample audio choices through devices such as iPods and cellphones.

The FCC bars a single company from controlling the satellite radio market, but FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin recently noted that such rules can be changed. Martin said yesterday that the hurdle "would be high. . . . The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

Officials said the new company's name and headquarters would be determined later. Customers, who now pay $12.95 per month for each company's service, would be able to choose a cafeteria-style range of channels.

"In fact, it will become a company with greater consumer choice," said Gary M. Parsons, chairman of XM. "Certainly, two companies combined would be a much stronger programming lineup."

The merger would be a milestone in the evolution of commercial radio. XM and Sirius, founded in the early 1990s, predicted that enough people would be willing to pay for a wide array of radio choices -- with clear reception, no fundraising appeals and commercial-free music stations -- to allow the providers to turn a profit.

But their bidding war for on-air talent escalated dramatically. Sirius spent $500 million over five years to employ Stern, who earned another $300 million in stock for meeting certain subscriber goals. XM signed Winfrey to a three-year, $55 million contract. Both companies have spent millions of dollars on professional sports deals.

Sirius has reported losses of $3.4 billion over five years. In mid-2006, XM reported a quarterly loss of $231 million, but the company said it had a positive cash flow by the year's end.

Both firms' stocks have experienced a bumpy ride over the past several years. Shares of XM, which number more than 300 million, soared to nearly $40 in 2005 but closed Friday at $13.98 per share. Sirius, which has more than 1.4 billion shares, reached nearly $9 at its peak in 2005. Sirius shares closed Friday at $3.70 per share.

In a joint statement, Sirius and XM executives called the proposed deal an "all-stock merger of equals" with a combined "enterprise value" of about $13 billion. The figure is their estimation of the combined operation's worth, including net debt of about $1.6 billion.

XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius common stock for each XM share they own. Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius, would become the new company's chief executive. Parsons, chairman of XM, would become chairman of the merged company. The new company's 12-member board of directors would include Karmazin, Parsons and four independent members designated by each company. General Motors and American Honda, which include satellite radio as a standard feature in many new cars, would each provide one board member.

"We believe the standard for approving the deal is whether this is in the public interest," Karmazin said in a conference call with reporters. "We believe there is tremendous benefit that accrues to the public."

Officials said they hope to complete the merger, which was approved by the boards of both companies, by the end of the year.

XM and Sirius face emerging competition from the conversion of AM and FM stations to digital broadcast signals. Traditional analog AM and FM broadcasts provide only one channel per frequency and limited sound quality. In the past few years, however, most AM and FM stations have converted to digital signals, which improves sound quality and gives them the ability to broadcast "side channels" in addition to their main frequencies.

The proposed merger also faces significant regulatory and technological hurdles. The most recent merger attempt comparable to the XM-Sirius proposal came in 2002, when the satellite TV companies Echostar Communications and DirecTV tried to merge. The two companies told the FCC and the Justice Department that they needed to combine resources and expand programming to compete against what they called the "monopoly" of cable-TV providers. They promised more channel choices and the rollout of high-speed Internet access via satellite. The FCC and Justice Department rejected the merger, calling it a clear-cut "two-to-one" deal that would probably result in higher prices for satellite-TV subscribers.

William Baer, an antitrust lawyer at Arnold & Porter, said regulators would give the proposed merger a close look. "It comes down to price competition," Baer said. "At the end of the day, they have to be able to show that the pricing of satellite radio is going to be constrained by these alternative forms of listening, such as standard radio, iPods, Internet radio and cellphones. The question that the Department of Justice will look at is whether satellite radio prices will go up if there is only one provider tomorrow."

Rebecca Arbogast, a telecom industry analyst for the brokerage firm Stifel Nicolaus, said XM and Sirius were smart to start the merger effort in time to complete it before Democrats have the chance to win the presidency -- and appoint top Justice Department and FCC officials. "If they waited until a Democratic attorney general were in place, then it would be a much closer call," Arbogast said.

To help the proposed XM-Sirius merger at the FCC, Sirius has hired the communications law firm Wiley Rein of the District. Managing partner Richard E. Wiley is a former FCC chairman. Martin, the FCC chairman, is a former associate of the firm.

The proposed XM-Sirius merger will face opposition from the National Association of Broadcasters, the trade group of AM and FM radio stations, and local television stations, which has fought the satellite radio services on various fronts since their inception.

"Given the government's history of opposing monopolies in all forms, NAB would be shocked if federal regulators permitted a merger of XM and Sirius," NAB spokesman Dennis Wharton said in a statement. "In coming weeks, policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming."

The NAB has fought XM's rollout of local traffic and weather channels, now in 21 areas, including the District and Baltimore. The NAB says the move violates the spirit of the FCC's intention to license a national satellite radio service. Radio stations in those areas fear losing advertising to XM, which airs commercials on its traffic and weather reports, unlike its music channels.

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union said his organization will "raise some antitrust concerns, forcing Justice to look at whether there's a unique satellite market that needs to be preserved with competition."

If the merger is approved, XM and Sirius must reconcile different forms of satellite technology. XM's two satellites are in low-angle, geo-stationary orbit in the Southern sky above the United States. Sirius's three satellites orbit in a figure-eight over North America. Because Sirius's satellites are directly overhead, their signals are less likely to be blocked by tall buildings, trees and mountain ridgelines to the south. However, because the Sirius satellites move in the sky throughout the day, Sirius customers with stationary units sometimes have to move their antennas from one side of the house to another. The problem is less pronounced for Sirius mobile units, such as in cars.

Both services augment their satellite feeds with hundreds of terrestrial "repeater" devices mounted on structures around the country that help broadcast the signal in high-density areas, such as cities.

Sirius struggled with management and technical problems and fell behind XM early on, then surged ahead by launching its first satellite in 2000. XM beat Sirius to rollout, launching its service in September 2001. Sirius made a limited rollout five months later. By the end of 2006, Sirius had 6 million subscribers to XM's 7.6 million.

XM subscriber John Goodman of Tuckahoe, N.Y., said he has several questions about how the deal will affect him.

"My biggest question is what happens to my XM receiver," Goodman said. "I have spent over $100 on my XM receiver so I can listen to the Red Sox games when I'm in the house or outside. How does all this impact me?"

XM, Sirius Cut Deal To Unite Satellite Forces (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

Rivals XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio agreed to combine in a $13 billion stock transaction, the companies announced yesterday.

Under the deal, billed as a "merger of equals," Sirius Chief Executive Officer Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons will keep their respective positions in the combined company. XM CEO Hugh Panero will stay on until the deal closes, which the companies expect to happen by the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0133625

Shareholders of District-based XM and Sirius, based in New York, each will own about 50 percent of the new company, whose name and headquarters have not been determined.

The deal, pending regulatory approval, would join the only players in the decade-old industry. Together, XM and Sirius fund a roster of high-profile talent ranging from shock-jock Howard Stern to daytime talk-show queen Oprah Winfrey, catering to 14 million subscribers.

"We are excited for the many opportunities that an XM and Sirius combination will provide consumers," Mr. Parsons and Mr. Panero said in a joint statement that touted more programming choices and billions of dollars in savings.

While receivers for both companies can't receive signals from each other, Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin told the Associated Press yesterday they are developing receivers that could receive both signals. Meanwhile, the company is working on other arrangements to bring formerly exclusive programming to both subscriber bases, they said.

Currently, XM has more than 7.6 million subscribers and a market capitalization -- the value of a company based on the stock price multiplied by the number of shares outstanding -- of $3.75 billion, while Sirius has more than 6 million subscribers and a market cap of $5.2 billion.

The rate of subscriber growth has slowed at both companies, which had combined revenue of $1.5 billion last year. XM and Sirius also have drawn the ire of Wall Street for bleeding millions of dollars on competing with each other over the years for high-priced talent.

"This is happening because investors are just out of patience," said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio. "They're just tired of this spiral of red ink, of losing money and costs that continue to go on."

The two companies' rosters mirror each other. XM boasts of personalities such as Oprah and shock jocks Opie and Anthony, with content from Major League Baseball, IndyCar Series Racing and college football's Bowl Championship Series. The Sirius lineup includes Mr. Stern, Martha Stewart, the National Football League, NASCAR and the National Basketball Association.

The merger must be approved by the Federal Communications Commission and Department of Justice.

The FCC's rules on satellite radio licenses currently bar such a deal, and Chairman Kevin J. Martin said yesterday the regulatory hurdle would be "high."

"Obviously, the commission will evaluate any transaction filed to make a determination whether or not approval would be in the public interest. The hurdle here, however, would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses. The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," said Mr. Martin, a Republican.

The Justice Department did not respond to requests for comment yesterday, a federal holiday.

Sirius and XM are expected to make the case that market conditions have changed significantly since 1997, and they alluded to that in their announcement yesterday.

"The combined company will be better positioned to compete effectively with the continually expanding array of entertainment alternatives that consumers have embraced since the Federal Communications Commission first granted our satellite radio licenses a decade ago," Mr. Parsons and Mr. Panero said.

Representatives for Sirius and XM did not return calls seeking additional comment.

Rumors of a merger between Sirius and XM have been brewing for months, fueled by analysts' speculation and public statements made by the companies' executives. Last month, at the International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, both Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin appeared open to the idea, with Mr. Karmazin noting that "consolidation creates value."

The deal has its critics. In a statement yesterday, Dennis Wharton, executive vice president of the National Association of Broadcasters, described the deal as "a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace." The NAB is a trade group whose members include traditional radio stations.

The board of directors for the combined company will have 12 members. In addition to Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin, each company will name four members. General Motors Corp. and Honda Motor Co. will each have a seat.

The companies will hold a conference call this morning to discuss the deal.

On Friday, shares of XM closed at $13.98 and Sirius closed at $3.70 on Nasdaq. Markets were closed yesterday in observance of Presidents Day.

Sirius CEO Spent His Career Making Deals (USAT)

By Laura Petrecca

USA Today, February 20, 2007

If there's anything that Mel Karmazin knows, it's the art of the deal.

The 63-year-old media executive has spent most of his career expanding the reach — and public profile — of the companies he's run.

Since he joined Sirius Satellite Radio in November 2004 as CEO, he's signed big-name talent to create channels such as Martha Stewart Living Radio and Jamie Foxx's The Foxxhole. Now, with the planned XM and Sirius merger, he's slated to take over as CEO of the combined company.

The native New Yorker got his start as a radio ad salesman at WCBS in 1967. He joined John Kluge's Metromedia in 1970, rising to general manager, before leaving in 1981 to become president of Infinity Broadcasting. He became Infinity's CEO in 1988.

It was in the 1980s and 1990s at Infinity that he really made his mark — expanding it from a fledgling company to a radio empire, buying up stations around the country, particularly in major markets.

It also was at Infinity that Karmazin first worked with Howard Stern. (Although Karmazin was Stern's boss when both worked for Infinity, he didn't engineer the shock jock's highly publicized move to Sirius. Stern jumped over before Karmazin.)

In January 1997, Karmazin became CEO of CBS Radio when Infinity and Westinghouse/CBS merged. By May of that year, he was named CEO of the CBS Station Group of radio and TV station assets. After Viacom acquired CBS in 2000, Karmazin became that company's president and chief operating officer.

Let XM And Sirius Merge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

The FCC shouldn't stop the nation's two providers of satellite radio from joining forces, because they would be only one of many in the audio entertainment business.

FEDERAL REGULATORS are notoriously slow to act, yet it took the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission less than half a day to erect a daunting roadblock to the proposed merger of the country's two satellite radio services, XM and Sirius. Within hours of the companies' announcement of their intention to combine operations, FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin reacted, saying that XM and Sirius "would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

Martin's two-pronged test sets a nearly insurmountable bar. It's hard to argue that "more choice" results when the only two suppliers of a product combine, or that the merged entity will be deterred from hiking the fees paid by its subscribers (14 million at last count). In addition, when the FCC issued two licenses for a national satellite radio service in 1997, it said that they could not be owned by a single company.

That said, Martin's statement is inconsistent with the approach the FCC has taken on media consolidation in general. The goal should be to promote choice not in the niche occupied by XM and Sirius but in the general market of audio entertainment. That market is very competitive, particularly among national players.

Consider a few statistics. Half of the new cars sold in the U.S. this year will have stereo systems designed to work seamlessly with an iPod. These and similar devices can also play podcasts — a recorded program that emulates over-the-air radio — from more than 44,000 sources. Of the roughly 12,500 over-the-air stations pumping out conventional radio broadcasts, about 1,200 also broadcast in digital — frequently, with more than one channel in different formats. And a growing number of mobile devices are able to tap into the expanding ranks of online music services.

Meanwhile, Sirius and XM are bleeding money at a prodigious rate as they try to amass the subscribers needed to overcome their debt and depreciation costs. Allowing them to merge could save them billions of dollars in marketing and maintenance expenses while preserving satellite radio as one of many alternatives available to consumers.

Anticipating resistance from the FCC, the companies said they would let people subscribe to channels on a more a la carte basis — a favorite cause of Martin's, at least where cable and satellite TV are concerned — and broaden their programming. They also said the combination would lead to less expensive receivers and more advanced services, such as delivering improved traffic and weather reports. The FCC should look at these concessions, declare victory and approve the merger.

Hollywood Gets Tough On Movie Copying In Canada (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 18 — Canada heavily promotes itself as a place to make films. But now it has a more dubious distinction: an analysis by the Motion Picture Association of America has found that 30 to 40 percent of the bootleg DVDs sold in the United States were made by camcorders smuggled into Canadian theaters.

In response, 20th Century Fox Film is considering holding back film releases for the Canadian market, and the film industry in general is calling for stricter Canadian laws. One theater chain has even equipped some its staff with night-vision goggles to better ferret out copiers.

The apparent rise of Canada's illegal film industry stems from several factors. Tighter federal and state laws in the United States covering film piracy have not been matched by similar legislation in Canada. And because most film releases are simultaneous in Canada and the United States, Canadian pirates get a head start relative to their counterparts abroad.

And, finally, even industry officials acknowledge that Canadian pirates offer technically superior work.

"There are professional Canadian camcord rings and they are very, very good at what they do," said John G. Malcolm, the director of worldwide antipiracy operations for the Motion Picture Association of America in Los Angeles. "There is a premium placed on getting early copies and high-quality copies. Everyone in the industry knows that camcording in Canada is a major, major problem."

The film industry's estimate of how many black market DVDs originate from Canadian multiplexes is not simply a guess. In many release prints, almost unnoticeable identification marks are scattered throughout random frames.

On the studios' behalf, Technicolor and Deluxe Laboratories, the leading producers of those prints, regularly analyze illicit DVDs as well as online film postings, uncover the identification codes and then use them to trace the copies back to the theater where they were videotaped.

In Canada, that trail usually leads to theaters in the Montreal area, which is estimated to be the source of three-quarters of the illicit copies that come from the country.

In the United States, federal law as well as 40 state laws can impose harsh penalties for videotaping movies from theater screens, a process known as camming. In Canada, however, it violates copyright laws only if the police can show in court that the camera operator intended to commercially distribute copies of the recording.

"It's very hard for us to prove that a person is actually doing that," said Ellis Jacob, the president and chief executive of Cineplex Entertainment, Canada's dominant theater chain, speaking from Toronto. "All we can do is get rid of the patron and ask them not to come back."

Like everyone in the Canadian theater business, Mr. Jacob has received two letters from Bruce Snyder, the president of domestic distribution for Fox. (All studios treat Canada as part of the United States market.) The messages were blunt. Describing the situation in Canada as "an out of control epidemic," Mr. Snyder warned the theater owners that Fox may delay Canadian releases by several weeks.

In an interview, Mr. Snyder said he has no complaints about companies like Cineplex, which are, after all, his customers.

"I am not mad at the exhibition community," Mr. Snyder said. "The exhibitors are doing everything they can to help us." Like Mr. Jacob, his concerns are with Canadian law and law enforcement.

Canada accounts for about 7 to 10 percent of a film's total North American revenue. The spillover effect of movie coverage by American television and publications would be diminished if Mr. Snyder delayed Canadian releases.

DOJ_NMG_0133628

"It's a drastic step," Mr. Snyder said. "But you've got to plug that hole somehow. It could be short-term damage for long-term benefit."

In the interim, Cineplex has supplied several theater managers with night-vision goggles and increased the surveillance of theaters, particularly during afternoon screenings. After an extensive investigation, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police arrested one Montreal man in September for taping movies. Working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Canadian police has traced his handiwork to black-market DVDs sold in New York.

Because prosecutors are still working out formal charges, the man cannot be identified. Sgt. Jean-Yves Ducharme of the Mounted Police in Montreal said the man is less than 30 years old and "a person who did not make a lot of money out of it."

The suspect, he added, was a computer enthusiast who appeared to be motivated by producing high-quality copies and distributing them as close to a film's release as possible.

Canada's theater owners and other film industry groups are pressing the Canadian government to make the simple act of recording from a theater screen a crime. Mr. Jacob said they have received little response to date.

Christian Girouard, a spokesman for Canada's justice department, said officials were discussing the situation with the industry and other government departments. He said he was unable to describe what, if any, measures might be taken.

Scor Likely Isn't Done Pursuing Converium (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Goran Mijuk

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Swiss reinsurer Converium Holding AG spurned a takeover proposal from French rival Scor SA. But the courtship isn't likely over and it may be the first of many this year in the European insurance sector.

Converium said yesterday its board rejected a proposed offer of three billion Swiss francs ($2.43 billion) made by Scor over the weekend. If merged, the two companies could leapfrog several competitors to become one of the world's five largest reinsurers depending on how it's measured. Reinsurance firms essentially backstop insurance companies' biggest risks in return for a cut of their premiums.

Scor said it secured a 32.9% stake in Converium and approached the board regarding a proposed offer of 21 francs a share for the rest -- a 12% premium to the stock's closing price Friday. A 33.3% stake would require a formal offer, according to Swiss securities rules. Scor said it is convinced that a tie-up makes sense, so it is unlikely that chatter about a merger between the two will end there.

Scor said a merger with Converium was "a unique strategic opportunity to create a top five global multiline reinsurer in this time of market consolidation."

Converium said the offer "fundamentally fails to recognize the value of Converium's franchise and growth prospects, and is not in the interest of Converium, its shareholders and its customers."

A Converium spokesman noted that Scor's official stake will be filed publicly this week and that Converium remains focused on growth and profitability targets laid out in recent weeks. A Scor spokesman declined to comment beyond the company's statement.

The Scor offer could be the first of several in the insurance sector this year. Cost cuts and below-average claims have left many European insurers with billions more than regulators require to back up their policies. At the same time, maturing insurance markets in the U.S. and Europe have lead analysts to expect single-digit premium growth -- particularly in property-casualty coverage -- in coming years. Some players may seek growth by buying up rivals with today's excess cash.

"I think it will be a busy year," said Joseph Rohm, a financial-services analyst with T. Rowe Price Group Inc. in London. "Because of all the excess capital being generated and the difficulties some companies will have finding growth, I think we'll see a lot more deals."

Analysts have estimated that European insurers finished 2006 with more than €50 billion, or about $66 billion, more in the bank than regulators require. Greater scale typically benefits insurers by potentially lowering their borrowing costs. This will be a greater focus in coming years as new solvency rules expected in 2010 will favor companies with broader diversification.

DOJ_NMG_0133629

This could lead smaller participants such as Scor and Converium to weigh merging. "This offer is a good example of the kinds of deals we might see this year," Mr. Rohm said.

Scor's move follows the 2006 takeover by Swiss Reinsurance Co. of General Electric Co.'s reinsurance operations, a deal that was aimed at boosting both companies' capital strength and global reach.

A takeover by Scor would create a company with substantial life and nonlife business with annual premiums of about €5.3 billion. It would catapult the combined entity close to the world's largest reinsurers -- led by Swiss Re; Munich Re AG; Berkshire Hathaway Re, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.; and Germany's Hannover Re AG.

Analysts said the timing of the bid was sensible as Converium shares are relatively inexpensive due to the company's restructuring.

But some, such as Oddo Securities analyst Nicolas Jacob, warned that investors worry Scor would have to make another call on capital markets to finance a merger and that the move indicates a troubling strategic shift toward the risky nonlife reinsurance sector, where Converium is focused. Scor came close to financial collapse in 2002 after losses from contracts written in the 1990s plunged it deep into the red. It was saved by capital increases of more than €1 billion and a huge restructuring plan.

Its focus shifted toward life reinsurance, which has a steadier claims record than the more volatile property-and-casualty reinsurance sector that is often prone to huge claims from catastrophes.

Scor shares fell 7.3% to €19.57 in Paris yesterday. Converium rose nearly 14% to 21.35 francs in Zurich.

Converium is still smarting from a heavy restructuring in the wake of a massive reserve shortfall in the U.S. in 2004, which required the company to issue new shares, reduce staff and leave the U.S. reinsurance market. Although it has since turned profitable and boasts a strong capital base, Converium is still rated triple-B by most rating agencies, a level deemed too low for a reinsurer to do bulk business.

However, Converium expects an upgrade to the crucial A-level later this year once an industrywide probe by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to be finalized. Such a step wouldn't just boost its share price but also likely help spur premium growth and profitability, analysts said.

Vulcan To Acquire Florida Rock (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Making a long-term wager on the now-faltering construction markets in the U.S. Sunbelt region, Vulcan Materials Co. yesterday said it agreed to acquire Florida Rock Industries Inc. in a cash and stock deal valued at about $4.6 billion.

Florida Rock makes construction aggregates such as concrete and distributes gravel and sand.

The total blended cash and stock consideration of $68.03 a share, based on the 4 p.m. price of Vulcan Materials' stock Friday of $111.81 a share, represents a premium of 45% for Florida Rock shareholders based on the company's own 4 p.m. Friday stock price of $46.96. The price is only slightly above Florida Rock's 52-week-high of $66.10.

In an interview, Vulcan Chief Executive Officer Donald M. James said the combined company's largest market will be in public infrastructure, such as highways. That said, "we are not afraid of the residential market. We recognize there is a correction going on. This is an opportune time for Vulcan to make a transaction."

Florida Rock's shares have fallen 17% over the past year, as investors feared booming growth in Florida would taper off as part of a nationwide real-estate slowdown.

"It's a cyclical business," noted Florida Rock CEO John D. Baker. "Housing markets clearly got ahead of themselves, and we're going to see a correction. It may take three months or it may take six months."

He noted, however, that "Florida is going to come back. Florida is looking to when the first baby boomer turns 65 in a year or two. Long term that's a great thing, and that's what Vulcan saw" in making the deal.

Vulcan is based in Birmingham, Ala., while Florida Rock has its headquarters in Jacksonville, Fla.

The deal, which should close in mid-2007, is expected to be neutral to Vulcan Materials' earnings this year and accretive next year and beyond.

DOJ_NMG_0133630

Vulcan Materials said it anticipates annual pretax cost synergies of about $50 million and expects the combined company to have aggregate reserves totaling about 13.9 billion tons.

Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz acted as financial and legal advisers to Vulcan Materials. Lazard Ltd. and law firms Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP and McGuireWoods LLP advised Florida Rock.

Apple Gets More Time To Answer IPhone Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Apple Inc. was granted more time to respond to Cisco Systems Inc.'s claim that its new iPhone mobile handset infringes on a Cisco trademark. Cisco said it agreed to give Apple until tomorrow to file its legal response in the case. The San Jose, Calif., networking company said Apple asked for a second extension after the initial extension ended Thursday, and Cisco complied. Cisco filed suit in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Jan. 10, arguing the Cupertino, Calif., maker of electronic products and computers infringed on a trademark Cisco obtained in 2000 with its acquisition of Infogear Technology Corp. Cisco markets a phone with the iPhone name through its Linksys division. Apple has called the suit "silly" and says that other products also use the iPhone name, but the companies have been trying to resolve the issue through negotiations.

Supreme Court To Rule On US Patent Law (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

The Supreme Court will on Wednesday test the global reach of US patent law, in a case that could have big implications for new technology industries such as software and biotechnology.

The case concerns whether Microsoft should be liable for damages overseas for infringing a software patent owned by AT&T for the manufacture of synthetic speech. It will test the extraterritorial application of US patent law in the information age at a time when courts around the world are struggling to apply national laws to increasingly globalised economic activity.

However, the court is also being urged to use the case to look at a much bigger issue: the scope of what can be patented in the first place, including software. If the court takes up that issue – a move that is far from guaranteed – it could make an even bigger impact on US patents and incentives for innovation.

The software group and the telecommunications company have hired powerful lawyers to fight this battle whilst a wide range of high-tech, biotech and other corporations, as well as the US government, have joined the legal battle by filing “friend of the court” briefs warning of the impact of the case on the future of US innovation.

The federal appeals court that heard the Microsoft case gave US patent law a very broad reach but the Supreme Court may take a more narrow view, giving high-tech companies more protection against patent lawsuits based on exports.

AT&T won a claim that Microsoft infringed its -patent by including its technology in the Windows operating systems installed in computers built in the US. This case tests whether Microsoft must also pay when it sends Windows versions including the AT&T technology overseas for installation in -foreign-made computers.

The dispute centres on a law aimed at preventing companies from circumventing US patent law by shipping “components” overseas for assembly. The case tests whether software is such a “component” and whether creating copies of software overseas from a master disk shipped from the US is covered by that law.

The case will be heard at a time of unprecedented up-heaval in the patent system. The Supreme Court is expected to rule shortly in a case that could set new standards for when an inventions is deemed too obvious to warrant a patent. Congress is also planning substantial legislative reforms.

The Virtue Of Patents (WSJ)

By Laura Peter

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

There is a large risk that Congress may deform the patent system rather than reform it. For in its quest to modernize the antiquated and underfunded system for protecting our inventions, Congress has trotted out an easy target -- so-called "patent trolls" -- to justify changes that would stifle innovation, benefiting large technology companies at the expense of smaller ones.

DOJ_NMG_0133631

"Patent trolls" are typically companies that buy patent rights from inventors, then receive royalties from other companies who actually use the patents. Inventors get either a single payment, or a share of the royalties. In some cases trolls (like other patent owners) must go to court to enforce their patents; and like any group, some of them use abusive litigation against large technology companies in the hopes of extorting settlements.

But large technology companies often "troll" themselves, using their own portfolio of thousands (if not tens of thousands) of patents to sue smaller firms financially unable to defend themselves. And when the claims are unmerited or frivolous, this is a rather convenient way to stifle competition.

Thus, it is right to end frivolous trolling, but the right way is through narrow, targeted reform. Unfortunately, some reform proposals cast too wide a net, and would hurt small technology companies' ability to benefit from their own inventions.

First, Congress is considering proposals that would excessively limit the ability of small technology companies to amend pending patent applications known as "continuation" patents. These patents, however, are a primary way that emerging technology companies protect themselves. One invention can actually consist of tens of smaller inventions, but it can be prohibitively costly for an emerging company to file patents covering all of them; and sometimes the potential value of a component invention is not apparent until a market develops later. Thus, limiting these patents too much would just reward copycats with resources, and not the innovators.

Second, Congress is considering greatly expanding the ability of large technology companies to challenge smaller companies' patents even after they are issued. As a witness testified, a cheaper, faster alternative to litigation for challenging the validity of patents would help eliminate the need to pay for many licenses -- this, however, is wrongheaded. Already, well-funded companies have proved their willingness to pile multiple challenges in multiple proceedings on smaller firms.

Currently, for example, a large company can challenge a patent both in court and with the federal Patent Office, forcing a small firm to fight on two fronts. Adding yet another battlefront would simply hurt smaller firms, who are often pushed to the brink of bankruptcy defending their rights, without ensuring greater justice.

Finally, these and other proposed reforms would materially increase the costs of filing for patents. This could devastate emerging companies which pour all of their resources into the tools and people needed to turn their ideas into products. They often are not patent-savvy, or cannot afford the huge expense of filing good patents.

To fully appreciate how vulnerable emerging companies can be, keep in mind that patents can cost anywhere from $5,000, to $50,000. In Silicon Valley, the price for a good-quality patent is about $12,000. Does it seem absurd that these relatively small sums could stand in the way of emerging companies? Ask yourself whether Don Hewlett or Steve Jobs could have afforded the patents necessary to protect themselves if their filing and litigation costs surged at the same time a larger company sent lawyers to their garage doors.

By weakening the patent system, Congress would harm the ability for smaller companies to benefit from their innovations. If they cannot reap these benefits, they will not have the money to invest in commercializing their innovations and bringing them to market. And, without that money, they will be unable to invest in other new products and technology, meaning that innovation could become the purview of a few large companies with big budgets.

There is, however, a reason why so many advances come from garages, living rooms and basements -- large companies do not have as much freedom to pursue creativity to where it might lead them. Emerging companies, however, often begin as research and development firms who only later try to generate revenue to help them reach the critical mass so that they can become true manufacturers.

So, when you hear about patent trolls, think of Segway (inventors of the two-wheeled, self-balancing transportation device), think of Andre Pavel (the inventor of the Walkman personal stereo), and yes, think of H-P and Apple decades ago. They each were at the forefront cutting-edge technology and had to defend and assert their patents to become what they are today.

Neutrality On The Net Gets High '08 Profile (WP)

By Charles Babington

DOJ_NMG_0133632

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Bloggers and other Internet activists made their marks in the past two presidential elections chiefly by building networks of political enthusiasts and raising money for candidates. Now, they are pushing aggressively into policymaking -- and not just over high-profile issues such as Iraq.

They are pressing candidates to back a handful of issues that are obscure to many Americans but vital to those who base their livelihoods on the Internet and track its development.

Armed with massive e-mail lists and high-speed networks, these activists are bypassing the familiar campaign tactics of door-knocking and phone-banking. They are also using their new-age technologies for an old-fashioned purpose: making politicians take note of their legislative priorities.

One of those is "net neutrality." Hardly a household term, it has no overtly partisan or ideological dimensions. Yet it is shaping up as a Democratic issue this year, largely because its most fervid advocates are liberal bloggers and other Internet activists who play a big role in the early stages of choosing a Democratic presidential nominee.

Unlike their Republican counterparts, every major Democratic presidential candidate has endorsed net neutrality. The move keeps them in good standing with powerful grass-roots groups, such as MoveOn.org, and costs them little in return -- perhaps a bit of space on campaign Web sites to promote a matter that comparatively few voters might explore.

Net neutrality is a principle that bars Internet providers, primarily phone and cable companies, from charging higher rates to Web-based firms in return for giving their content priority treatment on the pathways to consumers. Without such restrictions, proponents say, a user might find it time-consuming, or even impossible, to call up a favorite site that carriers have relegated to slower lanes for economic or even philosophical reasons.

"It's an issue that really captures the attention of one of their core constituencies, especially the bloggers and 'netroots,' " said Craig Aaron of Free Press, a group that champions net neutrality. "For candidates looking to appeal to those folks, it was important to take a stand," he said, even though "nobody was talking about it a year ago."

A veteran Democratic consultant who spoke on condition of anonymity was more blunt. Among Democratic candidates, she said, "if you're not for net neutrality, then the blogs will kick your" rear. The grass-roots groups that strongly favor it are relatively small but very noisy, she said, "and you just don't want to have to deal with that."

Opposing net neutrality are the telephone and cable companies that control the "pipes" that transport Internet content from producers to users. The companies say they need flexibility to manage Internet traffic, even if it eventually means charging higher rates for priority service.

For several years, the issue has been debated mainly in legal and telecom circles. Recent telecom mergers have raised its profile, however, as regulators considered the possible ramifications of consolidating control over the Internet's major pathways.

Net neutrality restrictions "could prevent broadband providers from offering enhanced levels of service for specialized applications such a telemedicine, or to offer their own branded or co-branded products or services," said Christopher Wolf, co-chairman of Hands Off the Internet, a group sponsored by phone and cable companies . Such arrangements, he said at a recent Federal Trade Commission workshop, "will help pay for the build-out of the next generation of Internet pipes."

Moreover, Wolf said, his industry's critics cannot cite an example in which any U.S. user has been blocked.

But some groups that rely heavily on their Web sites to share information, raise money or promote causes say they fear it's only a matter of time. They cite, for example, a 2005 comment by William L. Smith, then chief technology officer for BellSouth, which has merged with AT&T, that Internet service providers should be able to charge a firm such as Yahoo for the opportunity to have its search site load faster than Google's site.

Last spring, the debate over net neutrality barely scratched the consciousness of Congress, let alone the general public, after a House subcommittee defeated an effort to add net-neutrality restrictions to a multi-faceted telecommunications bill. The 23 to 8 vote goaded more than 850 interest groups, many, but not all, politically left of center, to form a coalition called SavetheInternet.com.

Members included organizations such as Common Cause and the American Civil Liberties Union, but the name that really grabbed the attention of Democratic officials was MoveOn.org. The group, founded in 1998 to oppose the impeachment of President Bill Clinton, rocked the political establishment in 2003 and 2004 with its ability to rally supporters and raise money for causes such as opposing the Iraq war.

With MoveOn.org urging its 3 million members to sign and deliver pro-net-neutrality petitions to senators last spring, congressional support began to grow. The net-neutrality language died in an 11 to 11 Senate committee vote, but its backers claimed a moral victory after a wide-ranging telecom bill, which lacked their amendment, eventually collapsed.

The debate's partisan nature has surprised and disappointed some advocates, who note that conservative groups such as the Christian Coalition of America and the Gun Owners of America are part of the SavetheInternet coalition. The Christian Coalition of America, in its policy statement, said net neutrality is "extremely important to America's grassroots organizations and those Americans who want to ensure the cable and phone companies controlling access to the Internet will not discriminate against groups like Christian Coalition of America." Michele Combs, a spokeswoman for the Christian Coalition of America, said that net neutrality is a nonpartisan matter and that "the conservative side has not been educated on the issue."

MoveOn.org officials agree that net neutrality should transcend political lines. "There's a growing online people-powered movement that has increasing relevance in our politics," said Adam Green, a spokesman for MoveOn.org. "An issue like net neutrality, which directly taps into Internet issues, . . . could have a special energy in the political season," he said. "Every Republican and Democrat who uses the Internet is threatened by corporations that want to control which Web sites people can access."

Global-warming Theory And The Eugenics Precedent (WT)

By John Linder, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

"Global Warming" had a precursor in capturing the hearts and minds of the world. Michael Crichton, in his novel "State of Fear," brilliantly juxtaposes the world's current political embrace of "global warming" with the popular embrace of the "science" of eugenics a century ago. For nearly 50 years, from the late 1800s through the first half of the 20th century, there grew a common political acceptance by the world's thinkers, political leaders and media elite that the "science" of eugenics was settled science. There were a few lonely voices trying to be heard in the wilderness in opposition to this bogus science, but they were ridiculed or ignored.

Believers in eugenics argued that we could improve the human race by controlling reproduction. The most respected scientists from Harvard, Yale, Princeton and other bastions of intellectual rigor retreated to a complex on Long Island named Cold Spring Harbor. Their support came from the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation and the Harriman fortune working with the U.S. Departments of Agriculture, State and other agencies.

The "science" was not lacking important public supporters. Theodore Roosevelt, Winston Churchill and Woodrow Wilson were enthusiastic believers. The theory won approval of Supreme Court justices, leaders in higher education and Nobel Prize winners. The founder of Planned Parenthood, Margaret Sanger, was one of the most vocal adherents. She established the first "birth control" clinic in 1916.

They believed that "the best" human beings were not having as many children as inferior ones -- the foreigners, immigrants, Jews, Blacks, degenerates, the unfit and the "feeble minded." Sanger said "fostering the good-for-nothing at the expense of the good is an extreme cruelty." She spoke of the burden of caring for "this dead weight of human waste." H.G. Wells spoke against "ill-trained swarms of inferior citizens." Roosevelt said, "Society has no business to permit degenerates to reproduce their kind." George Bernard Shaw said that only eugenics could save mankind.

Twenty-nine states passed laws allowing sterilization. Ultimately, 60,000 Americans were sterilized -- some legally. The Germans were the most progressive. They had help. The Rockefeller Foundation funded the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute and the work of its central racial scientists, one of whom was Josef Mengele.

Ultimately the "mental defectives" in Germany were brought to newly built houses where they were interviewed. They were then shown to a back room where they were gassed. Eventually the German program was expanded into a vast network that killed 10 million undesirables. After World War II many of the public adherents to the pseudoscience of eugenics went silent. Colleges removed the textbooks and stopped teaching it.

But not everyone went away. As recently as July 24, 2003 Tony Platt testified before the California Senate Judiciary Committee on S.R. 20 relative to eugenics. He agreed that the state should apologize for its actions.

One must ask, "How in the world did university researchers come to conclusions that defended this outrageous affront to society?" A look back at the research concluded that the researchers adjusted their outcomes to support the theory of those paying for the research. This is not unusual. It is very easy to believe that the settled science regarding climate change is just as suspicious, and indeed may be another example of pseudo-science capturing the imagination of politicians, actors and the media elite who have a desperate need to embrace some "science" which may force us to change the way we live our lives. H. L. Mencken once wrote, "The urge to save humanity is almost always a false front for the urge to rule it." We see pictures of huge blocks of ice crashing into the sea from the Antarctic Peninsula, which comprises about 2 percent of the continent. The fact that the remaining 98 percent of Antarctica is growing by 26.8 gigatons of ice per year is ignored.

We are told today that human activity is causing a dramatic increase in carbon dioxide levels that is responsible for "global warming." While a congressional delegation was visiting the Antarctic expedition in January of 2003 we were shown the results of the Vostok ice-sheet cores where temperatures and CO2 levels were measured as far as 400,000 years ago. At that time, the level of CO2 was 280 parts per million parts of atmosphere (ppm), about what it was 20 years ago. The levels of CO2 and temperature rode up and down in consonance over 400,00 years. "Who," I asked, "was burning the fossil fuels 400,000 years ago?" I was treated as though I was rude.

It has been known for years that most CO2 is dissolved in the oceans. It is called "carbon sinking." The oceans typically contain 60 times as much CO2 as the atmosphere. It is also known that colder waters dissolve more CO2 than warm waters. Which do you think is cause and which is effect? We currently have CO2 levels of about 380 ppm. A recent study completed at UC Davis concluded that the amount of CO2 in the atmosphere 300 million years ago was on the order of 2,000 ppm. Then this, "the same increase that experts expect by the end of this century as remaining reserves of fossil fuels are burned." If it is a given that human burning of fossil fuels is what will cause an increase of CO2 levels up to 2,000 ppm in the next 93 years, don't they owe us an explanation as to who burned those fossil fuels 300 million years ago? In fact we are being treated to a modern scientific shell game. The most prevalent and efficient greenhouse gas is not CO2; it is water vapor, which accounts for about 60 percent of the heat-trapping gases while CO2 accounts for about 26 percent. So, why are we being served a daily diet of our destroying the environment with our behavior as it relates to CO2? Because our behavior has little to do with the amount of water vapor, so it is a non-starter when it comes to those whose principal goal is ruling our lives.

In order to focus on you and what you are doing to increase the CO2 in the atmosphere, which, as everyone knows will destroy the globe, we do not discuss the activities of termites. Fifteen years ago it was estimated that the digestive tracts of termites produce about 50 billion tons of CO2 and methane annually. That was more than the world's production from burning fossil fuel. Additionally, cattle, horses and other ruminant animals are huge producers of both CO2 and methane, but, being unable to respond to our demands on this issue, their activity is ignored.

When it comes to methane, another greenhouse gas, termites are responsible for 11 percent of the world's production from natural sources. Seventy-six percent comes from wetlands, which provide habitat conducive to bacteria, which produce 145 million metric tons of methane per year during the decomposition of organic material. It is curious that the very alarmists on climate change are alarmists on saving and increasing wetlands.

It becomes clear from the literature -- not to mention documentary films -- produced by the alarmists, that if human beings do not change the way we live the planet is doomed. This is not the first charge against human behavior. Many of you will remember the "scientific" studies 30 years ago about the destruction of the ozone layer, particularly at the poles, that would reduce the atmosphere's ability to stop infrared rays from the sun. We would see increasing incidence of skin cancer and increasing temperatures. It was theorized that this was caused by the increased production of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) that were used -- as Freon -- in refrigeration units.

When Freon was invented it was considered a miracle gas. It replaced, in refrigeration units, a combination of toxic gases that, if released, actually killed people. But the settled science concluded that human activity was a threat to the planet. We outlawed the production of CFCs and thousands of people across the world died from eating rancid food due to the loss of refrigeration.

The world's production of CFCs peaked at 1.1 million tons per year. If 100 percent of that was released it would have added 750,000 tons of chlorine into the atmosphere. That is insignificant compared to the 300 million tons the oceans yield annually by the evaporation of seawater alone. But that couldn't be controlled so the alarmists went after us.

Indeed, the eruption of Mt. Pinatubo in June of 1991 produced some of the highest levels of chlorine and bromines in history and led to some of the lowest ozone levels ever recorded. You would not know that today. The earth survived.

Today, if there is a settled science, it is adduced by climatologists who have been observing and studying the world for decades. Many are retired and not seeking government grants for research and thus not inclined to reach outcomes that are politically popular. Most have been through more than one alarmist cycle of doom. The predictions by scientists in Time magazine's "Another Ice Age?" in 1974 and Newsweek's "The Cooling World" in 1975 come to mind. The latter article stated that scientists "are almost unanimous in the view that the trend will reduce agricultural productivity for the rest of the century. If the climactic change is as profound as some of the pessimists fear, the resulting famines could be catastrophic."

But wise old heads believe that we are going through normal cycles of heating and cooling that we have seen over hundreds of millions of years as the earth heats and cools when the activity of the sun changes. The earth is heated by the sun. The sun is impacted by magnetic forces creating outbursts called sunspots, which increase the heat it imparts. During the coldest period in the Little Ice Age, which ended near the end of the 19th century, sunspots almost completely disappeared for 70 years. The earth cooled. Sunspot activity has been declining for a number of years and is expected decline by 40 percent over the next decade. The world is about to enter a cooling period. Be prepared to change your lifestyle.

Scientist Group Warns Of Warming 'Threat' (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

The board of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the nation's leading general science organization, yesterday issued a consensus statement declaring global climate change "a growing threat to society."

The statement, released at a town hall meeting of school teachers in San Francisco, marked the first time that the board of the influential AAAS, publisher of the journal Science, has taken a stand on global warming. AAAS held its annual meeting there over the weekend and organized the town hall on climate change, along with the California Science Teachers Association, the National Science Teachers Association and the United Educators of San Francisco, a union group.

The board's statement attributes Earth's recent warming to human activity, noting: "The atmospheric concentration of carbon dioxide, a critical greenhouse gas, is higher than it has been for at least 650,000 years. The average temperature of the Earth is heading for levels not experienced for millions of years."

The board called for "rapidly reducing greenhouse gas emissions," warning: "Delaying action to address climate change will increase the environmental and societal consequences as well as the costs."

It was the second high-profile statement on the issue in recent weeks: Last month, the United States Climate Action Partnership, a coalition of major companies and environmental groups, called for a mandatory cap on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to curb further global warming. On Tuesday, the Global Roundtable on Climate Change, a coalition of European and U.S. firms such as Air France, Alcoa and Florida Power & Light, chaired by Columbia University professor Jeffrey Sachs, plans to announce a worldwide framework for addressing climate change.

AAAS President John Holdren, a professor of environmental policy at Harvard University, has also publicly backed federal limits on carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases.

"As droughts, heat waves, floods wildfires and severe storms intensify, damages to ecosystems and human society are growing apace," Holdren, who also directs the Woods Hole Research Center, a research and policy analysis institute in Massachusetts, wrote in a letter to the attendees.

DOJ_NMG_0133636

The association aired a video at the town hall focusing on the 600 residents of Shishmaref, Alaska, who live on the shores of the Arctic Ocean and are facing beach erosion and thinning ice. Ken Stenek, a science teacher in Shishmaref who attended the session, said the 4,000-year-old Inupiaq village where he lives has been transformed by rising temperatures.

Susanne Moser, a research scientist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research, said the statement by the society reflected scientists' increasing focus on the question of global warming.

"In some sense, it's a continuation of the confirming and reaffirming and underlining of the consensus of mainstream science on climate change," Moser said. "It's really strengthening the case and political momentum" for cutting greenhouse gas emissions.

AAAS also issued at the meeting a teaching guide to global climate change. Teachers said it would help them better educate children about the scientific basis for global warming, since the information on the subject is evolving so quickly.

With New Pipeline Plan, Alaska's Governor Enters Precarious Territory (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

JUNEAU, Alaska, Feb. 15 — The new administration of Gov. Sarah Palin has been full of firsts. Ms. Palin, a Republican, is Alaska's first female governor and, at 42, its youngest.

She held her inauguration in frosty Fairbanks, a first that suited her conservative supporters but slighted the traditional host, this rainy, remote and less Republican state capital. She also appears to be the only governor in history whose spouse is a champion snowmobile racer and a former Arctic oil worker, and is widely referred to as First Dude.

Now, two months after taking office, Ms. Palin wants to become the first Alaska governor to deliver what many others have sought without success: construction of a $30 billion pipeline to transport natural gas from the state's North Slope to markets in the lower 48 states.

It is an enormous project that could strengthen Alaska's energy-based economy for decades to come, while also, according to some estimates, supplying 7 percent of the nation's natural gas annually.

But pulling off this first is shaping up to be more complicated.

Elected by a wide margin after promising to bring "new energy" and "transparency" to the pipeline project, Ms. Palin took office in December and immediately backed away from the negotiations that her predecessor, Frank H. Murkowski, had been pursuing with the three major energy companies that control much of the land where gas would be developed.

Ms. Palin has long criticized those negotiations as back-room dealings whose extensive incentives and tax breaks would have benefited the energy companies, BP, Exxon Mobil and ConocoPhillips, far more than they would have Alaska.

"Don't get me started," she said in an interview in her Capitol office on Thursday.

So next month, Ms. Palin intends to introduce the Alaska Gasline Inducement Act, a bill that would open the bidding to new players, as well as the old ones. She says her plan would ensure new jobs and access to gas for state residents. She also says that whoever gets to control the pipeline must allow for its potential expansion so that other gas developers can use it at reasonable prices, thus encouraging more development.

The new plan, however, would delay a formal agreement until next year at the earliest, and it would be another decade, until 2018, before the pipeline was in operation.

Ms. Palin won votes last fall for vowing to take just such steps, but in taking them, she has stirred concern beyond Alaska at a time when the Bush administration says it wants to develop new sources of energy.

In a report to Congress last month, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission said "the schedule for an Alaska gas pipeline has slipped considerably." The state's senior senator, Ted Stevens, a Republican famous for bringing big projects home, has openly expressed worry.

And on Tuesday, Rex W. Tillerson, the chairman and chief executive of Exxon Mobil, one of the companies that hopes to build the pipeline, said: "I don't really know where we are. I don't think it looks like Alaska knows where it wants to go, either."

Ms. Palin dismissed that talk. But next week, when she attends a National Governors Association meeting in Washington, she plans to visit Alaska's Congressional delegation and meet with officials at Exxon Mobil and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, among others. Besides putting minds at ease, she said, she wants to broaden the appeal of the project with the goal of gaining leverage in negotiations.

"This project is so much bigger than Alaska and Alaska's interests," Ms. Palin said. "This is for the nation. This is to supply domestically safe sources of fuel. We're going to be able to do that. We should be leading in a national energy plan."

The report by the energy commission suggested just such thinking, although it had a more urgent tone than in earlier assessments and sprinkled in some skepticism.

"The main obstacle to progress on an Alaskan gas pipeline is the failure to resolve state issues necessary before a project sponsor will commit to go forward," the report said. "The fresh competitive approach announced by the new governor must be successful if Alaska gas is to be part of the nation's energy supply solution in the coming years."

Steve Rinehart, a spokesman for BP Exploration Alaska, which controls the most land in the area expected to be developed first, said that with natural gas prices projected to stay relatively high and oil production on the North Slope declining, "the time has come to bring that gas to market."

"It makes sense economically," Mr. Rinehart said. "It makes sense for the life of this oil field."

But in the past, aides to Ms. Palin said, the big energy companies refused to commit to expanding the pipeline or to allow outside companies to use it for reasonable fees.

Mr. Rinehart disagreed. "We were ready to address those issues," he said, "but the process stopped."

Critical to pushing a plan through is the state's 60-member, Republican-controlled Legislature. Mr. Murkowski, a former United States senator, clashed with state lawmakers over his pipeline plan through his final days in office. Ms. Palin, by contrast, has echoed their concerns about giving away too much in tax breaks to the energy companies.

"What the governor has is a lot of credibility with the public," said State Representative John Harris, the speaker of the House. "She's been a breath of fresh air, in my opinion."

Lyda Green, president of the Senate, said Ms. Palin came to office without the intimate knowledge of the energy and financial industries that Mr. Murkowski had. But "she's a very quick study," Ms. Green said. "She has good people around her."

Ms. Palin has brought back some top staff members who left in protest over how Mr. Murkowski had been conducting the pipeline negotiations. Now she wants them to help her complete the deal that Mr. Murkowski never could.

"We are crafting this whole process with our arms open, even for Exxon," Ms. Palin said. "Come on in and let us know what you have in terms of a proposal to commercialize Alaska's natural gas."

Environment: What Are You Doing Here? (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

He heads Treasury, not the EPA, but Hank Paulson is investing time in making this White House greener.

Judging by the photos on the walls of his vast office, the new Treasury secretary has a gentler approach to the world than, say, Vice President Dick Cheney. While Cheney likes to hunt small birds with a shotgun, Hank Paulson shoots them with a camera. Photos of unusual birds—Paulson's vacation pictures, taken by his wife—hang above Bloomberg computer terminals feeding the latest Wall Street data to his desk. "If you look around here," he tells NEWSWEEK, gesturing at his photos, "I have spent a huge percentage of my time off in beautiful places, outdoor places, saving the land, wilderness, parks ... Conservation is my passion."

Paulson is a rare species inside the Bush administration. Environmentalists see this White House as a bastion of backward thinking; Bush has angered them (and America's allies) by sometimes questioning the science of global warming. Yet Paulson cares deeply about climate change: during his seven-year run as chairman and CEO of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank issued a policy paper backing the science on warming and promoting investment in alternative energy.

In recent months Paulson has played a leading role in the administration's debate about energy—and he's had an impact on environmental policy. It was Paulson who encouraged the former oil executives in the West Wing to embrace ambitious targets to cut by 20 percent the amount of gas Americans are forecast to consume by 2017 (part of the plan outlined in Bush's

State of the Union). White House officials portray the policy as a team effort, but identify Paulson as a driver. "He was very involved in the energy proposal," says a senior White House official, who declined to be named while talking about the internal debate.

Paulson had an expansive view of his job almost as soon as he started in June. By August he had identified energy security as one of his priorities, as well as Social Security reform and trade with China. A small team began working on ideas outside traditional Treasury business—some of them so politically sensitive that the team feared they might leak out before the November elections. Among them: putting a floor on the price of oil to subsidize alternative fuels. White House and Treasury officials deemed that idea too costly to administer—and out of line with GOP ideology. So Paulson's team worked with Bush's economic aides and the Department of Energy to head in a new direction: setting higher standards for fuel efficiency and alternatives like ethanol to spur new technologies. But there was some pushback. Bush's aides were concerned about the impact these proposals would have on a weakened Detroit, since higher-mileage standards favor foreign rivals. The solution was to allow for variable efficiency standards by car size.

Environmental groups were disappointed that Paulson didn't persuade Bush to wage a war against global warming. But the goal of using more alternative fuels and raising auto efficiency is still a significant change for an administration whose vice president once pooh-poohed conservation as "a sign of personal virtue." (Cheney's policy request: that the strategic petroleum reserve be doubled during the next 20 years.) Even green advocates concede there are some positive steps in the new strategy. "They are apparently serious about raising fuel-economy standards, and that is the most meaningful thing in the plan," says Dave Hamilton, director of global warming and energy programs at the Sierra Club.

To Paulson, the new energy strategy succeeds by giving something to just about everyone—even if green activists aren't totally thrilled. "Some people's expectations got so high they thought it was going to solve all the environmental problems, energy security, it was going to encompass everything, and they were disappointed," he says. "This policy has got some important positives for the environment, but they are collateral." Paulson may be an avid bird watcher, but while he's working for President Bush, he's keeping his head out of the clouds.

Mr. Spitzer's Chance On Warming (NYT)

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

Given the concerns of the new Democratic Congress, as well as persuasive new scientific evidence of the dangers of climate change, Washington may finally be ready to address the problem of global warming. The chances of that would be better still if New York's new governor, Eliot Spitzer, would commit himself and the state to a cause that needs all the friends it can get.

Mr. Spitzer should quickly commit himself to establishing ambitious goals for reducing emissions of carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and other industrial sources in New York State, and to writing regulations to achieve those goals. That will mean butting heads with powerful constituencies like the utilities, but Mr. Spitzer has always enjoyed a good fight. And with California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, already committed, Mr. Spitzer's intervention could tip the national debate and compel Washington to move more quickly than it might have to endorse meaningful federal legislation.

California has pointed the way. In October it became the first state to mandate reductions of greenhouse gas emissions from every sector of the economy. The plan calls for reducing such emissions to 1990 levels by 2020, with a longer-range goal of an 80 percent reduction by 2050. A state law already requires automobile companies to begin producing more fuel-efficient cars. And in January, Mr. Schwarzenegger ordered refineries and other fuel producers to reduce emissions by 10 percent, largely through the development of alternative fuels. California has also warned that it will stop buying electricity from power producers outside the state that produce heavy carbon dioxide emissions.

This would be a hard act to follow for any governor, but to some extent Mr. Spitzer's path has already been smoothed by his predecessor, George Pataki. Mr. Pataki joined with California in demanding more fuel-efficient cars and increased funds for energy-efficiency programs, and he directed that by 2013 one-quarter of New York's power must be produced by renewable fuels. And — perhaps most important — Mr. Pataki enrolled New York in an effort to reduce regional greenhouse gas emissions involving seven Northeastern states.

Mr. Spitzer, who built a formidable environmental record of his own as attorney general, has endorsed all of these programs. But he will have to go further if he intends to match Mr. Schwarzenegger. Among other things, he must help get the regional greenhouse initiative up and running, and make sure that any new power plants built to meet the state's energy needs use the most modern technologies and add as little as possible to the atmosphere's already heavy carbon burden.

This is a tall order even for an aggressive new governor. But the good news is that most of what Mr. Spitzer must do can be accomplished by executive order, thus skirting an unadventurous Legislature that tends to prefer business as usual.

Informal Survey Shows Shops Have Halted Sales Of Paraphernalia (ESG)

Elmira Star-Gazette, February 20, 2007

A crackdown on retail stores selling products that might be used in conjunction with illegal drugs in the city of Elmira appeared to be having an impact Monday.

In an informal survey by the Star-Gazette on Monday of seven city convenience and variety stores, only one offered an item that probably has no other use than for inhaling illegal drugs.

Last Friday, Elmira Police Chief W. Scott Drake III and a member of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration visited five businesses in the city that were found to be selling drug paraphernalia, including crack and methamphetamine pipes, scales and drug packaging materials.

The businesses had been visited on Jan. 24 and asked to voluntarily stop selling the items. Four of the five businesses were still selling the materials Friday.

Those businesses were put on notice that it is a violation of federal law to sell drug paraphernalia, and they were told that if they continued, they would be subject to arrest and the seizure of their businesses.

The crackdown was part of Operation Halt, the city's broad effort to reduce and eliminate drug trafficking and drug-related crime.

"We won't hesitate to go after them with the full force of local, state and federal laws," Drake said in a news release.

The five stores allegedly involved haven't been publicly identified. But the stores surveyed Monday by the Star-Gazette were both privately owned variety stores and chain convenience stores.

Some clerks said they had never sold such items as cigar wrappers and rose pipes while others said they once did, but have removed all such items from their shelves.

Those who said they had removed drug-related paraphernalia said they did so at the request of the police because they didn't want to risk breaking any laws.

Rose pipes are an item that cost less than $2 that purports to be a gift item of a miniature flower sealed by foil in a cylindrical glass tube. However, police said its only use is for inhaling illegal drugs like crack cocaine and meth.

None of the seven stores visited Monday had so-called drug starter kits -- common items like scales and small sealed plastic bags.

"The chief and his command staff deserve a lot of credit," Elmira Mayor John Tonello said Monday night. "They have made a huge impact in a short amount of time."

Tonello said he is also impressed with the citizens and business involvement in reporting suspicious activity on the new police tip-line.

The Elmira Police Department's new anonymous tip line, (607) 271-HALT (4258), has fielded 53 calls since its debut Jan. 24 as part of the drug control effort.

"By using 271-HALT, citizens are helping us crack down on crime," Drake said. "We're off to a great start."

It's an idea that appeals to regular citizens who want to help improve their communities.

"To me, drugs are the scourge of the world," said Penelope Patros, 77, of Elmira, who thinks Operation Halt is worth a try.

Criminal Organizations Using The Internet To Recruit, Rob (ABC)

By PIERRE THOMAS, JACK DATE And NITYA VENKATARAMAN

ABC News, February 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133640

Feb. 19, 2007 — Imagine being a prisoner in your own neighborhood.

That's how Wichita, Kan., police Chief Norman Williams describes communities struggling with the unexpected and emerging epidemic of gang violence in U.S. cities.

Watch Part 1 of Pierre Thomas' two-part series on gangs tonight on "World News with Charles Gibson."

"They feel that there is no way out, that there's no hope, and so they just have to live with it. It has a tremendous impact on quality of life in a in a neighborhood," Williams said of those communities.

Williams says that there's a new generation of gang members, and that they're starting as young as ages 11 to 14.

"The concerns you have with that generation is they do not have a criminal history. And so because they do not have a criminal history, we don't have a lot of information on them," Williams said.

Without that information, Williams says, members of the new gang generation will commit many crimes before they develop criminal records — acts that will instill fear and danger within many communities.

"What we're finding is a lot of our kids have no respect for life. They don't respect their life, and thereby they don't respect other peoples' lives. They think that the violence is like playing a video game. You turn it on and off. And it's not," he said.

Gang Recruitment Moves Online

According to a recent survey by the Justice Department, there are currently more than 21,000 gangs in the United States. Their membership is 700,000 strong and growing, and they're using the Internet to recruit members.

By posting online content that glorifies the thug lifestyle, gangs are using the Web to recruit — some using children as young as 8 years old as part of the online recruiting process, known as "Net Banging."

They sell drugs and guns, run car theft and prostitution rings, and use "bling" — money, cars, and jewelry — to entice troubled teens from poor neighborhoods, many with little or no family to speak of.

And the types of gangs fueling the country's surge in violence run the gamut: international gangs like MS-13, the Bloods and Crips, motorcycle gangs and local street gangs.

How Gangs Emerge

Chip Burress, assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Division, said, "It's not becoming an epidemic, it is an epidemic."

Burress says gang activity "starts small" with a handful of people who "begin to get a little more organized in their patterns of activity."

"They take control of territories and [they] recruit new members. They have to have some mechanism for making money, and usually that's in the drug trade, or the gang, or the firearms trade," Burress said.

"With that, you begin to get numbers," he said, "and you begin to get the type of traffic in an area that brings the standard of living down for the people that are living in that neighborhood."

An Inside Look at Gang Initiation

Undercover FBI video released to ABC News reveals footage from one gang initiation: a group of Bloods gathering with potential recruits in East Orange, N.J.

As their meeting began, the gang's leader, Tewhan Massacre Butler, preached to new recruits.

"I put my life on the line for y'all every day, every day," Butler says. "I am facing the rest of my life in prison for every one of y'all."

Some of the recruits in the video — many who appear to be teenagers — are eager to "bang," or join the Bloods.

"I am ready to bang it official," one recruit says.

"Ready to bang for the Blood here," says another.

To join, the initiates must endure an intense beating for at least 31 seconds.

The FBI says the Bloods in the video, known as the "Double II Set," were a particularly violent subset of the gang, murdering more than two dozen people over a three-year period.

FBI special agent "John," who targets the group, said one case in particular continued to haunt him.

"Right here, at this spot, a father was killed in front of his children," he said.

"He was killed trying to protect his son from becoming a member of the Bloods," the special agent said. "The man that killed him told another member of the Bloods, 'Take me to get my gun. I'm gonna show you how to murder somebody.'"

DOJ_NMG_0133641

One of the challenges the FBI faced when dealing with the Bloods was that the gang was so open about violence that community members were terrified to come forward.

The FBI says it has dismantled that particular franchise of the Bloods. To date, 42 members have been convicted under federal racketeering laws. Though some communities have not been this lucky, in the last year there have been 500 fewer acts of violence on what had been the gang's turf.

The Federal System

The FBI's Burress says the benefit of having the FBI engaged is access to the federal prison system.

"Gang members who go away to local jails, or even state penitentiaries, go to places where they're not as uncomfortable. They go into structures in prisons that they're very comfortable with." Burress said.

Burress said: "With the federal system, what you get is that gang member's suddenly going to a prison far, far away in a structure where he or she's not comfortable in. As a result, we, I think we do a greater service to the community by putting these guys away in areas where they're not able to continue their criminal enterprise."

Scandal In Colombia Raises Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Feb. 16 -- U.S. support for Colombia has been a foregone conclusion under the administration of President Ãlvaro Uribe, who was elected in 2002. But with a widening scandal tying the president's close supporters to paramilitary groups, policymakers on Capitol Hill say skepticism of Uribe's government is mounting, leading to closer scrutiny of a proposed aid package and free-trade agreement with the Andean nation.

On Thursday, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo AraÃºjo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized the country for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities.

And Friday, the Supreme Court, which is heading a probe of Congress, announced that it would provide prosecutors with documentation to help determine whether the foreign minister's father, Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Noguera, had ties to paramilitary groups and participated in the kidnapping of a businessman. The foreign minister's cousin, Hernando Molina, governor of the state of Cesar, is also under investigation by authorities for allegedly collaborating with paramilitary groups to carry out killings and finance his campaign.

Uribe said he would stand fast behind his foreign minister in the midst of a scandal that has put eight congressmen behind bars and led to the questioning of dozens of national and local politicians. At a news conference Friday, Foreign Minister AraÃºjo told reporters, "I'm going to keep working with efficiency, honor, results and joy."

Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers.

"The effects of what we call 'para-gate,' among Colombia followers in Congress, are that more and more folks are starting to get a bit skeptical regarding support, because there's a question of how far-reaching the relationship between the paramilitaries and the government officials is, vis-Ã-vis the president," a senior aide to a Republican senator said on condition of anonymity. "The confidence that we have in Uribe has been what's carried this for so long. That confidence has been brought into question."

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia.

"Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government," Levin said by telephone from Washington. "I voted for Plan Colombia, at least the first few times, but this is a very worrisome development."

Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan. Nearly $4.7 billion has been funneled to Colombia since Plan Colombia, an extensive aid package designed to defoliate coca and erode support for Marxist rebels, was instituted in 2000. The assistance has helped Colombia lower violence and tightened bonds between Bogota and Washington.

But Colombia continues to produce more than enough cocaine to meet world demand. And despite a highly touted demobilization that started in 2003, paramilitary groups still thrive, with shadowy new forces killing rivals, union leaders and peasants while battling guerrillas for control of the country's lucrative drug business. In the midst of this tumult, the Supreme Court and a team of prosecutors have begun to unearth extensive ties between paramilitary commanders and dozens of congressmen, regional politicians from coastal states and mid-level administration officials.

For Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment. He, Vice President Francisco Santos and Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos have made recent trips to the United States to press for approval of a free-trade agreement and more assistance to help the state take control of an unruly countryside. In Colombia's latest proposal, Uribe and his cabinet say they want to spend $44 billion in the coming years -- a program that would rely on a heavy infusion of aid from Washington and European countries.

"The whole scandal and the fact that all of these people are close confidants of the president are really going to muddy the waters as they're looking at a free-trade agreement and a new aid package in a democratically controlled Congress," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks U.S. aid to Colombia for the Center for International Policy in Washington. "The Colombian government has a rather big sales job ahead of it, and this makes it infinitely harder for them to do that sales job."

Vice President Santos, in an interview, said that the disclosures would never have come out if Uribe's government had not entered into negotiations with the paramilitary organizations, a process that he said not only led to a full-scale disarmament but emboldened institutions such as the Supreme Court to investigate authorities' paramilitary ties.

"We're going to deal with it openly, and confront reality and let the chips fall where they may," Santos said. "The most important thing is that we clearly present what we've done. The United States Congress should be totally calm about there being complete transparency here."

The Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe. "We remain committed to the free-trade agreement," Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters in Washington. He added that the administration would continue to back anti-narcotics operations in Colombia.

But the latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee.

"This confirms the concerns that many have had for a long time, that the paramilitaries have infiltrated the economic and political establishment of Colombian society," he said in a statement. "It should give us some pause as to who we are dealing with."

Police Needing Heavier Weapons (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Law enforcement agencies across the country have been upgrading their firepower to deal with what they say is the increasing presence of high-powered weapons on the streets.

Scott Knight, chairman of the Firearms Committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, says an informal survey of about 20 departments revealed that since 2004 all of the agencies have either added weapons to officers' patrol units or have replaced existing weaponry with military-style arms.

Knight, police chief in Chaska, Minn., says the upgrades have occurred since a national ban on certain assault weapons expired in September 2004. The ban, passed in 1994, in part prohibited domestic gunmakers from producing semi-automatic weapons and ammunition dispensers holding more than 10 rounds.

"This (weapons upgrade) is being done with an eye to the absolute knowledge that more higher-caliber weapons are on the street since the expiration of the ban," Knight said. He said his own department of about 20 officers is in the midst of determining whether to upgrade its weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0133643

Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief of the Orange County Sheriff's Department in Florida, says the department has been rearming many of its deputies with assault weapons in the past two years.

Stucker says deputies are now "frequently" encountering assault weapons in local robberies and during simple traffic stops. Weapons seizures in Orlando have increased overall by 26% since 2004.

It was not immediately clear whether assault weapons were driving the increase in weapons seizures or were directly linked to the county's record number of homicides in 2006, Stucker says.

In Houston, where homicides were up as much as 25% in 2006 over the previous year, Police Chief Harold Hurtt says the AK-47 assault rifle has become "kind of a weapon of choice" for warring gangs, major drug distributors and immigrant smugglers in a city that has become a major transit point for criminals.

"The reality on the street is that many of these weapons are readily available," says Hurtt, whose department began upgrading its weaponry with assault-style arms about three years ago before he arrived from Phoenix.

Last year, because of the escalation of violence and firepower on the street, Hurtt says he ordered patrol officers to wear body armor. Wearing armor had long been a matter of personal choice for officers.

The chief also is considering a proposal from officers to put 12-gauge shotguns back inside their patrol cars so they can be more accessible.

He said shotguns were moved to the car trunks when the cabs became crowded with laptop computers and other equipment.

Paul Erhardt, a spokesman for major gun manufacturer Sigarms, says the 2001 terrorist attacks, the violence following Hurricane Katrina and other high-profile incidents involving weapons contributed more to law enforcement's interest in rearming officers than any concerns raised by the expiring assault weapons ban. Erhardt's company outfits about 40% of the statewide law enforcement agencies in the USA.

IMMIGRATION:

State Ruling Will Help Some Foreigners Convicted In Florida Fight Deportation (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, February 19, 2007

Owran Green thought he made a good deal when he agreed more than 13 years ago to plead no contest to assault and battery charges in Broward County in exchange for probation and no jail time.

It would be years before he realized his mistake. The Jamaican, now 35, learned from an immigration attorney that his plea renderered him deportable under a decade-old federal law that made expulsion of most convicted criminals mandatory.

But this past fall, the Florida Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling that could help Green and hundreds of other foreign nationals in the same predicament avoid expulsion if they can show they cut their plea deals without being legally warned about deportation.

The high court's ruling could provide convicted foreigners with another layer of defense against stepped-up efforts by Homeland Security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to rid the country of immigration violators, particularly those with criminal convictions.

The unanimous Green ruling, issued Oct. 26, has given renewed hope to numerous convicted foreigners now seeking withdrawal of plea deals -- including dozens in Miami-Dade Circuit Court.

Almost all of the pleas in question were struck in the 1990s, when judges didn't uniformly advise defendants they could be deported by pleading guilty or no contest to charges. Most of those defendants have served sentences and are now seeking to have convictions thrown out to inoculate themselves against possible deportation.

"It's had a considerable impact in all of our criminal divisions," said prosecutor Penny Brill, chief of the legal division at the Miami-Dade State Attorney's Office. ``It's now an easier standard for these defendants to meet."

In Green's case, he sought to withdraw his plea in September 2003, arguing that had he been warned about deportation he would have taken his chances at trial. A judge rejected his petition because no actual deportation proceedings had begun.

Green's appeals eventually reached the state's highest court. In the little-publicized opinion, the Supreme Court gave a boost to convicted foreigners seeking to withdraw pleas -- if they can show they were not properly advised by defense lawyers or presiding judges that their convictions could lead to deportation.

The Green ruling, reaffirmed Feb. 8 by the Florida Supreme Court in the Miami-Dade case of Mario Gaston, drastically changed the legal standard for convicted foreign nationals. They now only have to show they were unaware they were "subject" to deportation -- not actually facing a "threat" of expulsion. That was the previous state standard dating to 2000.

The state Supreme Court opinion imposes a two-year deadline to seek such withdrawals. The only exception: if convicted foreign nationals can prove they were unable to ascertain the likelihood of deportation during the two-year period.

"In the short run, it will be of substantial assistance because it lowers the standard of what you need to reopen your criminal case," said Miami attorney Ira Kurzban, an expert in immigration law. But Kurzban criticized the two-year deadline as too restrictive.

Green and his Fort Lauderdale attorney, Michael Cohen, declined comment.

But Jerrard Cutrone, Gaston's Miami attorney, said the Green ruling will benefit many defendants like his client.

"It gives them a chance to revisit their pleas," said Cutrone.

Gaston, a Haitian, pleaded guilty to a charge of carrying a concealed firearm in 1994 and got three months' probation. In August 2004, he asked to withdraw his plea because he was not warned about deportation. The court granted his motion, but the state appealed. The Florida Supreme Court on Feb. 8, citing the Green opinion, ruled in Gaston's favor.

The Green ruling came more than a decade after Congress in 1996 passed laws aimed at deporting all foreign nationals convicted of "aggravated felony" crimes such as drug trafficking. Then in 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court gave some protection to certain foreign nationals who pleaded guilty prior to enactment of the 1996 laws and were not advised that pleading could lead to deportation.

According to congressional and Justice Department figures, more than 238,000 foreign nationals are incarcerated in federal, state and local jails nationwide or about 11 percent of the 2.2 million inmate population in all facilities.

Vacating a plea is a significant step under immigration law.

Convicted foreign nationals can stop their deportation if they meet at least three requirements: They had legal status such as a green card for several years before being convicted; their guilty pleas were vacated; and they face no further charges.

Not all foreigners convicted of aggravated felonies are automatically placed in deportation proceedings.

After they've served their sentences, most wind up in proceedings when they draw the attention of immigration authorities either upon arrival from a trip abroad or while seeking an immigration document such as a work permit, green card or citizenship.

This may change.

A senior immigration official told The Miami Herald last month that Homeland Security is seeking arrangements with Florida correctional authorities to identify all deportable foreign-born convicts while in jail or under probation. That way, Homeland Security can place the foreign inmates in deportation proceedings when they begin their sentences so they can be booted out of the country when they finish their time.

The arrangement would reduce the amount of detention space now needed to hold these convicts in deportation proceedings and cut back on the amount of time immigration agents spend tracking deportable convicts released from jail or in hiding.

The official asked not to be identified because he had no formal authorization to discuss the information publicly.

A program to identify and place in deportation proceedings foreign-born convicts in jail or under probation has been a goal of the immigration service since the late 1990s. But it requires far more money and personnel.

More than 89,000 foreign nationals with convictions were deported in fiscal year 2005, according to the Yearbook of Immigration Statistics.

Border Crackdown Spawns Violence (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0133645

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

More Deaths Occurring as Smugglers Fight Over Valuable Human Cargo

SILVERBELL, Ariz. -- Among the statuesque saguaro cactuses in the desert south of this old mining town lies the remnant of a crime scene that federal authorities say signals a troubling and escalated level of violence associated with the human smuggling trade.

Sometime in the pitch-black early morning hours of Feb. 8, a pickup packed with illegal immigrants from Central America, on their way to a presumed stash house in Phoenix, was attacked by two men shooting high-powered assault weapons. The four witnesses found tell conflicting stories about the time, place and other details about the shooting. The abandoned vehicle and two bodies were found near Silverbell, 70 miles north of the Arizona-Mexico border; another body and two survivors were found on the side of a dirt road eight miles north of the mining town.

Three immigrants -- a woman and two men -- were killed, and another woman was seriously wounded by three rounds from an AK-47. An alleged smuggler, whose hand was shattered by gunfire during the attack, is under arrest. The truck driver and another two dozen immigrants remain missing. Inside the yellow police tape strung across prickly pear and ocotillo cactuses lay staples the immigrants carried on their trek across the desert: a package of bologna and a plastic water jug. Personal effects taken from the dead, including blood-smeared pictures of children left behind in Guatemala and El Salvador, are now sealed away as evidence in the Pima County Sheriff's Department.

It is not clear whether this attack was the work of rival smugglers, extremist vigilantes or what are known in Spanish slang here as bajadores-- crews of bandits who steal human cargo throughout southern Arizona and from Phoenix stash houses to extort ransom from their families in Latin America or the United States. What is unusual, said Alonzo PeÃ±a, the new U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent in charge of Arizona, is the recent frequency of the violence, the fact these incidents resulted in deaths and that they occurred in the desert, where the crime scenes are hard to find within the thousands of acres of sand and brush.

"There's more and more sophisticated, high-powered assault-type weapons being used . . . and there are back-to-back incidents," PeÃ±a said.

Smuggling violence has increased in Arizona during the past six months, the byproduct of a clampdown by federal immigration authorities, PeÃ±a said. The U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona remains the busiest illegal entry point in the country, but the increased concentration of Border Patrol agents and National Guard troops stationed there during the past year has made it harder to cross.

In the past 18 months, enforcement operations have been stepped up in Arizona, with strong backing from Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who declared a state of emergency in Arizona's border counties in 2005 because of illegal immigration.

Those efforts appear to be working. Border Patrol statistics show that arrests of illegal immigrants in the Tucson sector, which includes 135 miles of border, dropped 11 percent overall last year and are down 9 percent since October, compared with the same period the year before. Deaths from heatstroke and dehydration in the Arizona desert just north of the border, which averaged 160 annually between 2000 and 2005, also dropped slightly last year, said Pima County Medical Examiner Bruce Parks.

The result, PeÃ±a said, is that a cargo of illegal immigrants that makes it across the border is worth more now. "This is raising the cost to do business for the smugglers," PeÃ±a said about the stricter border enforcement. "The commodity is more valuable, so [rival] smugglers are trying to get hold of it."

A few days after the assault near Silverbell, two men were found dead in the desert west of Phoenix, which local authorities believe was connected to illegal smuggling. In late January, a truckload of illegal immigrants was ambushed in the desert near Eloy by several armed men wearing camouflage clothing and berets, surviving immigrants said. The driver was killed and one immigrant was wounded.

Just last week Pima County authorities found another body in the desert. Officials estimated it had been dead for two weeks and said they believed it was also connected to human smuggling.

"Unfortunately, this is a common occurrence," said Pima County Sheriff Clarence Dupnik, whose detectives are charged with solving the homicide near Silverbell. "This is not an aberration. And to be honest, the chances of solving this is not good."

DOJ_NMG_0133646

With illegal immigrants facing increased risk of capture at or near the border, smuggling organizations are waiting for them to get well north of the border before hijacking them, usually at gunpoint. For some years, such incidents have been seen in and around Phoenix, where the bajadores break into immigrant stash houses to take over what is known as the "collections process." While immigrants wait for relatives and friends to send the agreed-upon smuggling fees so they can move on to their final destinations farther north or west, the bajadores take the group hostage and begin extorting exorbitant ransom fees.

One such violent crew, known as the Franco organization, with roots in Sinaloa, Mexico, made its mark four years ago in Phoenix by taking hostage more than 50 illegal immigrants in a stash house and viciously beating them, burning them with cigarettes and putting plastic bags over their heads while holding them at gunpoint.

A month ago, one Franco bandit was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Phoenix to life in prison plus seven years on a conviction of conspiracy, hostage-taking, harboring illegal aliens, and possessing and using a firearm to commit violence. Another participant in the hostage-taking had been sentenced previously, and three other defendants are set for sentencing next month.

Between April 2005 and July 2006, 65 similar cases involving Phoenix stash houses were discovered by federal agents, PeÃ±a said. Still, the recent desert shootings, resulting in fatalities, stand out.

"Sadly, violence has become the norm," said Angel RascÃ³n, a special agent in the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Phoenix office. But when they "end up happening in such frequency and in death, that's alarming."

U.S. 'Rewarded' Alien For His Testimony (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

An illegal alien got a "get out of jail free card" plus U.S. legal documents and monetary compensation from federal prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against a U.S. Border Patrol agent accused of using excessive force during an arrest.

Former agent David Sipe, who was convicted and fired, recently won an acquittal at a court-ordered retrial.

A federal appeals court in Texas ordered the new trial, saying prosecutors gave the illegal alien and two others additional inducements not disclosed at the time for their testimony, including Social Security cards, witness fees, permits allowing travel to and from Mexico, living expenses and free use of government phones.

"The government stated in writing the aliens were allowed to remain and work in the United States pending trial and specified that 'no other promises or advantages' had been given," the court said. "That was not true."

Mr. Sipe, 35, of Bethany, Okla., was convicted in 2001 after a five-day jury trial in McAllen, Texas, before U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa. U.S. Attorney Mervyn Mosbacker Jr.'s office charged the agent with using excessive force and causing bodily injury in the 2000 arrest of a Mexican national, Jose Guevara.

Mr. Sipe's attorney, Jack Lamar Wolfe, sought a new trial, accusing prosecutors of "misrepresentations and nondisclosures." After a hearing, Judge Hinojosa ordered a new trial, a ruling upheld by a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in Austin, Texas.

The appeals court agreed that prosecutors suppressed evidence that would have been favorable to Mr. Sipe's defense. The new trial was moved to Brownsville, Texas, before U.S. District Judge Andrew Hanen, and an acquittal was handed down Jan. 26.

The court said that in its pre-sentence report, prosecutors disclosed information to a probation officer they had not given to the defense, including evidence that the illegal aliens had received numerous benefits in exchange for their testimony.

"They were essentially given all, and more, of the benefits they were arrested for trying to obtain illegally benefits so valuable that they took great risks to obtain them by crossing the border illegally," the court said.

Mr. Sipe, through his attorney, is seeking to be reinstated. Mr. Wolfe said his client was fired because of the conviction "and for no other reason, so with that conviction now gone, he ought to be able to get his job back."

In its ruling, the court also said the government failed to disclose that after Mr. Sipe's arrest and before the trial, Mr. Guevara was caught by Border Patrol agents in the company of illegal aliens, and the arresting agents released him when he displayed a card given to him by prosecutors.

"Since Guevara had been granted free passage in his deal with the government, his arrest with illegal aliens was evidence that he was a transporter, as well as evidence of the extent of the government's support accorded him in order to obtain his testimony," the court said. "As the defense termed it, Guevara was given a 'get out of jail card.' "

The court said that although there was evidence of Mr. Sipe's guilt, the prosecution's withholdings prevented him from exposing "significant weaknesses in the government's case at every turn."

Mr. Sipe was indicted in November 2000 for using excessive force. Before the trial began, he filed motions seeking, among other things, what benefits the government had given the aliens. The government responded by saying three aliens who would be called to testify Mr. Guevara, Nehemias Diaz and Evarado Sanchez and were allowed to remain in the United States to work pending trial, but that "no other promises or advantages" had been given.

The court said the government also failed to disclose that the other two illegal aliens called to testify in exchange for immunity had been living with Mr. Guevara during the months before trial.

In 2000, Mr. Sipe was on the border near Penitas, Texas, responding to a sensor alarm when he spotted 12 to 15 illegal aliens. After ordering the group to halt, records show, Mr. Guevara, Mr. Diaz and Mr. Sanchez fled into an area of heavy reeds. Mr. Sipe said he was defending himself when he struck Mr. Guevara with a flashlight.

Mr. Guevara required five stitches in his head and later won an $80,000 settlement from the government.

Asylum from the asylum process

TWO YEARS AGO, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom released a report detailing the upsetting inconsistency with which immigration agents and judges treat foreigners seeking asylum in the United States. The study's conclusion: Asylum seekers are often not given a fair chance to argue their cases, putting legitimate claimants -- especially those who can't contact a lawyer -- at risk of being sent back to their countries of origin, where they face retribution from their governments. This month, the commission issued a follow-up that included a report card on the government's progress since the original study. Both the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department earned a fair number of D's and F's from the bipartisan group.

In the 2005 report, the commission found that statements taken by immigration officers early in the process were often incomplete and that claimants were often not given the chance to correct them. Yet immigration judges heavily relied on the statements to make their determinations. Access to legal counsel was also found to be inconsistent, a major problem when, according to the commission, asylum seekers with lawyers are about 11 times as likely to have their applications approved.

The commission has not conducted an exhaustive study examining the scale of these problems since its 2005 report. Rather, the panel used the government's sins of omission as evidence that the situation has not improved over the past two years. It noted that the Department of Homeland Security in particular has released little information on the progress, if any, it has made on implementing many of the recommendations in the 2005 report.

Leaving aside some of the more controversial recommendations the commission offered in its previous report -- such as giving front-line officers the power to grant asylum at an early stage -- there is no good reason that, after two years, Homeland Security has not been able to adopt much of the commission's advice. This includes expanding video monitoring systems at border stations, improving training and instruction of federal immigration agents, and ensuring consistent access to pro bono legal services. If the government has made progress, it should get credit. If it hasn't, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, and Americans in general, should know.

Immigrants: The Unsung Heroes Of The U.S. Economy (USNEWS)

By Renuka Rayasam

U.S. News and World Report, February 18, 2007

While illegal immigration attracts the spotlight, another facet of the issue is just coming into view: Immigrant entrepreneurs are helping fuel the U.S. economy. Recent studies show not only that immigrants are starting businesses at a faster rate than native-born Americans but that many of those businesses are refreshing neglected inner-city neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0133648

That's what Alfredo Rodriguez wants to do in a small corner of Newark, N.J. The native of the Dominican Republic moved to New York when he was 5 years old and has worked in the grocery business since he was 12. In 2002, he bought a 53,000-square-foot supermarket and transformed it to meet the tastes of Hispanic shoppers. Now about 90 percent of his customers are Latin American immigrants. Every week 5,000 customers visit his store for staples like frozen plantains, boosting his annual sales to $9 million.

"Hispanic immigrants spend more than traditional customers," says Rodriguez, a U.S. citizen. Not only are they willing to pay more for items that remind them of home, but many also like to cook generous portions in case an unexpected visitor drops by, he says. He wants to expand his Xtra Supermarket and make the surrounding strip into a center that caters to immigrants.

It's the kind of pattern that's enlivening immigrant pockets in cities like New York and Los Angeles, according to the Center for an Urban Future. In 2005, first-generation immigrants started 22 of L.A.'s 100 fastest-growing companies, the center says. From 1994 through 2004, while the number of new companies grew 9.6 percent in New York overall, in the Flushing neighborhood of Queens, an immigrant magnet, they grew 54.6 percent.

Billions. Like Rodriguez, many of the new entrepreneurs are starting companies that cater to local communities, whether by selling India's Bollywood movies or East Asia's bubble tea. "They are the first ones to be able to respond to the consumer face of the immigrant community," says Michael Barrera, head of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. Barrera estimates that by 2010 the number of Hispanic-owned businesses will grow to 3.2 million from 2 million today and will generate $465 billion in goods and services.

About 85,000 immigrants started new companies in 2005, according to the Kauffman Foundation. That newcomers start businesses at a higher rate than native-born Americans "comes as no surprise," says Robert Litan, Kauffman's vice president of research and policy. "Immigrants have a higher propensity to be self-employed, because often it is the only way to crack the economic system."

Even highly educated immigrants may lack the language skills or cultural knowledge necessary to break into corporate America, says Susan Au Allen, president of the U.S. Pan Asian American Chamber of Commerce. They often prefer to be their own boss, she says. About a quarter of the engineering and technology companies started from 1995 through 2005 had at least one immigrant founder, according to a Duke University and University of California-Berkeley study.

To get started, immigrants typically tap into family networks with established local roots, says Litan. It's how Rodriguez got his start in the grocery business. In 1985, he bought his first grocery in Queens with the $25 a week his mother had been setting aside for him for a decade. After he sold that store, he began working at his father-in-law's stores before branching out on his own again. "It's just natural," Rodriguez says, that he followed in other immigrants' footsteps.

TAX:

Ebay Fights Plan To Shop Users To IRS (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Ebay is fiercely resisting a Bush administration plan it says will force it to snitch on customers who are not paying tax on billions earned on the popular online auction site.

The Treasury estimates it could collect $2bn in unpaid tax if companies such as eBay reported American users who carry out more than 100 transactions worth at least $5,000 a year to the Internal Revenue Service.

But an eBay spokesperson said: “We do not believe it is our responsibility to serve as the go-between. We believe that it is the seller’s responsibility.” The company pointed out that many users file self-employment and business tax returns based on their eBay income.

Ebay said it would co-operate with IRS investigations into specific persons but would not voluntarily report its customers’ sales “en masse”.

The US measure, planned to come into effect on January 1, 2008, would only affect American users of eBay, but separately this week UK Revenue and Customs warned taxpayers to report income from eBay activity or face penalties.

DOJ_NMG_0133649

Ebay says the measure is especially unfair because it does not apply to rivals such as Craigslist, the online classified advertisement site, whose business models do not have the auction or payment tools of eBay.

Ebay has more than 200m registered users of its auction services and estimates 4.3m rely on its website for a significant portion of their income.

The company, which has a market valuation of $47bn, has mobilised its extensive lobbying network in Washington to resist the Treasury by challenging its authority and questioning the legality of the government proposals.

Pamela Olson, a tax partner at Skadden, said: "The proposal is aimed at companies like eBay facilitating the sale of personal property for their customers."

Representative Rick Boucher, a member of the internet caucus in Congress, said he had been in touch with eBay and would rally opposition on Capitol Hill.

Barbara Weltman, an expert on eBay sellers, said the company did little to encourage tax compliance by customers, but already collated the data the IRS was seeking.

"It is a burden but it is doable," she said.

The company is marshalling legal arguments that it does not meet the government's definition of a "broker" and that the millions of auctions that take place on its websites are not actually auctions.

"We do offer sellers auction-like transactions but they are not auctions," said a spokesperson, citing technical definitions in state law that an auction has no fixed end-time.

The fate of the Treasury plan is likely to depend on the success of eBay's lobbying and wider talks between the administration and Congress about President George W Bush's budget proposals.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate GOP Ready To Fight For Agenda (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

Senate Republicans have pledged to fight for up-or-down votes on President Bush's judicial nominees and to make his tax cuts permanent, but they face an uphill battle in pushing their agenda.

Republican leaders have outlined seven issues they plan to highlight in the shadow of the Democratic majority, which has its own priorities and the power to bring them to the floor.

"Obviously, in the minority we don't get to set the agenda, but we expect to be offering our ideas" in the form of amendments to other proposals, said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl of Arizona said his party unanimously agreed on a set of guiding principles and revealed them in advance of forthcoming legislative specifics.

Mr. Kyl called the seven principles a "good starting point" Thursday as lawmakers prepared for a weeklong recess. In addition to judges and tax cuts, the broad principles promise a commitment to "fiscal restraint" and to fight the war on terrorism, among other things.

"We are committed not only to effectively communicating our vision for the nation but also demonstrating through debate and legislative action that Republican ideas are better for America," Mr. Kyl said.

Democrats weren't sure what to make of the Republican plan.

"There's very little to quibble with because much of it comes straight out of the Democratic agenda," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

As for judicial nominees, Mr. Reid has promised to quickly hold votes on "consensus" candidates.

"But if the president sends us divisive, right-wing ideologues, he can expect to face trouble in the Senate," Mr. Manley said.

Democrats have blocked many of Mr. Bush's nominees using a filibuster.

Among the other examples of legislation Mr. Kyl said may result from the Republican principles:

•Attempting to make the Bush tax cuts permanent;

•Supporting Mr. Bush's plan to increase the size of the military;

•Pushing earmark reform;

•Expanding domestic oil production and alternative energy research.

Another of the seven issues is related to health care. Republicans say they will propose creation of small-business health-insurance plans, expansion of health savings accounts and support for the health care tax plan Mr. Bush promoted in his State of the Union address last month, with the idea "all Americans can receive quality health care."

"It's not enough just to play defense. You need to have a positive agenda that you believe in and that you're going to fight for," said Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican.

One of the thornier issues at the bottom of the Republican agenda is immigration reform.

Last year, 23 Senate Republicans faced wrath from conservatives for joining Democrats to pass a "comprehensive" immigration plan that opponents said rewards illegal aliens.

Mr. Kyl said members learned from the November elections, and he thinks both parties are "committed" to dealing with an immigration plan.

"We are all reformulating our views on how to proceed with this," he said, noting broad Republican support for securing the border and making sure workplaces follow immigration law.

Mr. Manley said when the Senate returns from recess it will likely consider implementing the remainder of the September 11 commission recommendations, passing changes to the prescription-drug program and funding for embryonic stem-cell research. All three measures have already passed the House.

Information, Please (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Deep inside the Library of Congress, 500 researchers pound out the secret intelligence Congress uses to make law.

Legislators request 6,000 Congressional Research Service reports a year, on weapons systems and farm subsidies, prescription prices and energy use. Together, they offer what lobbyists and industry want most: clues to what's next on the Hill.

For years, open-government groups have fought to make the reports public, and for years, many lawmakers have kept them under wraps. Or so they thought.

By insisting on secrecy, Congress instead created a bootleg market for the research. Every day, a small Texas company compiles the reports and sells them to lobbyists, lawyers and others who pay thousands of dollars for a peek at the reports and what they say about the congressional agenda. And it's all legal.

"How I get them is my trade secret . . . but I get them all," said Walt Seager, who digs up the reports for Gallery Watch, a legislative tracking service.

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) was established in 1914 as Congress's supplier of nonpartisan research and analysis. Its reports are neither classified nor copyrighted, but they've long been the exclusive property of lawmakers, who distribute them as they see fit. Taxpayers supply the agency's $100 million annual budget, inspiring open-government groups and some lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) to push for public release of CRS reports.

"The Library of Congress is a national treasure. The public deserves ready access to the reports it prepares for Congress, and easy online retrieval is the obvious answer," Leahy said. "We need to keep moving toward that goal."

But each time the topic comes up, it runs into a wall erected by lawmakers such as Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who "like many members of Congress, views CRS as an extension of his staff," said Aaron Saunders, Stevens's spokesman. If the reports were made public, "every time a member requests a particular document, the public may infer that he's staking out a particular policy position."

CRS's director, Daniel P. Mulhollan, has left it to Congress to decide. "Once a report is produced for the Congress, it becomes the property of the Congress," he said in a statement. "CRS itself has no public role and is prohibited by law from publishing its work."

It's up to members and committees, Mulhollan said, to release the reports "directly, by inclusion in congressional publications or through their own Web sites."

Open-government groups have a problem with that: "CRS is Congress's brain, and it's useful for the public to be plugged into it," says Steven Aftergood, an open-government advocate who runs the Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog.

Aftergood and others have fought back by posting every CRS report they can find on their Web sites. But watchdog groups have released only about 10 percent of the total, not enough to reveal the patterns that suggest what Congress might do next.

Subscribers to Gallery Watch pay about $4,000 a year to get all the CRS reports, online and searchable, delivered weekly.

Gallery Watch sells other legislative tracking tools, but the reports are the key reason clients subscribe, said Patrick Riendeau, a sales executive. Besides lobbyists, lawyers, and corporations, universities and news organizations subscribe.

At a recent meeting for potential customers, Riendeau explained that clients scan the reports for intelligence "kind of how the CIA operates," by spotting the political trends suggested by their contents and timing, he said. About a year ago, lawmakers made a flurry of requests for CRS reports related to North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. currency; not until months later, when the Treasury Department cracked down on North Korea, did the issue appear in newspapers.

Gallery Watch, owned by the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, gets the publications from Seager, 68, a former trade magazine journalist based in Damascus, who for 20 years has mined the Hill for them.

"I'm just an old Washington journalist who knows how to find things," Seager said. He got started, he said, two decades ago when he found a CRS catalogue of new reports in a congressman's office. He made copies of it and sold subscriptions, with instructions on how to get the reports by contacting lawmakers. When CRS stopped publishing the listing, Seager started finding the reports himself.

"I upload an average of about 100 a week" to Gallery Watch, he said.

If the reports were ever made available to all, "I would comfortably retire to my mountain retreat in West Virginia and be very happy, because that's the way it should be -- taxpayers pay for them," he said.

But he doesn't think that will happen. For one thing, he said, "incumbents like to provide them to their constituents [saying] 'glad to be of service, hint, hint, remember me at election time.' "

Second, he said, CRS is "a think tank working for [members] exclusively and not for the people running against them. They've got all this brainpower behind them making them look very knowledgeable."

"The less I know, the better," said Gallery Watch Senior Vice President Arnie Thomas about Seager's methods.

While he would not provide a list of clients, citing privacy concerns, the company's Web site client list includes lobbying and law firms, Mitsubishi, the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Nation and the Department of Agriculture.

Deloitte & Touche lobbyists hailed Gallery Watch in an online testimonial: "With the collapse of Enron . . . almost daily there were numerous bills being introduced that required us to research and analyze the impact of the proposed legislation on the accounting profession," one said. "We need a tool to tell us when something is going on."

Hospital Investigates Former Aid Chief (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

For the past three years, Michael J. Wagner directed the Army's largest effort to help the most vulnerable soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. His office in Room 3E01 of the world-renowned hospital was supposed to match big-hearted donors with thousands of wounded soldiers who could not afford to feed their children, pay mortgages, buy plane tickets or put up visiting families in nearby hotels.

But while he was being paid to provide this vital service to patients, outpatients and their relations, Wagner was also seeking funders and soliciting donations for his own new charity, based in Texas, according to documents and interviews with current and former staff members. Some families also said Wagner treated them callously and made it hard for them to receive assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0133652

Last week, Walter Reed launched a criminal investigation of Wagner after The Washington Post sought a response to his activities while he ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, a position he left several weeks ago. Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the commander at Walter Reed, said the probe by the Criminal Investigation Command (CID) "reflects the seriousness with which we take these allegations."

Weightman's legal adviser, Col. Samuel Smith, said that "it would clearly be a conflict of interest" prohibited by federal law, Army regulations and Defense Department ethics rules if Wagner used his position to solicit funds for his own organization.

The saga of the Medical Family Assistance Center is just one example of the problems at Walter Reed, where nearly 700 soldiers and Marines from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan live as outpatients while recuperating. Some families are happy with the help they received from Wagner and his office, and many soldiers and their families applauded the dedication of workers there. Others said that they had problems with Wagner and that the center seemed chaotic and disorganized.

"We had many family members who came to me because they couldn't get a respectful and compassionate response from Dr. Wagner," said Peggy Baker, director of a charity that helps wounded soldiers, Operation First Response.

Wagner, who has a doctorate in education, resigned his position last month to work full time on his Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation, based in Dallas. The foundation includes the Phoenix Project, which runs marriage retreats for soldiers returning from combat. According to its Web site, the foundation is supported by several corporations, other foundations and individuals.

In a phone interview, Wagner denied he had solicited funds or made contact with donors during office hours. "It's just not true," he said. "I intentionally stayed out of that. I couldn't do that. I couldn't do both." He said he is not paid by the foundation. The documents that would verify that have not yet been filed with the Internal Revenue Service.

Wagner said his superiors "knew of my involvement right from the beginning." Weightman said the command had been unaware of Wagner's Texas charity until recently.

Wagner defended his work at the center. "My only purpose and my priority 12 to 19 hours a day was to assist the families of the wounded," he said. "I saw 6,000 people coming back from Iraq and Afghanistan. I did my best, but I'm not God. What I did there was a job that was superhuman."

Wagner said that the charity was founded by his brother and that he did not officially become its executive director until he left Walter Reed. But fundraising documents from early January, before he resigned, list him as the director, and the organization's Web site called him its executive director months before he resigned.

In a fundraising letter he signed shortly before he quit the Medical Family Assistance Center, Wagner referred to his work at Walter Reed. As head of the center, he wrote, "I have had over a thousand citizens in this great country asking what they might be able to do at Walter Reed for our wounded troops and their families. I found myself telling them that Walter Reed was blessed with the outpouring of the goodness and generosity of the American public and that if they were really interested in assisting, they should look within their own communities."

But, his letter continued, "I realized they were not working with their local communities so . . . I decided to found the Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation to do just this, to do what I am able to help our soldiers reenter their home and local community."

Wagner included an ambitious business plan to take the charity from a $237,000 pilot project in the first year, which ended in August 2006 -- while he was working at Walter Reed -- to a $145 million foundation by 2011. He signed the letter "Executive Director and Founder."

Leita Sosin, an 11-year Army veteran who worked in Wagner's office for two years, said she complained to him and to co-workers about his involvement with the charity. "It really broke me to see what he was doing," said Sosin, 29, a former Army operating-room technician. "Instead of working with the families at Walter Reed and with us, he spent all his time putting together the Phoenix Project."

Moscow Spencer, a case manager fired by Wagner in October, also complained to her co-workers. "All day long he'd work on his program," she said. "If someone came in to donate money, he would talk to them about his project."

Sosin said the office was overwhelmed by the number of families who needed assistance and who were confused by the complex bureaucracy. "Everyone needed help, but you couldn't get them the help as fast as they needed it," she said. "Someone like me could scream all day about how it was broken, but no one wanted to take the time to fix it."

She also said Wagner was arrogant toward some staff members and families. "People got hurt in the process, whether it be financially or because he promised a lot of things he never followed up on," she said.

In April, Sosin said, she laid out her concerns in a three-page letter to her superiors. She received no response and resigned. Wagner said that Sosin never complained to him and that he had no idea why she quit.

Poverty among soldiers returning from war is not uncommon. While they continue to live on the Army payroll until they return to active duty or are discharged, some experience a substantial decrease in pay when combat pay or hazard pay disappears.

Some Army families breach the poverty line when a spouse quits a job to help the soldier recuperate; the mortgage bill doesn't stop, and they still need to feed their children. Many turn to the generosity of a public eager to prove they have not forgotten the troops' sacrifices. While staff members and soldiers acknowledge that some families take advantage of the plentiful freebies at Walter Reed, many others ask for help only as a last resort.

The assistance center is supposed to be the connection between a soldier's family and private donors. Until recently, it did not accept cash contributions but instead matched families' needs -- for bus or plane tickets, clothing, emergency food vouchers, grants for mortgages or living expenses -- with organizations set up to help.

According to Walter Reed, an average of 14 families a day seek assistance from the center. While it is difficult to quantify the value of donations, the center received $4,500 worth of phone cards in 2006 and handled $1.9 million worth of donated plane tickets. Weightman said the center's staff was recently increased from five to nine employees, with two people assigned to keeping track of the donations, and training has been improved.

The system for receiving donations is often confusing, even for the staff, Weightman said. "There's too much for any one person to know, but depending on the question, they may know [the answer] or direct you to the person who does know it."

Some soldiers go directly to the many volunteer organizations set up to help the wounded. Last year, Wagner began an effort to funnel all requests and donations through the family assistance center. It was a good idea, said Sosin and others, but because Wagner seemed preoccupied, a bottleneck of requests resulted.

"It was really all at the expense of the service member," said Sandra Butterfield, who worked at Walter Reed as an ombudsman for a Defense Department-funded relief organization. "He decreed that everything had to go through him," and it didn't seem to matter if that slowed the process. Officials, she said, "don't understand what it meant to have no money. Family members changed the sheets, empty the bedpan. But they are leaving their homes across the country. . . . Every day I came home angry."

Some families were also angered by the way Wagner treated them.

"The patient care was absolutely wonderful, but the administration was horrible, especially Dr. Wagner," said Maria Mendez, whose 25-year-old nephew, Spec. Roberto Reyes Jr., suffered severe brain and limb damage when a mine exploded near him outside Baghdad. "It was like running around in circles. He was never around."

"They were unprofessional, discourteous and uncompassionate all in one," Mendez said. "I was very surprised. You figure any family who's gone through such devastation, then faces this, to be treated with such unprofessionalism . . . it's like you're putting salt on the wounds."

Frustrated, Mendez set up an account for her sister, Aida Rivera, Reyes's mother, to pay for her stay at Walter Reed. Rivera eventually got financial assistance from the Army and outside organizations, but she also received a $3,519 bill from Mologne House, a hotel at Walter Reed, for her stay as her son's nonmedical attendant.

Staff members from other offices also complained to the command about Wagner, according to memos obtained by The Post. In one, an employee, who asked not to be named, questioned why a soldier's mother "who had subsisted on dried soups . . . due to her lack of funds" could not get help. Four months after approaching the center, the memo said, the mother had not received the per diem owed her as her child's nonmedical attendant "and has no cash for essentials nor emergencies."

DOJ_NMG_0133654

A wife who accompanied her wounded husband, who was based in Germany, said Wagner asked her repeatedly why she did not return to Germany so she could continue working. The woman "reported she felt harassed and bullied but that she held her ground," the employee's memo states.

Wagner said families were often angry at his office, not because it failed them but because they were distraught over their situation. "Their true need is an emotional one. They're going to be angry at somebody. . . . I did my best; no, more than my best."

Army Fixing Patients' Housing (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Walter Reed Army Medical Center began repairs yesterday on Building 18, a former hotel that is used to house outpatients recuperating from injuries suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan and that has been plagued with mold, leaky plumbing and a broken elevator.

The facility's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, said Army staff members inspected each of the 54 rooms at the building and discovered that outstanding repair orders for half the rooms had not been completed. He said that mold removal had begun on several rooms and that holes in ceilings, stained carpets and leaking faucets were being fixed.

Walter Reed, the Army's premier medical facility, has turned into a holding ground for wounded soldiers during 5 1/2 years of sustained combat. Almost 700 outpatients suffering from physical injuries and psychological problems live on the 113-acre military post or in nearby quarters. Many linger there for 18 months or longer as they move through the Army's numbing bureaucracy.

A Washington Post series over the weekend described "The Other Walter Reed," where overdoses, suicide attempts and depression among outpatients are the parallel narrative to the spit-polish hallways of the renowned hospital.

Building 18, in particular, symbolizes the indifference and neglect that many of the wounded say they experience at Walter Reed.

Yesterday, Weightman said a broken elevator in the building had been repaired and soldiers were working to improve the outside of the building, including removing ice and snow. The slippery conditions have kept some soldiers in their rooms. A garage door that has been broken for months will soon be repaired as well.

Spec. Jeremy Duncan, whose room has a moldy wall that was featured in one photograph in the Post series, has been moved to another room while workers make repairs. Duncan will be able to return to his room when the work is completed, Weightman said.

Walter Reed and Army officials have been "meeting continuously for three days" since the articles began appearing, Weightman said. A large roundtable meeting with Army and Defense Department officials will take place at the Pentagon early this morning to continue talks about improvements in the outpatient system, he added.

Weightman said the medical center has received an outpouring of concern about conditions and procedures since the articles appeared and has taken steps to improve what soldiers and their families describe as a messy battlefield of bureaucratic problems and mistreatment.

"We're starting to attack how we'll fix and mitigate" some of the problems, he said.

Social workers will now be stationed around the clock at Mologne House, the 200-room hotel on the post where many of the outpatients live. Plans are being developed to better train other staff members who deal with outpatient needs.

The Army will also consider moving some outpatients to its other medical centers throughout the United States and will determine over the next weeks whether more workers are needed at Walter Reed.

Fast-Changing CIA Puts New Emphasis On Recruiting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

At CIA headquarters, iPods are banned. So are cellphones.

"No personal media things," said Karen Mullet, the agency's chief of employee support.

DOJ_NMG_0133655

Workplace restrictions like these are among the smaller sacrifices that CIA employees make on behalf of the nation's security. But a wave of new hires at the agency are very, very tech savvy and, it seems, not shy about their interests.

"They are pushing us to change in ways that, from a security perspective, we might not be ready to change," said Cindy Bower, the CIA's chief of human resources. "They want to use BlackBerrys, and they've got iPods they want to bring in and listen to music."

The new hires also are prodding the agency to improve its information technology systems. "They want it faster and better," said Michael J. Morell, associate deputy director and the No. 3 at the agency. "I think it is a very healthy thing."

Perhaps no federal agency is changing as rapidly as the CIA. The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, shook up an intelligence community that had been downsizing since the end of the Cold War. Since then, recruitment and hiring have become a CIA priority.

Forty percent of the workforce has arrived since Sept. 11, 2001. Of the new hires, 60 percent are under age 30, and 85 percent are under 40. One in six have military experience.

"We are bringing in today more people than we ever have before," Morell said. The agency set a record for new hires in fiscal 2006 and is likely to come close to doing so again this year and again in fiscal 2008.

Today's CIA looks like "what we call a double-humped camel," Morell said. Most employees have been employed less than five years or more than 15 years, "and not much in that five- to 15-year period," he said.

Despite criticism and controversy in the months after Sept. 11 from Congress and outside investigators, the CIA has proved to be one of the most attractive parts of government for people interested in public service.

Last year, the agency received 134,000 rÃ©sumÃ©s and is on pace to get 160,000 this year, Morell said. That's up from 39,000 to 63,000 a year before the terrorist attacks.

The CIA reviews every rÃ©sumÃ©, but cannot respond to every applicant. Morell and Mullet said the agency is working to change that.

The agency is increasing its ranks of analysts and operations officers (better known as spies), but also needs engineers and professionals in finance, logistics and medicine.

Getting hired, of course, is not easy. The agency looks for people with language skills who have lived abroad and who are at mid-career with experience in industry. About 60 percent of recruits have overseas experience, and about 40 percent have advanced degrees.

Although a quarter of job applicants say they have foreign-language capability, CIA tests find that only 12 percent are proficient.

The hiring process takes nine to 12 months -- from the time a rÃ©sumÃ© is submitted until a letter of acceptance is sent, setting a start date. Employment offers hinge on receiving security clearances, and about 25 percent do not get them, Mullet said.

The hiring surge is part of a "strategic intent" developed by CIA Director Michael V. Hayden that includes an "analysts forward initiative," aimed at getting more intelligence analysts into overseas positions so they gain regional expertise more quickly, and a "leadership development initiative" to make sure the CIA has people who can manage its changing workforce.

Hayden also has called for enhancing diversity at the CIA, eliminating time in grade as a factor in promotions to put more weight on job performance, and requiring rotational assignments across directorates before promotions.

Senior officials are making progress on reshaping the workforce, Morell said. They have identified jobs that require foreign-language skills, and about half have been filled by officers "with significant language capability," he said. That's an improvement over the past four years, and Hayden has formed a group "to figure out what we can do to make it even better," Morell said.

The CIA is especially interested in hiring people who speak Chinese, Arabic, Korean, Farsi, Dari, Pashtu, Urdu and other "mission-critical" languages.

Efforts to improve diversity are paying off and should make it easier for the CIA to operate around the world, Morell said.

In fiscal 2006, 23 percent of new hires were African Americans, Hispanics, Asian Americans and Native Americans. The CIA also is hiring Arab Americans, Persian Americans and South Asian Americans, Morell said.

DOJ_NMG_0133656

Half of the managers are minorities or women, a higher proportion than four years ago. Of Hayden's senior leadership team, 35 percent are minorities or women, Morell said. About 30 percent of station chiefs are minorities or women, up from 20 percent three years ago. "So the trends are in the right direction, but we need to do better," Morell said.

The hiring surge, he said, "puts a huge responsibility on this organization to hire the right people, to train them, to develop them." That, and "how well those folks do, will determine how well this agency does 10, 15, 20 years from now," Morell said. "So we are taking very seriously how we invest in them."

Even though employees must leave their iPods and cellphones in their cars while at work on the CIA campus near McLean, the agency has not had problems keeping younger workers.

"We have not yet seen the conventional wisdom of the last five years that Generation Xers and Gen Ys are going to job-hop," Morell said.

Power Shifts In Scalia's Favor On Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — It has been two decades in the making, but this is the year Justice Antonin Scalia, the Supreme Court's most outspoken dissenter, could emerge as a leader of a new conservative majority among the justices.

Between now and late June, the court is set to hand down decisions in four areas of law -- race, religion, abortion regulation and campaign finance -- where Scalia's views may now represent the majority.

In each of those areas, the retirement of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and her replacement with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. figure to tip the court to the right. That would give 70-year old Scalia the chance to take on a role that has largely eluded him: speaking for the court in major rulings.

Scalia is not known for seeing shades of gray in legal disputes; instead, he has favored clear rules and broad decisions.

A series of broad-brush rulings could put Scalia's stamp on some key social issues in the United States. A Scalia-led majority would be likely to outlaw the use of racial guidelines to achieve integration, allow a greater role for religion in public life, uphold stricter regulation of abortion and strike down campaign-funding laws on free-speech grounds.

It is a prospect dreaded by liberals but eagerly awaited by many on the right.

"I'm looking forward to the next 10 to 12 years," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard.

Although his majority opinions have been few, Scalia's influence has been considerable, especially among lawyers inspired by his championing of "originalism," or strict adherence to the original meaning of the words in the Constitution.

"Justice Scalia has had a bigger impact off the court than on it," said Michael Gerhardt, a law professor at the University of North Carolina. "In his speeches and his opinions, he is trying to reach a wider audience."

Scalia does not grant media interviews, but in recent years he has spoken regularly at colleges and law schools, and he rarely fails to make news with an off-the-cuff comment. When asked to explain his role in the Bush v. Gore decision that halted Florida's recount in the 2000 presidential race, his standard rejoinder is: "Get over it."

"I'm a textualist. I'm an originalist. I'm not a nut," he told students at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif., earlier this month.

His dissenting opinions have won him "a nearly cult-like following among many conservatives," said author Kevin A. Ring, whose book "Scalia Dissents" contains the justice's writings in a dozen areas of law.

Still, much more than memorable dissents were predicted when Scalia was unanimously confirmed to the high court in 1986. A former law professor, he was seen as smart, witty and charming. Many foresaw him leading a conservative counterrevolution.

But he has never quite lived up to the early promise.

His temperament may be to blame, says George Washington University law professor Jeffrey Rosen in a newly published book that accompanies a PBS series on the Supreme Court. Rosen wrote that Scalia's gruff and acerbic style and his know-it-all manner turned colleagues against him.

DOJ_NMG_0133657

His conservative admirers say the blame lies not with Scalia, but with Republican appointees, such as Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and O'Connor, who turned out not to be true conservatives.

"He is not a split-the-difference type of jurist, and he has needed one extra person on his side," Eastland said.

Even when in the majority, Scalia has written surprisingly few major opinions. William H. Rehnquist, who was chief justice from 1986 to 2005, rarely turned to Scalia, because doing so risked losing the crucial votes of moderates, in particular O'Connor and Kennedy. Often Scalia and his primary ally on the court, Justice Clarence Thomas, wanted to go further.

Last year, there were signs of change. The new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., turned to Scalia to write two key opinions.

One concerned whether drug evidence should be thrown out because police, although armed with a search warrant, rushed into a house. Scalia's opinion not only upheld the evidence but also cast doubt on the future of the "exclusionary rule," the doctrine that says judges should exclude illegally seized evidence.

When given a chance to write a decision on wetlands, Scalia's opinion cast aside 30 years of environmental law and largely limited the federal clean-water authority to "navigable" waterways.

In both cases, Kennedy added separate opinions that undercut Scalia's views.

In sessions that begin Tuesday, this term will give Scalia a chance to make a mark in several areas in which Kennedy usually sides with conservatives.

For example, Scalia has scorned the notion of a strict separation of church and state. Rather, he has said the First Amendment was intended only to bar the government from supporting an official national religion. In his first year on the court, he defended the teaching of creationism in public schools. He has voted regularly since then to allow the government to promote religion in general.

Feb. 28, the court will hear a challenge to the White House Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. A Wisconsin group called the Freedom from Religion Foundation sued, contending the program was an unconstitutional "propaganda vehicle for religion."

The justices will hear the Bush administration's claim that the lawsuit should be thrown out because taxpayers do not have the legal standing to challenge how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs. If the Supreme Court agrees, the ruling could make it much harder for critics to go to court to contest government programs that promote religion.

On other issues, Scalia has argued that campaign finance laws are unconstitutional because they infringe the free-speech rights of donors and candidates.

In late April, the court will hear a new challenge to the part of the McCain-Feingold law that forbids corporations and unions from buying broadcast ads that mention a candidate for federal office within 60 days before a general election or 30 days before a primary. The court could decide the issue narrowly, but a broad Scalia-like opinion could cast doubt on most laws that restrict the raising and spending of campaign money.

Scalia also has called for a strict ban on the use of race by government agencies, including schools and colleges. Without fail, he has voted against affirmative-action policies, but because of O'Connor, the court's majority has stopped short of outlawing affirmative action.

In December, the justices heard a challenge to the use of racial integration guidelines by school districts in Seattle and Louisville, Ky. A decision on that issue, due soon, gives the court's conservative bloc a chance to broadly reject race-based policies.

Also pending is a challenge to the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, a measure that would outlaw certain midterm abortion procedures. The case does not call into doubt the basic right to abortion set in Roe v. Wade, but a broad ruling in favor of the ban could trigger more stringent regulation of abortion in the United States.

Scalia has repeatedly called for overturning Roe v. Wade and leaving it to states to decide whether to permit or forbid abortion.

The heart of Scalia's message is that much of what the Supreme Court has done in recent decades amounts to an illegitimate power grab. The justices overstep their authority when they stretch the Constitution to resolve current controversies, he says. Issues such as abortion, gay rights and the death penalty should be decided by voters and elected lawmakers, not by judges, he argues.

DOJ_NMG_0133658

"I'm one who believes the Constitution should be interpreted exactly as it was adopted," he said in a recent speech. "It should be interpreted as it was written -- nothing more, not less."

Liberal law professors say originalism is more effective as a slogan than as a formula for shaping legal opinions. "It is a good for public relations, and it's good to put in speeches, but it doesn't work in deciding cases," Harvard University law professor Mark Tushnet said.

Scalia's critics also say he has not consistently followed his own theory.

For example, Scalia has regularly voted in favor of white males who challenged affirmative-action policies that benefit blacks, Hispanics or women. He has done so on the basis of the 14th Amendment, adopted after the Civil War, which says no state may deny any person "the equal protection of the laws." Originally, the amendment was intended to protect blacks from discrimination by Southern whites.

The Constitution puts no such "equal protection" restriction on Congress or the federal government. Yet, when white contractors sued in the 1990s to challenge federal policies that benefited minorities, Scalia voted to strike them down as unconstitutional, even though neither words nor the history of the Constitution prohibited such programs.

Scalia's use of originalism "tends to persuade those who already agree with him," said Duke University law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, but "it doesn't persuade those who disagree with him."

Grassley Seeks Democrats' Help On Taxes (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

In a role reversal, Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned that he may block a House-Senate conference on the minimum-wage bill unless he is assured his Democratic colleagues will join him in demanding inclusion of a sizable tax-cut package.

"The contours of the deal should be known if details can't be," a Grassley aide said of his insistence that Democrats agree to pursue a small-business tax package that is much larger than the $1.4 billion House-passed proposal.

When they were in the minority, Democrats threatened to block House-Senate conferences on a variety of bills, charging that the Republican majority would shut them out of the process and produce final legislation with no Democratic input.

Anticipating criticism from Democrats, the Grassley aide pointed out that Republicans agreed to "pre-conference" a large corporate tax package in the 109th Congress — assuring Senate Democrats, for example, that the measure would be revenue-neutral, among other things. Once they secured those promises, Democrats finally allowed the measure to be sent to conference with the House. Before that, Senate Democrats had blocked three votes to end debate on the motion to appoint conferees, the aide said.

This time, Grassley is hoping for a similar outcome for himself. The Senate-passed minimum-wage bill included a much more robust $8.3 billion small-business tax-cut package, but in a Democratic-controlled House-Senate legislative conference, Grassley is concerned that the Senate package could be whittled significantly or eliminated entirely, considering that House Democratic leaders originally balked at coupling their minimum-wage increase bill with small-business tax cuts.

Mindful that Grassley could lead a potential filibuster of one of the Democrats' top legislative priorities, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has not ruled out the idea of pre-conferencing the minimum-wage-hike bill, and he has been talking actively with Republicans on how to proceed to conference, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. Reid has said he does not believe a minimum-wage bill could receive Senate approval without a package of small-business tax breaks.

It remains unclear where Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) stands on the question of reaching a deal with Grassley on the scope of the bill before a formal House-Senate conference is convened. A Baucus spokeswoman would not speak directly to the notion of pre-conferencing the bill but said, "Chairman Baucus is going to work with all his colleagues — Senate and House — to craft final legislation that can move through the Senate and get a minimum wage increase."

House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) likely will react coolly to Grassley's gambit, given that Rangel generated the smaller House tax package only under pressure from House Democratic leaders after vigorously arguing that majorities in both chambers would support a "clean" minimum-wage increase.

Even after drafting his tax bill, Rangel accused Grassley of "hold[ing] the minimum wage bill hostage unless we passed $8 billion in tax cuts for business. ... If they would remove the threat of filibuster, it would pass both houses without the $8 billion tax cut." Rangel made the comments Feb. 15 on PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer."

A Rangel spokesman would say only, "He believes that [they] can figure it out in conference."

Senate Republicans are wary of the political and public relations pitfalls of appearing to block completion of a minimum-wage bill, if they back Grassley in any floor fight.

GOP Senators are still feeling the sting of being blamed for the impasse over that chamber's Iraq debate, several Republican sources said.

"For Republicans to hold together ... there also has to be some political pressure to counter what the press is writing," said one Senate tax aide. "The merits of what [Republicans] are fighting for just aren't getting reported."

The aide added, that "Republican Senators need a sense of how it's going to play out" if they vote to block conferees.

In addition, lobbyists for small businesses and restaurants need to "step up and keep the heat on Republicans and Democrats to pass tax cuts. ... They could be a very powerful grass-roots force," the aide said.

Given the gamesmanship over the bill, "Republicans need to sit down and figure out where their guys are on the House [tax] bill," said one source who closely follows the House and Senate tax-writing committees.

Because Republican intransigence on the minimum-wage issue was used successfully against many GOP incumbents in the 2006 elections, politically vulnerable Republicans may feel pressure to accept the smaller House tax package just to get the issue off the front pages, the source noted.

However, the source doubted enough GOP Senators would be susceptible to splitting with the party to reach the filibuster-breaking 60-vote threshold.

The Republican "leadership assumes that maybe five or six would be for the House bill, but not 10," the source said.

Fed Chief Warned On Inflation Target (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

It would be a "terrible mistake" for the Federal Reserve to adopt any form of inflation target to guide its interest rate decisions, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, has told the Financial Times.

Mr Frank, whose committee is one of two in Congress charged with oversight of the US central bank, said such a target "would come at the expense of equal consideration of the other main goal, that is employment".

His comments come as Fed policymakers enter the later stages of a far-reaching strategy review that has included detailed debate over the merits of adopting an inflation target.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Fed, believes that the bank would be better off with a relatively flexible inflation target – one that would be achieved on average, rather than within a specific time, giving maximum latitude to respond to output shocks.

However, Fed watchers say that, in order to make any such change, Mr Bernanke would need at least the tacit consent of key figures in Congress. Mr Frank's unequivocal statements suggest this consent will still be difficult to secure even after generally favourable congressional hearings last week.

In an interview, Mr Frank told the FT that Mr Bernanke "has a statutory mandate for stable prices and low unemployment. If you target one of them, and not the other, it seems to me that will inevitably be favoured."

Mr Frank noted that Alan Greenspan, the former Fed chairman, always resisted an inflation target on the grounds that it would reduce his operational flexibility.

"I think Alan Greenspan was right not to do that in the 1990s," Mr Frank said. The lack of a formal inflation target helped Mr Greenspan probe how low unemployment could fall without generating inflation.

Advocates of an inflation target at the Fed say it is important to distinguish between the relatively rigid form of target used, for instance, by the Bank of England, and the relatively flexible form favoured by Mr Bernanke.

DOJ_NMG_0133660

Mr Frank, though, said he would not support even a flexible target "without equal attention to unemployment also". He agreed that Mr Bernanke and his colleagues probably had an implicit inflation target in mind already, but said it would be dangerous to make it explicit.

"I think when you make it more transparent you enhance its importance," Mr Frank said. "No question he has something in his head. But when you make it public you lose flexibility."

Mr Frank said he would listen to the Fed chairman's arguments, but suggested he was quite firm in his views. "I am always willing to talk to him," he said. "But he is as likely to change my mind as I am to change his."

Women Post Job Gains, Data Show (WSJ)

By Dean Treftz

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Women took on slightly more than half of U.S. jobs created in the first part of the decade and made gains in securing the most lucrative openings.

Women posted a net increase of 1.7 million jobs paying above the median salary, while men gained a net increase of just over 220,000 of such positions, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics report for the years 2000-2005.

Overall, men gained 1,804,000 jobs and women 1,996,000, or 52.5% of the total increase, for the period studied.

Women outpaced men in obtaining work that pays in the top quarter of all jobs, primarily positions in the health-care, financial and managerial fields, according to the report. At the end of 2005, 1.1 million more of those jobs were held by women, while 200,000 fewer men held such jobs as widespread layoffs cut manufacturing employment. But the wage gap persists: In 2005, the median weekly pay for women was $486, or 73% of that for men -- $663.

The BLS report3 by economist Randy Ilg found that from 2000 through 2005, service jobs accounted for the largest portion of the net 3.8 million increase in wage and salary positions. Most of the 2.3 million service positions were in food preparation and service, health-care support, and personal care and service, with four of five of those jobs paying below the 2005 overall median of $577 a week.

During the study period, 1.9 million above-the-median manufacturing jobs were lost, the bulk of which -- 1.4 million -- had been held by men. Meantime, the number of construction jobs grew by nearly one million. Though construction is often thought of as providing higher-earning jobs, the report showed construction work accounted for many of the new, lower-paying jobs filled by men.

Jared Bernstein, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, said an increase in unskilled, immigrant labor might explain the downward trend in construction wages.

Many lower-end office jobs disappeared with new technology and employer belt-tightening, Mr. Bernstein said.

In trying to figure out whether the economy primarily has been adding low-paying jobs, many economists looked only at what industries provided job growth, and from that they estimated how good those jobs were based on the previous median pay within a specific industry, Mr. Ilg said. That approach, he said, could be problematic, explaining that "the amount of information you can glean from that [data] is limited because you are looking at one figure for an industry."

Building Slump? Not On The Commercial Side. (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK

The residential housing market may be hibernating this winter, but hard hats around the country are increasingly busy setting I-beams and rivets on new towers, warehouses, industrial parks, and retail space.

Residential construction fell 2 percent last year, but private commercial construction rose 16 percent, and public construction was up 10 percent, according to the US Census Bureau. The last time the business was this strong was seven years ago, says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors.

Behind the commercial-construction push is a combination of powerful economic forces: For one, gigantic investment pools – some from overseas – are looking for places to invest. Also, an enormous growth of imports into the United States is spurring a rush to build new warehouse space. Moreover, developers are building new communities that offer environmentally friendly spaces to work and require less commuting time. These complexes also offer nightlife and restaurant options.

In some areas, commercial rents are rising, reflecting the growing demand for first-class office space. "There is a shortage of space in various markets around the country," says Alan Beaudette, chairman of the National Association of Industrial and Office Properties in Herndon, Va. "A growing economy justifies new industrial and retail projects."

Indeed, some construction specialties were soaring last year. Construction for new hotels was up 52 percent compared with 2005, according to preliminary figures by the US Commerce Department. Likewise, factory building rose 20 percent, and office building 18 percent.

The pickup is so strong that it has absorbed many workers who had been involved in residential construction. Last month, for example, while 80,000 jobs were lost in residential construction, commercial contractors hired 180,000 workers.

That's no surprise to Brian O'Neill, chairman of O'Neill Properties Group in King of Prussia, Pa. "We're targeting workers who have been building houses. We're happy to have them," he says.

Mr. O'Neill expects to do $1.6 billion in business this year – double his best year ever. Some of his projects are typical of the vibrant construction economy: He's building offices for technology companies, healthcare providers, and consultants. In Malvern, Pa., which used to have a steel mill, his company is erecting a mixed-use community that will total 1.6 million square feet.

The business is now so good that some construction executives are worried. "We are always concerned when there is so much money out there, it entices people to build what should not have been built in the first place," says Mr. Beaudette, who is also senior vice president of Lowe Enterprises Real Estate Group in Irvine, Calif. "[Five to 10 years ago], it was easier to find high teen returns on your investment, and that is now more difficult."

In fact, the commercial construction market is driving up the price of essential building materials such as cement, steel, and gypsum. And it goes beyond commodities: There may even be shortages of contractors who can handle complex projects, says Bill Scott, executive vice president at Linbeck Construction in Houston.

"Clients want more individual control, more capability, and flexibility, which adds complexity to how buildings are planned," he says. "There is going to be a shortage of good contractors for highly complex projects."

For example, his company, which normally does not build warehouses, is erecting a large warehouse in the Port of Houston for a long-term client. "It's being planned so the client has great flexibility to rent to a wide variety of people – and that means complex lighting and fire protection," he says.

The Houston project is just part of a huge explosion of warehouse construction. In the Port of Houston alone, some 3 million square feet of new space is being added, Mr. Scott says. "It's all part of the drive to get goods unloaded from ships and moved across the country."

Even some parts of the country where construction has lagged in the past are experiencing a boom. That's the case in Denver, says Michael Brendle, a design principal at the architectural firm RNL. A 22-story tower and five-story building – both being built to "green" standards – are going up in the downtown area. The developer is building them on "spec" – that is, without major tenants signed up in advance. "It shows a lot of confidence in the market," says Mr. Brendle.

One of the hottest building concepts is mixed-use development. Cheri Morris, CEO of Hedgewood Commercial Properties, is involved in a $50 million restoration of Woodstock, Ga., outside of Atlanta.

Like many new projects today, Woodstock is trying to use "sustainable" principles. For example, Ms. Morris says, "We feel every resident should be able to get into the village in a five-minute walk." In addition, homes are placed on smaller lots, leaving more room for common space. The completely remodeled village is scheduled to open by December of this year.

For Investors, Strong Enough Is Good Enough (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

It is the kind of surprise investors love to get: The economy seems to be just a little stronger than most people expected. Not enough to worry anyone; just enough to push stocks higher.

DOJ_NMG_0133662

Data on items such as fourth-quarter economic growth and consumer spending have come in a tad better than markets expected late last year.

As a result, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has continued its steady rise, and stocks that do better in a strong economy have been among the leaders.

The Dow Jones Transportation Average, which sagged late last year amid worries about an economic slowdown, has become a leader again. Smaller stocks, which depend more than big ones on the ups and downs of the economy, are back on the rise, with middle-size stocks among the big gainers.

The mood is downright bullish.

"The economy is operating in a very sweet spot," says David Kotok, president of money-management firm Cumberland Advisors in Vineland, N.J., which manages $850 million in stocks and bonds.

Amid solid growth with minimal inflation world-wide, the world's stock markets are feeding on one another's success. "With a little bit of good news, the surprise could be that they could work their way a lot higher," Mr. Kotok says.

That kind of optimism has powered stocks higher since July. Skeptics, who have been wrong so far, point out that things look so good that it would be hard for them to get better. Few money managers see signs of any serious trouble, and that is a disquieting sign of complacency to some of the most skeptical investors. Some predict small gains, some predict big gains, some predict small declines -- but almost no one sees a big decline on the horizon.

Investors have heard such warnings for months now and, by and large, they have ignored them -- to their profit. Some see the sweet spot continuing for months or even years, with the economy resilient and the inflation rate moderate. If the skeptics are right, it would be time for a pullback.

Neither the Dow industrials nor the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has seen as much as a 2% pullback from a high since July 14 -- the longest period without such a pullback since 1954. The markets are getting "positively giddy," says Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco. He sees a pullback coming.

"You have to question whether for the short term this is a good time to be putting money to work," he says.

He worries that, because of the economy's strength, inflation could pick up. That could force the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates. Higher rates hurt corporate profits by raising costs for businesses and consumers, and a Fed rate increase could send major indexes down 10% or more, he says.

So he likes "defensive" stocks, such as those of health-care and household-products companies, whose steady businesses keep them stable in most economic and market conditions. He likes European stocks. He worries that smaller U.S. stocks, among the big gainers, could fall harder than large ones on any bad news, because they are more volatile and more dependent on good economic news.

Janna Sampson, director of portfolio management at OakBrook Investments in Lisle, Ill., adds that inflation has remained tame in part because oil prices fell back last fall from summer highs. If they stay down, inflation probably will remain under control, and the Fed probably can avoid raising interest rates, she says. She thinks that is likely. The risk is that no one, including the experts, is very good at predicting the price of oil.

"I don't think the Fed has a much better handle than I do on oil prices," Ms. Sampson says.

She is focusing her investments on companies that will be able to pass on higher prices in case inflation stays high, such as Waste Management Inc. and Automatic Data Processing Inc. She says she doesn't think the market will stay tranquil.

"I think we are going to have a lot of volatility based on what people think the Fed will do and how fast the economy is growing, and what oil prices are doing," she says, although she says she thinks broad indexes will finish the year higher.

There are some investors who think the economy may be less robust than it appears. They point to the most recent data, late last week, showing consumer confidence, housing starts, retail sales and industrial production all a bit weaker than expected.

They think a less-robust economy would be good news because it could induce the Fed to cut interest rates later this year to give the economy a lift. Interest-rate futures markets show investors once again pushing up the odds that the Fed will cut rates later this year. Lower rates would help stocks, just as higher rates would hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0133663

That kind of scenario supports "this kind of placid, low-volatility, upward-drifting market," says Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management, the investment-advisory arm of PNC Bank in Pittsburgh.

So he isn't buying into the recent gains in stocks of companies that would benefit from a strong economy. He prefers some areas that didn't rise as much last year, such as health-care and technology stocks, which he thinks could catch up.

Some managers add that, if U.S. growth turns out to be softer than it has appeared, foreign stocks could continue to do better than U.S. stocks, especially some of the foreign markets that haven't soared of late.

"We like places like Hong Kong and Japan that have lagged behind," as well as some markets in continental Europe, suggests Max Darnell, chief investment officer at First Quadrant in Pasadena, Calif., which oversees $35 billion in investments.

Stocks Usually Thrive As Presidential Election Nears (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK — The relationship between politics and stock market profitability tends to be most cordial in the year prior to a presidential election.

It is that historical statistical quirk that should provide some solace to investors concerned about another calendar-related anomaly on Wall Street: the fact that stocks have not had a 2% pullback since July 14, a span of 149 trading sessions. That uninterrupted uptrend, says Ned Davis Research, lags behind only a correctionless stretch that ended in 1954.

It's hard to ignore just how well stocks have fared in the third year of the four-year presidential cycle. The last time the Dow Jones industrial average posted a negative return in a pre-presidential election year was 1939, when it fell 2.9% amid brewing World War II clouds, says the Stock Trader's Almanac.

"The only severe loss … occurred in 1931 during the Depression," when the Dow fell 52.7%, writes Almanac editor Jeffrey Hirsch.

The gains are usually of the double-digit variety. Jeffrey Kleintop, investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management, says the Standard & Poor's 500 index has posted average gains of 22% in year three of the four-year cycle. "And," he adds, "never experienced a loss."

That's a key reason Kleintop listed the bullish presidential cycle as the No. 1 thing that "could go right" in his 2007 investment forecast. He notes that the pattern of stellar returns has less to do with the election and more with the tendency of the political party in power to do what is necessary to keep the economy humming.

It often is profitable for investors to be more aggressive in years three and four of a presidential cycle, a 2004 study by Pepperdine University economics professor Marshall Nickles found.

The study, citing data going back to 1952, found that investors who invested $1,000 in the S&P 500 on Oct. 1 of the second year of the four-year cycle — a period in which stocks tend to bottom — and sold on Dec. 31 of the election year would have made money in all 13 election cycles. The initial $1,000 investment would have grown to $72,701 by 2000 had the investor executed the strategy in all 13 cycles. But a person who invested $1,000 on Jan. 1 of the inaugural year and sold on Sept. 30 of year two of the presidential term would have suffered losses in seven of 13 cycles and lost $357.

While Nickles warns that it is risky to "anticipate specific turns in the market," he concludes that "investing for the 27 months before a U.S. presidential election certainly seems to be more profitable than investing during the 21 months after the election."

Job Corps Plans Makeover For A Changed Economy (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

LAUREL, Md. — Over the last four decades, even as failed experiments and partisan disputes took the luster off the war on poverty, the Job Corps, the government's main effort to give poorly educated youths a second chance at a diploma and a trade, was widely seen as one of the few success stories.

But now, as the economy has turned against those with low skills and researchers have questioned the long-term impact of the Job Corps on the lives of its graduates, this remnant of the Great Society is facing an urgent need to reinvent itself.

DOJ_NMG_0133664

"Once you could go into the Job Corps and get a G.E.D. and go out and make a living," said Esther R. Johnson, a career executive in the Labor Department with a doctorate in education who took over the corps last March. "You can't do that anymore."

Dr. Johnson wants the Job Corps to aim higher, helping graduates into careers with a bigger paycheck.

To do that she plans to lengthen the average stay for many graduates beyond the current 11.4 months, improving their reading, math and vocational skills. She also wants trade courses to connect more closely with college programs and emerging industries, and she thinks the corps must double the number of graduates, now just 10 percent, who go on to higher education. All this can be done, Dr. Johnson said in an interview, within a budget flat-lined at $1.5 billion in recent years, mainly by increasing the rigor of courses while cutting other costs.

Bridgette Hunter, 18, illustrates the potential benefits of a program that, if it can fulfill its goals, is needed more than ever. She dropped out of school in Baltimore last March, in 12th grade but many credits short of a diploma. "I was with the wrong people," Ms. Hunter explained.

She quickly realized that her ambitions and behavior were out of sync. By October she had entered the Woodland Job Corps Center here, brushing up on reading and math as she took courses in health care while sharing a dorm room and rising at 6:30 a.m. with a 10 p.m. curfew.

"I want to be wealthy," Ms. Hunter said. "My ambition is to become an R.N.," she added, admitting with a shrug that her notion of wealth was a relative one. "And I knew that sitting around doing nothing wouldn't get me there."

At the center, where 300 students live and work in a sprawl of brick dormitories, classrooms and workshops, Ms. Hunter has already earned her G.E.D. and will soon be certified as a nursing assistant. In newly added services, she has the help of a volunteer mentor, a scientist from Washington who is helping her scout colleges, while outside tutors are helping her prepare for the SATs. Grant money is available for nursing, and she could qualify as a registered nurse after two years in a community college.

Since President Lyndon B. Johnson created the Job Corps as part of his "unconditional war on poverty," two million Americans have passed through its residential centers, which number 122 nationwide, with three more planned.

Despite the corps's high cost to the government — now $26,000 an entrant — evidence suggests it has paid off, increasing earnings and reducing crime.

With prospects for the less-educated getting worse and millions of young people, especially black men, unemployed or stuck in dead-end minimum-wage jobs, salvaging "disconnected youth" has become a prime antipoverty target.

In 2005, 4.4 million youths ages 16 to 24 were neither in school nor working, according to an analysis by Andrew Sum, director of the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University, who calls this an ominous portent. "How much time you're out of school and out of work in the late teens and early 20s is a strong predictor of future joblessness, poverty and dependence in your late 20s," Dr. Sum said.

Both the government and private groups are looking for answers.

"What to do for very disadvantaged youth is the most perplexing social problem we face, in part because so few of the things we have tried have worked," said Gordon L. Berlin, president of M.D.R.C., a group in New York that evaluates antipoverty efforts.

Along with the Job Corps, the federal government supports a program run by the National Guard for about 10,000 16- to 18-year-old dropouts per year, combining five months of schooling in a military-style camp with another year of mentoring. The Labor Department also contributes $50 million a year to Youthbuild, which with an additional $130 million in private financing runs 226 nonresidential programs for 8,000 students a year. Participants renovate low-income housing as they study.

With better training, high school diplomas or, better, degrees from community colleges, many graduates of such programs, it is hoped, will become chefs instead of hamburger flippers; plumbers, electricians or carpenters instead of pickup laborers; nurses instead of health aides. A newer course at the Laurel center trains students to install cable and other electronic systems.

A study published in 2001 that surveyed Job Corps graduates and a control group, conducted by Mathematica Policy Research for the Labor Department, found that the program led to significant increases in self-reported earnings over four years and to lower arrest rates.

But a second analysis, released by the Labor Department in 2006, was dismaying: only the older participants, those in their 20s when they entered the centers, showed any gains in earnings, and they were slight.

Debate about the studies continues, but the findings helped drive the new effort to rejuvenate the corps.

Of roughly 60,000 low-income youths who enter the Job Corps each year, all voluntarily, three-fourths have not graduated from high school.

In Laurel, students live in college-style dorms. The days are divided between academic study and hands-on work: carpentry students practice building walls and roofs; electrical students wire a mock house.

Nationally, 30 percent of entrants leave within the first two months, either because they break the rules or they do not like the regimented life. Among the rest, 60 percent leave with a G.E.D., a regular high school diploma, certification in a trade or a combination of these.

Michael Whitfield of Washington said he had a change of heart after quitting school in the 11th grade.

"I got to thinking, is this all I'm going to do for the rest of my life?" Mr. Whitfield recalled as he prepared to leave the Laurel center after nine months, having earned his high school diploma and completed courses in electrical contracting and carpentry.

Now 19, he has been accepted by a two-year college where he will study criminal justice to become a police or parole officer. He credited the Job Corps with helping him straighten up and discover his goals. "I really can't see people making it these days without a diploma," he said. "I was lucky; I had a second chance."

The Real Patriots (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

If we could manage to get past the tedious and the odious — like the empty speculation on whether a woman can win, or whether Barack Obama is black enough — we might be able to engage the essential issue facing the U.S. at this point in our history.

And that is whether, once the Bush administration has finally and mercifully run its course, the country goes back to being a reasonably peaceful, lawful, constructive force in the world, or whether we continue down the bullying, warlike, unilateral, irresponsible, unlawful and profoundly ineffective path laid out by Bush, Cheney & Co.

The question is not so much whether a Republican or a Democrat takes the White House in the next election; it's whether the American people can take back their country.

I don't think most Americans are up for perennial warfare. And whatever the polls might say, it's very hard for me to accept that the men and women who rise from their seats and cover their hearts at the start of sporting events are really in favor of dismantling the system of checks and balances, or holding people in prison for years without charging them, or torturing prisoners in U.S. custody, or giving the president the raw power and unsavory privileges of an emperor.

It was Richard Nixon who said, "When the president does it, that means that it is not illegal."

George W. Bush and Dick Cheney, operating behind the mammoth fig leaf of national security, took this theoretical absurdity to heart and put it into widespread practice.

There are, however, many thoughtful Americans who want to stop this calamitous disregard for the rule of law, two of whom I'll mention today — Frederick A. O. Schwarz Jr. and Senator Chris Dodd.

Mr. Schwarz is one of the most decent men I've known. I covered him when he was the chief lawyer for New York City during the Koch administration. He was then, and still is, the quintessential straight arrow.

In the 1970s Mr. Schwarz was chief counsel for the Church Committee (named after its chairman, Senator Frank Church), which uncovered extraordinary abuses and led to historic changes in the nation's intelligence services. He is now the senior counsel at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School.

To say that Mr. Schwarz is disturbed by some of the things that have occurred during the presidency of George W. Bush is an understatement. In a book to be published next month by The New Press, "Unchecked and Unbalanced: Presidential Power in a Time of Terror," Mr. Schwarz and a colleague at the Brennan Center, Aziz Z. Huq, write:

DOJ_NMG_0133666

"For the first time in American history, the executive branch claims authority under the Constitution to set aside laws permanently — including prohibitions on torture and warrantless eavesdropping on Americans. A frightening idea decisively rejected at America's birth — that a president, like a king, can do no wrong — has reemerged to justify torture and indefinite presidential detention."

Undermining checks and balances here at home and acting unilaterally abroad have made us less safe, said Mr. Schwarz. Some of the actions the U.S. has taken "have so hurt our reputation," he said, "that Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay have become in many eyes more the symbol of America than the Statue of Liberty."

Senator Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat who is running for president, has introduced legislation that would definitively bar the use of evidence obtained by torture or coercion, reinstate full U.S. adherence to the Geneva Conventions and restore rights of habeas corpus for certain terror suspects that were stripped away by the federal government last year.

(Habeas corpus is a legal proceeding that allows suspects to challenge their detention in a court of law. To get a sense of its significance, imagine that you were locked up somewhere and were not permitted to show that a mistake had been made, that you were innocent. Imagine that you, or a loved one, were held under those circumstances for a period of years, or forever.)

Senator Dodd said this corrosion of the rule of law has been tolerated primarily because "people have been frightened." As he put it, in an atmosphere of crisis, "the temptation to succumb to the demagoguery of these things is strong."

The senator and Mr. Schwarz, in their different ways, are among the many quiet patriots who are spreading the word that the very meaning of the United States, the whole point of this fragile experiment in representative democracy, will be lost if the nation's ironclad commitment to the rule of law is allowed to unravel.

Would C-SPAN Count? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 19, 2007

Once again, Congress is flirting with the idea of censoring violence on TV. Once again, its efforts are misguided.

JUST WHAT, EXACTLY, constitutes a program that's too violent for kids to watch on TV? How about the story of a gun-blasting bounty hunter destroying a neighborhood as he tries to kill or capture his nihilistic offspring? That, after all, is what one sees in Walt Disney's "Lilo & Stitch," a hit movie for … kids, and a perfect illustration of the fundamental problems posed by Congress' flirtation with regulating violent TV programming.

Responding to a request from lawmakers, the Federal Communications Commission has drafted a report outlining what Congress might do to curb excessively violent programs. Objectionably violent shows, it says, could be banned during the hours that children are most likely to be watching TV (6 a.m. to 10 p.m.), just as indecent programming is. Congress could force cable operators to sell channels on an a la carte basis, rather than bundling them into packages that can't be customized. And the difficult task of defining excessive violence could be done by the federal government without violating the 1st Amendment.

There's plenty of evidence that television shows are more graphically violent than ever, both on cable networks and on free over-the-air TV. Simply noting this problem, however, doesn't prove that government censorship can solve it.

Requiring programs such as "24" to be aired after 10 p.m. wouldn't stop kids from watching a recorded version the next afternoon. Nor would it have much effect on the Internet, where networks are posting a growing number of reruns for viewers to watch on demand. And it's hard to imagine Congress barring news programs before 10 p.m., and there's no shortage of violence on the news.

A similar problem underlies the proposal to mandate a la carte cable pricing. It would be a boon to consumers if cable and satellite TV operators did business this way. But even in an a la carte regime, the channels with programming that distresses anti-violence activists are likely to be among the most frequently bought, simply because their programs are in high demand.

What censorship would do is deter networks from airing valuable but bloody shows that don't quite qualify as news, while generating lawsuits over what inevitably will be inconsistent standards for judging violence on TV. Would cartoons be treated the same way as live action? How about realistic historical fare? Would "Saving Private Ryan" get a pass? Then how about "The Passion of the Christ"? What about psychological violence?

The government shouldn't be making these calls; parents should. Online, there's plenty of help for parents trying to identify inappropriate shows for their kids, and there's technology in every TV set, cable converter box and satellite receiver to help screen out violent programming. If they still don't like how much violence their TV is bringing into their home, they should just turn it off.

The 10 Worst Presidents (USNEWS)

By Jay Tolson

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Is George W. Bush's presidency shaping up to be one of the worst in U.S. history? You hear the question being asked more and more these days. And more and more, you hear the same answer. With Iraq a shambles and trust in the administration declining, it is probably not surprising that 54 percent of respondents in a recent USA Today/Gallup survey said that history would judge Bush a below-average or poor president, more than twice the number who gave such a rating to any of the five preceding occupants of the White House, including Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter.

Public opinion is a notoriously fickle beast, of course, which is why historians and other custodians of the long view prefer to reserve judgment until they can speak of their subjects in the past tense. But clearly something about Bush ii has inspired many historians to abandon their usual caution. Meena Bose, a Hofstra University political scientist who has written about presidential ratings, says that the scholars' rush to rank the current president comes out of an acute awareness of the long-term consequences of his policies. "Since it's hard to see how Iraq will work out for the better," Bose says, " it's hard not to pass judgments."

Whatever his reasons, Princeton University historian Sean Wilentz created a minor sensation last year when he published a resounding verdict in Rolling Stone magazine: "Barring a cataclysmic event on the order of the terrorist attacks of September 11, after which the public might rally around the White House once again, there seems to be little the administration can do to avoid being ranked on the lowest tier of U.S. presidents." Bush partisans had a ready explanation for that assessment: liberal bias. But while Wilentz makes no secret of his liberalism, he referred to an informal survey of 415 historians in 2004 in which 81 percent of the respondents stated that the Bush administration would go down as a failure.

Bush's own view of how history will treat him comes across in his frequent allusions to Harry Truman, another famously unpopular sitting president whose reputation rose sharply as scholars began to appreciate his role in laying the foundations for America's success in the Cold War. And if Iraq turns out to be a beacon of democracy in the Middle East 10 years from now, there will be a lot of scholars eating crow.

Attempts to rate the Bush presidency are at best premature, but they do raise valuable questions. Is there, to begin with, a scholarly consensus on who America's worst chief executives are? If there were a negative Mount Rushmore, which presidents would have their faces carved into it? What qualities seem to distinguish poor presidencies? And finally, do rankings really help us understand presidential leadership and individual presidencies, or do they, in the words of Princeton University political scientist Fred Greenstein, "divert attention from the full range of presidential experience"?

Credit, or blame, for the first scholarly ranking of the presidents usually goes to Harvard historian Arthur Schlesinger Sr., who conducted a poll for Life magazine in 1948. He asked 55 specialists in American history to rate the presidents as great, near great, average, below average, or failure. Claiming the cellar of that list were Warren G. Harding and, in ascending order, Ulysses S. Grant, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Zachary Taylor, Millard Fillmore, Calvin Coolidge, John Tyler, Benjamin Harrison, and Herbert Hoover.

Don't call the new release Amazing Grace just another political thriller. What was once billed as an educational movie is fast becoming the model for bipartisanship. For weeks the hottest flick in the political and religious underground, Amazing Grace debuts at the White House this week, capping President Bush's focus on Black History Month. "We really think this is a wonderful movie that can inspire a new direction in Washington," says a Bushie.

"Our film shows the good that politics can do," says Erik Lokkesmoe, the film's project manager. Amazing Grace charts the effort of British politician William Wilberforce to end the slave trade 200 years ago with the help of an odd team that included former slave ship Capt. John Newton, who wrote Amazing Grace after finding God. Former Rep. Floyd Flake, now the president of Ohio's Wilberforce University, thinks all his former House colleagues should see it. "They could learn a lesson from it," he tells us. Even though it doesn't hit theaters until February 23, Bush is late to the endorsement parade. A crowd from liberal Rep. John Lewis to conservative Sen. Sam Brownback and groups from the Humane Society to Focus on the Family have applauded it, prompting movie makers to almost yawn at the White House invitation. "We find that these kinds of invitations and opportunities are everywhere," says Lokkesmoe.

This Supreme Court Stuff Is Hard Work

He didn't use the word lazy, but that was Sen. Arlen Specter's suggestion when he asked Associate Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy if taking two months off in summer limited the number of cases heard by the high court. "I don't think my colleagues would say we are under-worked," says Kennedy. "We are very proud that we get work done every year on schedule and on time. Our docket is 100 percent finished on July 1st," he explains. "The only way we can do that is by taking two months to read and recover and so forth before we come back."

Shaming Those Wimpy D.C. Drivers

OK, so Washingtonians can't drive in the snow. But do we have to be sneered at by smug snow senators like Vermont's Patrick Leahy? On a day last week when a few inches shut down much of the District, Leahy opened a committee hearing with some Green Mountain State chest-pounding. "A little snow's not going to stop us," he bragged at the sparsely populated hearing. "We had 2 feet of snow overnight," he says of his home state. "I'm told that a number of places opened as much as an hour late. It's a new generation, and they go slowly."

Jackie to Joan: Rein In Your Man

Kennedy buffs rejoice: What's thought to be the biggest-ever cache of JFK and Jackie O memorabilia is heading to auction, including a racy letter from Jackie to Sen. Edward Kennedy's former wife, Joan, urging her to rein in her wandering hubby, a life preserver from JFK's sailboat Victura, and the former first lady's own 8-mm movie camera. We've noted auctions by Alexander Autographs before, but this one, online February 24-25 at alexautographs.com, is really rich. Just consider the Jackie-to-Joan letter, worth an estimated $5,000 to $7,000. In the unsigned letter, Jackie tells Joan to take charge of the family and balk when Teddy spends too much time with his siblings or worse. "This is the 20th century-not the 19th-" she pens, "where little woman stayed home on a pedestal with the kids & her rosary." The best part is how the goods became public. Seems a former helper recovered the items from Joan's Cape Cod home and put them in storage. But she forgot to pay the bill; the stuff was auctioned off, and the top bidder is cashing in.

An Immigration Balancing Act (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

It's usually thought of as the kinder, gentler arm of immigration, but U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services helps nab an average of five criminals a day, including the occasional murder suspect -- a point that agency Director Emilio Gonzalez underscores when he discusses the USCIS role in the Homeland Security Department.

A little more than a year ago, Mr. Gonzalez took over the agency in charge of granting citizenship, green cards signifying a legal permanent immigrant and visas for work or study. In that year, he has started a pilot program to test a new naturalized citizenship exam, finished off a backlog of millions of benefit applications and created several offices that would put national security first at the agency.

But those who interact most with USCIS say Mr. Gonzalez's tenure will succeed or fail on his latest proposal to increase fees an average of more than 60 percent in order to finish the transformation from a much-maligned 20th-century paper-based bureaucracy into 21st-century streamlined, self-sufficient, services-based enterprise.

"All those people that are out there complaining about long waits, dingy buildings, poorly trained personnel, this is an opportunity for us to take those into account and fix it," Mr. Gonzalez said last week from his office overlooking Massachusetts Avenue and Union Station.

DOJ_NMG_0133669

"We have been woefully underfunded, even under the days of [the former Immigration and Naturalization Service] and the Justice Department," he said in defending the proposed new fees. "There's absolutely no way I could in good conscience continue to head an agency that's treading water. We're coasting. And when you're coasting, you're going backwards; nobody ever coasted uphill."

It's a touchy issue that goes straight to the heart of legal immigration and who should pick up the tab for applying.

His proposal is already meeting resistance on Capitol Hill, where some Democrats called on him to rethink how the agency does business.

"Many in the immigrant community see the increase for what it is -- increasing the cost of the American dream, telling those least fortunate among us they probably need not apply," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

But as a Cuban-born immigrant whose parents brought him to the U.S. as a child, Mr. Gonzalez considers himself an advocate for the immigrant community and says he hopes "to convey that immigration, done properly, works."

And as a former Army officer, he is fond of saying there is a reason that his agency is part of Homeland Security. He takes pride in the fact that his agency turns over an average of five names a day to law-enforcement agencies -- for everything up to and including those being sought on murder charges.

"Those are folks who think they can get away with murder, literally, come in to get a new green card, come in with a wife or girlfriend to help them apply for a benefit. We run a check and find out there's a warrant on these folks," Mr. Gonzalez said.

He has created a special unit to handle difficult national-security cases and also created a benefit revocation unit, which is designed to help officials at the local offices go after those whose green card or citizenship should be taken away.

The balance between security and openness doesn't always strike outsiders as correct, and they let him know it.

"I get hate mail by the hundreds," he said, adding that it comes from both sides of the debate.

Immigrant advocates say they don't see much progress from Mr. Gonzalez's first year.

"I can't say that he's really made his mark yet," said Crystal Williams, deputy director of programs at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "Certainly, the fees are his first attempt to make a mark, and it's not the kind of mark you like to see."

She said that the "jury is still out" on the citizenship test and that many of the other issues he's trying to tackle are perennial problems that others have failed to solve.

"I'm not seeing an awful lot new here," she said. "Admittedly, he's only the second director of USCIS, but there have been commissioners of INS for many years before him who have tried to address the adjudication side of things before him, and quite honestly, none of them have succeeded."

She also said she's noticed a change that actually seems to have begun after the September 11 terrorist attacks. Before that, she said, adjudicators used to look at applications and see whether the preponderance of the evidence favored approval.

"Now many -- if not most -- of them seem to look at an application and ask themselves, how can I deny this, and if they can't find a way to deny it, only then approve it," she said.

Mr. Gonzalez raised some eyebrows in Miami two weeks ago when he compared the immigration debate in Congress over granting citizenship to illegal aliens to the civil rights movement. In the interview last week, he said he wasn't trying to stir controversy.

"The comparison is not on the substance but on the scope," he said. "You have legislation that is going to change the lives of millions and millions of people. You have legislation that is going to address individuals that are invisible today yet are standing right in front of us."

'Milestone Of Achievement' On The Hill (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133670

At 6 feet 2 inches tall, Lorraine C. Miller cuts a striking figure in the polished hallways of the U.S. Capitol. Last week, the woman with regal bearing gained another, more lasting distinction. She was sworn in as clerk of the House of Representatives, the first African American to hold the seat since it was created in 1789.

"This is another milestone of achievement, not just of black people but of all people," said Thomas Tyler, who directs the senior choir at the Shiloh Baptist Church in the District, where Miller sings first alto.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) tapped Miller for the job, citing her work ethic, knowledge of the Hill and ability to make connections across party lines, in addition to her trailblazer status.

"I was the first woman, and I had a responsibility to do other firsts," Pelosi said at a recent reception honoring Miller. "I've done a lot of things since I became speaker, but none have given me more pride and been more thrilling to me than to swear in Lorraine Miller."

Miller had been among Pelosi's senior advisers. After the Democrats won control of Congress in November and it was clear that Pelosi would ascend to the House speaker's job, members of her staff began lobbying for various appointments. All except Miller.

"I sought her out and asked if she wanted the job," Pelosi said. "That speaks to her modesty, that she didn't put her name out, that I had to ask her if she was interested."

She was, of course.

The clerk runs the day-to-day operations of the House of Representatives, handling everything from stationery supplies to the voting process on the House floor to managing the page program. She said she intends to put special focus on the page program, which has been plagued by scandal, with former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigning after sending inappropriate computer messages to male former pages.

The nonpartisan office oversees nine divisions that employ 276 people. It pays $163,700 a year and comes with one of the best offices in the Capitol, boasting a commanding view of the Mall and the Washington Monument.

But Miller's rise to become an officer of the House did not begin with great promise.

She started her working life as a high school government teacher in Fort Worth. She was more intrigued by politics than teaching, however, and once a year for 10 years she wrote to then-Rep. Jim Wright (D-Tex.) and inquired about openings on his staff. Each time, she received a standard rejection letter.

Eventually, she moved to Washington, enrolled in a graduate program at American University and campaigned until she landed a job in Wright's office. "She doesn't take no for an answer, so you might as well save time" is how Pelosi described Miller's tenacity.

In her first two weeks in Wright's office, Miller answered telephones until one day a caller asked for the chief of staff. Miller said he was unavailable. "Tell him it's Jim," the caller said. "Jim who?" she asked.

She was reassigned shortly thereafter but quickly memorized the sound of Wright's voice. She developed a habit of memorizing the voices of House members and now can identify most by voice, Republican or Democrat.

Miller worked for Wright for 11 years, including while he was speaker. She also worked for another speaker, Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.), as well as Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.). She worked for two years in the White House during the Clinton administration as deputy assistant to the president, serving as his liaison to the House, and joined the Federal Trade Commission and later the Federal Communications Commission.

She still owns a house in Forth Worth, where she returns once a month, as well as her family's cattle farm in East Texas. "I love going down there," she said of the farm. "The smell of cow manure and pine needles. It's so relaxed, so different from life here. The only worry is what are you going to bring to the church social."

Though she maintains her Texas roots, and cheers for the Dallas Cowboys, Miller has made connections in the District. Since 2004, she has served as president of the D.C. chapter of the NAACP.

Family, fellow churchgoers and a large contingent of friends from Fort Worth, including two Texas state legislators, toasted Miller at the evening reception. Several wore yellow roses, as in "The Yellow Rose of Texas," pinned to their lapels.

DOJ_NMG_0133671

"She will now have two names -- Madam Clerk and Poopie Pie," said Miller's sister, Marietta. The two women call each other best friend and share a house in LeDroit Park, where Marietta says it is not unusual for Lorraine to return from work at 2:30 a.m.

Miller is so garrulous that she repeatedly interrupted her own remarks at the party to call out to familiar faces in the room. "If a young person could look at my journey and feel inspired to achieve . . . Hi, Ernie," she said. "Hi, Dwight -- I remember Dwight when he attended dental school at Howard. He worked at Church's Fried Chicken. He makes grand theft money now," she told the howling crowd.

NASA Goes Deep (NYT)

By Carolyn Porco

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

AFTER years of spending our nation's space budget building an orbiting space station of questionable utility, serviced by an operationally expensive space shuttle of unsafe design, NASA has set a new direction for the future of human spaceflight. Once again, we have our sights on the Moon ... and beyond. We are finally, bodily, going to make our way into space, this time to stay.

It is an opinion long and widely held within the space-exploration community that the Nixon administration's termination of the program that built the Saturn V Moon rocket was a gargantuan mistake.

One of the biggest challenges in exploring space is propulsion — that is, getting from point A to B efficiently, safely and quickly. And when the cargo is human, the challenges are even greater. One of our crowning technological achievements during the 1960s was the Apollo program and, in particular, the development of the Saturn V rocket. The Saturn V was the largest, most powerful vehicle the United States had ever built. It had a launching capacity more than five times greater, a developmental cost 25 percent lower and a build-and-operate cost less than half of that of today's space shuttle.

In those early days, the possibilities for human space travel were intoxicating. Back then, NASA plans called for an aggressive integrated human flight program that would expand on the developments of Apollo: the establishment of a 50-person lunar base, a 100-person Earth-orbiting space station and human landfall on Mars, all by the mid-1980s. Those plans also included a 50-person semi-permanent Martian base by the end of the 20th century. Instead, we went nowhere.

Why? Because, largely for political reasons, we renounced the Moon, abandoned Apollo and the Saturn V and retreated to low Earth orbit, where we've spent the last 25 years going around in circles.

The cost to the nation of this misstep was enormous. For starters, we lost an investment, adjusted for inflation to 2007 dollars, of $160 billion. That was the cost to get to, land on, walk on, drive on and otherwise explore the Moon. (Of that amount, $29 billion, in inflation-adjusted dollars, was the approximate cost of the Saturn V.)

What's more, the production facilities for the Saturn V and the other lunar exploration components, like the command and lunar modules, were all closed. At that point, we lost both the technological means for human deep space exploration and the collective knowledge of tens of thousands of engineers and scientists trained in human spaceflight.

Equally troubling is what we put in place of Apollo. The $38 billion developmental cost of the shuttle has gotten us nowhere in the solar system fast. And the International Space Station could have been built with only half a dozen Saturn V launchings instead of the more than two dozen shuttle trips that will be required to finish it. The bottom line: a colossal misuse of funds and a disheartening lack of progress and loss of time.

The termination of the Saturn V program also had a stifling effect on the robotic exploration of other planets. In essence, we lost the ability to deliver larger, and in some cases faster, payloads elsewhere in the solar system.

Take, as an example, the 5,600-kilogram Cassini spacecraft, which was launched in 1997 and is now in orbit around Saturn. Its launching was timed so that after spending two years looping around the inner solar system to pick up speed, it could rendezvous with massive Jupiter for an additional boost that would send it to Saturn. All told, its flight time took seven years.

Had the Saturn V, modified with an appropriate fourth upper stage, been used to launch Cassini directly to Jupiter first, its flight time to Saturn could have been cut by more than half. In space, as on Earth, time is money, and the money saved could have been spent elsewhere.

Alternatively, for the same flight time, a vehicle of greater launching capacity can deliver a heavier payload. Take as an example the 480-kilogram New Horizons spacecraft, launched over a year ago to fly by Pluto in 2015 and eventually to explore the Kuiper Belt of icy debris that lies beyond it. Had it been launched on a modified Saturn V rocket, New Horizons could have carried a payload that was 15 times heavier and far more scientifically capable.

In the end, instead of having a ubiquitous presence throughout the solar system, humans haven't set foot on the Moon in 35 years, and even our robotic explorations in that time have been throttled because we deliberately reduced our access to deep space.

Today, however, NASA is again looking up and out. Vigorous efforts are under way to complete the space station in order to fulfill international commitments that would be unwise to violate. When that is done, the plan is to retire the space shuttle in 2010 in favor of a new program to return to the Moon, with a party of humans, by 2020. A mainstay of this program is the Ares launching system, capable of sending 65 metric tons to the Moon — exceeding the capacity of the Saturn V by more than 40 percent.

The official plans call not for flag-planting and grab-a-few-rocks-and-go but, by 2025, a solar-powered, human-tended, continuously inhabited research outpost rising from either the north or south pole of the Moon, where sunlight is persistent and water ice may be present. Sustainability, made possible in part by the use of lunar resources, is one goal. Another is on-site preparations for a push to the next outpost, Mars.

And human spaceflight is not the only enterprise to benefit. Robotic reconnaissance, which by necessity must precede the dispatch of humans, has been ongoing for nearly 50 years. In that time, all the simple things have been done. Future missions to the planets and their moons will be more ambitious than anything yet tried.

As one example, imagine what our future robotic travels around Saturn might be like. The Saturn planetary system includes Titan, a cold Mercury-sized moon with a dense, organic-laden, hazy atmosphere and a strangely Earth-like, variegated surface sculptured by winds and hydrocarbon rains. It also includes Enceladus, a moon one-tenth the size of Titan, whose jets of water vapor and fine icy particles extend thousands of miles into space and may very likely erupt from organic-rich liquid water reservoirs just below its surface — making this satellite arguably the most promising target we have available to us for astrobiological investigation.

A scientifically comprehensive mission to this part of the solar system, using Ares and a Cassini-like trajectory to Saturn, could easily include several exploratory vehicles. One would be a Saturn orbiter far more capable than Cassini. This vehicle, in turn, would be large enough to carry and deliver a fully equipped balloon-borne scientific payload to float through the atmosphere of Titan and study its surface up close, and an Enceladus lander with equipment that could determine the moon's physical properties and ascertain whether or not pre-biotic chemistry, and perhaps life, has arisen there.

In other words, robotic exploration, and the insights that will be gained from it into the character, development and evolution of planetary bodies and even life itself, will be taken to new heights and, in turn, pave the way for the eventual arrival of humans throughout the solar system. Anyone up for an extreme excursion to the Enceladus Interplanetary Geyser Park?

All told, the subtext is invigorating and unmistakable: Humanity's future need not be confined to mere survival on our home planet. Other worlds beckon, we know how to reach them and we will once more be outward bound.

And we will not be alone. China, India and Russia, all eager to be or remain prominent players on the world stage, have independent plans to stride the lunar surface. And Australia, Canada, Japan and the member nations of the European Space Agency will be pooling their resources with us in the return to the Moon — a circumstance that will bring the cost of the effort to any one nation within reason.

THIS won't be a space race so much as a global exodus undertaken by an international community. And peaceful cooperation among nations, as a tangible means to build strong lasting international partnerships and defuse tensions and conflicts in the future, will be a welcome result.

In hindsight, maybe the pace of progress was predictable. Humans first explored Antarctica in the early 20th century. Decades passed before we had the technology that would allow us to establish a permanent presence. History will indicate the same for our interplanetary forays. Our initial "small step for a man" on the Moon took place in 1969. A half-century later, we will be there anew, to live and work.

To reach that future will require two critical ingredients: adequate financing and a long-term cross-administration commitment that supports steady, uninterrupted progress. Our first reach for the Moon took us from President Kennedy's spoken words to the lunar surface in little over eight years under a budget profile that saw peaks in annual NASA budget of more than $30 billion in current dollars — a shocking number by today's standards and a good measure of how important we then considered the endeavor.

While sustained budgets of that magnitude are out of the question today, what is not out of the question is our ability to pay to keep the goal front and center. We are now spending in Iraq, in a single month, $9 billion — more than half the annual budget NASA needs to stay on course.

Forty-five years ago today, John Glenn Jr. became the first American to venture into orbit around the Earth. Just 9 years old, I knew at that moment that the future would be big and wide, and that I might go places no one had ever been before.

There could be no better way today to encourage an equally optimistic belief in the future than to embark on an odyssey that presents tremendous challenges, demands discipline and rigor, requires decades-long focus, inspires international cooperation, promotes lasting peace, improves life for all and paints a stirring vision of an expanded human presence beyond the Earth. There could be no better way to say: the future is boundless, and it belongs to us.

Bipartisan Coalition Pushes For Education Reform (Politico)

By Andrew Glass

Politico, February 20, 2007

Business and civic leaders, worried about the poor preparation U.S. public schools are giving students to compete in the 21st century's global economy, have forged a bipartisan coalition to press for broad education reforms. Some of the first fruits of their new partnership are scheduled to be shown on Feb. 28, when the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Center for American Progress plan to unveil their joint platform for change. The project has been in the works since last April.

Their common initiative comes in the wake of a nationwide poll the chamber conducted on how the business community assesses the American education system. In response to one key question, 87 percent of the 571 business organizations that answered the online survey said the current No Child Left Behind requirements should extend all the way through high school.

To qualify for federal subsidies, the law, enacted in 2001, requires public schools to annually measure the reading and math skill levels of students in grades three through eight and at least once in high school.

"It absolutely shocked me when I got those results back," said Jacque Johnson, executive director of education and workforce development at the chamber. "They revealed that there's wide support out there for taking action. There's a pre-election window that's open to extend the provisions with a target date for action in May or June, but that window is likely to close next year if nothing is done."

On Feb. 13, a "Commission on No Child Left Behind," sponsored by the Aspen Institute, released its own blueprint for what Congress should do. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings said that report, in laying out needed adjustments, reflects "the broad, bipartisan commitment to improving our nation's schools that was behind" the original legislation.

"It was a good optic," Johnson said of the commission's news conference, which Spellings attended. All four major congressional players were there, which Johnson took to be a positive sign. They are Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee; and their respective ranking members, Sen. Michael B. Enzi, R-Wyo., and Rep. Buck McKeon, R-Calif.

"The key people on the Hill want it (the reauthorization) to be bipartisan," Johnson added.

For next week's launch of the education reform initiative, the chamber and the center are presenting their top guns: Thomas J. Donohue, the chamber's veteran president and CEO, and John D. Podesta, the center's president and CEO who was former President Bill Clinton's chief of staff. In addition to releasing the reform proposals, the two groups plan to grade all 50 state education programs, plus that of the District of Columbia, from kindergarten through 12th grade. The idea is to gauge how well today's students are being prepared for tomorrow's jobs.

"We will not rank them," Johnson said, referring to the analysis, which is called "Leaders and Laggards: A State-by-State Report Card on Educational Effectiveness." Johnson said the "report card" would cover nine specific areas, including "academic achievement, the rigor of its academic standards, post-secondary workforce readiness and, somewhat uniquely, a business-oriented look at 'return on investment.' "

Frederick M. Hess, director of education policy studies at the conservative-leaning American Enterprise Institute, acted as a third partner in preparing the analysis. In 2004, he published "Common Sense School Reform" (Palgrave MacMillan). His book begins: "School reform is the province of utopians, apologists, and well-intended practitioners who inhabit a cloistered world where conviction long ago displaced competence."

"My views haven't changed in the last three years," said Hess, who holds a doctorate in government from Harvard.

He'll be joined in a panel discussion on Feb. 28 by Cynthia G. Brown, director of education policy for the Podesta-led center, and Ulrich Boser, a contributing editor at U.S. News and World Report. Arthur J. Rothkopf, a senior vice president at the chamber who was President George H.W. Bush's deputy secretary of transportation, will moderate the discussion; he recently retired as president of Lafayette College in Easton, Pa.

What Can Schools Do? (USAT)

By Charles C. Haynes And Marvin W. Berkowitz

USA Today, February 20, 2007

After the endless headlines involving corrupt politicians, corporate cheats, doped-up sports stars and Internet predators, you might think that the American people would be demanding more character education in schools.

Think again.

"Good character," like the weather, gets a lot of talk — but too little action. We bemoan the loss of integrity and lack of responsibility in American public life. We decry the numbing statistics about teenage substance abuse, sexual promiscuity and gang activity. We wring our hands over surveys that report widespread cheating in schools and colleges. And then we move on to more important things.

Test scores, for example.

That's right: Standardized test results seem to trump everything else in education these days. No matter how many warning bells are sounded about the crisis of character in our society and despite the long-standing understanding that education is for the whole child, all we want to hear is how each school did on the exam.

Reading and math are important, but if we care about our kids (and our future) shouldn't we be paying more attention to the kinds of human beings who do the math and read the books?

"To educate a person in mind and not in morals," said Theodore Roosevelt, "is to educate a menace to society."

Fortunately, taking academics and character seriously in schools isn't an either/or proposition. Done well, character development enhances academic performance. Just ask Kristen Pelster, principal of Ridgewood Middle School, a rural/suburban school of about 503 students (42% of them economically disadvantaged) in Arnold, Mo.

When Pelster arrived as assistant principal six years ago, Ridgewood had all the marks of the proverbial "failing school": high absenteeism, low academic achievement and a constant stream of discipline problems. Located in a poor community plagued by inadequate housing and meth labs, the school had graffiti on the walls, profanity echoing in the halls and a rusty chain fence surrounding it. It could have been the movie set for Blackboard Jungle.

Working as a team, Pelster and then-Principal Tim Crutchley, who was also new, made a commitment to transform Ridgewood. First, they diagnosed the problem: Students didn't feel as though anyone cared about them or the school.

Then they articulated a vision for "a school where there is caring, a sense of belonging and academic achievement."

DOJ_NMG_0133675

Facing angry parents and a dispirited staff, Crutchley and Pelster knew they had much convincing to do. When they first arrived at Ridgewood, dozens of parents had requested that their children be moved to another school. Step One was to clean up the physical environment (the rusty fence was the first thing to go).

Initially, "caring" was a lot like "tough love." Crutchley and Pelster raised the bar on attendance, often going to truant students' homes to bring them to school. They established a "failure is not an option" program that prohibited the giving of zeros for missing work. Students had to make up missing homework during lunch hour. Teachers were required to integrate character education into academic lessons and behavior management.

By the end of the first year, the two leaders had won over a core team of teachers, critical support that, with the help of parents and members of the community, let the school progress.

The Ridgewood activists learned early on that "character education" is far more than slogans or quick-fix lessons about a word of the week. To be effective, character education must become integral to the daily actions of everyone in the school community.

It starts with the faculty. Early in the process, Crutchley and Pelster drove out teachers who didn't show concern for students and recruited teachers who did.

They allocated resources to provide staff development. This modest investment in teacher training — a few thousand dollars — constituted almost the entire cost to implement their plan.

Effective character education is not an add-on, but instead uses "teachable moments" in every classroom. Seventh-grade teacher Kacie Heiken, for example, has her students write and illustrate fairy tales that have a positive moral lesson. The students go to elementary schools and read their stories to classes before donating the books to a local children's hospital.

In American history classes, students study veterans, war and military service, culminating in a school-wide celebration of Veterans Day that includes breakfast and a patriotic slide show for local veterans and their families.

Science students recently collaborated with a local church group to build a nature trail.

Ridgewood's effort extends beyond the curriculum. For half an hour each day, students meet with an adult mentor in small family-like advisory groups. "The advisory helps form strong relationships between staff and student and among students. It creates a sense of being more of a family than an institution," Crutchley says.

But character education at Ridgewood isn't solely, or even predominantly, a top-down process. Daily class meetings include ethics discussions led by students. A one-semester course in "teen leadership" prepares students to take the lead in implementing an honor code and dealing with problems such as bullying.

Parents also play a key role. After all, they have primary responsibility for the moral development of their kids. While some parents have abdicated this responsibility, most want schools to reinforce and model the moral values taught at home. Many Ridgewood parents now volunteer at the school, and attendance at parent conferences has risen from 44.5% in 2000 to 75% in 2005.

Today, Crutchley is assistant superintendent of the district and Pelster, now principal, presides over a transformed Ridgewood.

Academic performance is up, disciplinary referrals are down by more than 70%, and the student failure rate has dropped to zero. Attendance has also improved, with the formerly daily home visits for truant students now down to four or five per year.

The rusty fence and graffiti are long gone, replaced by displays of student classwork and high expectations: Ridgewood has been on Missouri's list of Top Ten Most Improved Schools for four of the past five years.

In October, Ridgewood was one of 10 schools and districts in the nation to be recognized as a 2006 National School of Character by the Character Education Partnership.

Ridgewood's turnaround may be unusual, but it is not unique. "Schools of Character," schools that are implementing a comprehensive plan for character education, can be found in school districts across the USA. No study has yet been done on how many schools are providing character education, but the need is clear and the interest is understandably immense.

Ridgewood is a remarkable case study, but the success of character education is well-documented. It works.

Victor Battistich of the University of Missouri-St. Louis, examined all the scientific research of the past 15 years and concluded that "comprehensive, high-quality character education" can prevent a wide range of problems, including "aggressive and antisocial behaviors, drug use, precocious sexual activity, criminal activities, academic underachievement and school failure."

So why aren't all schools doing it? In the early history of public education, developing good character was seen as an essential part of preparing people for citizenship in a democratic society. But in the latter part of the 20th century, many public schools moved away from the traditional emphasis on character and citizenship as American society grew more complex and diverse.

Today, character education is making a comeback. Thirty-one states mandate or encourage character education by statute. While pronouncements by legislatures don't necessarily translate into quality character education programs, it's a start.

Much is at stake in getting this right. At this critical moment in America's history, we need far more than higher math and reading scores. We need citizens who have the strength of character to uphold democratic freedom in the face of unprecedented challenges at home and abroad.

"Only a virtuous people are capable of freedom," is the familiar aphorism from Benjamin Franklin. Less well-known, but worth recalling, is the warning in the sentence that follows: "As nations become corrupt and vicious, they have more need of masters."

McCain: Rumsfeld Was One Of The Worst (AP)

By Bruce Smith, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 20, 2007

Republican presidential candidate John McCain said Monday the war in Iraq has been mismanaged for years and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst in history.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," the Arizona senator told an overflow crowd of more than 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C. "The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

McCain, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, complained that Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," McCain said to applause.

The comments were in sharp contrast to McCain's statement when Rumsfeld resigned in November, and failed to address the reality that President Bush is the commander in chief.

"While Secretary Rumsfeld and I have had our differences, he deserves Americans' respect and gratitude for his many years of public service," McCain said last year when Rumsfeld stepped down.

On a two-day campaign swing in South Carolina, McCain fielded questions from the crowd for more than an hour and said the United States can succeed in Iraq with additional troops and a new strategy. McCain has been a strong proponent of using more troops and favors Bush's increase of some 21,500 U.S. forces in the nearly four-year-old war.

"I have been saying for 3 1/2 years that we would be in this sad situation and this critical situation we are in today," he said.

McCain's bid for president was sidetracked in South Carolina in 2000 after a victory in New Hampshire. George W. Bush won the primary here and went on to win the nomination and White House.

"In life, one of the worst things you can do is hold a grudge," he said. "I felt the important thing for me to do with my life was to move forward after we lost our race. You have seen other people who have lost who mire themselves in bitterness and self pity. That's not what my life is all about."

Some in the crowd were Bush supporters who have not yet decided on a 2008 candidate.

"It's too early to say," said Paul Baker, a retiree from Niagara Falls, N.Y., who has lived in South Carolina about four years. "I'm just going to wait it out and see what happens."

Why John McCain (WSJ)

By Phil Gramm

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Four years ago I decided to quit while I was ahead and concluded my 24-year political career. When I left the Senate, I also left the public policy debate and talking-head role to those actually in the arena. However, because I believe that the 2008 presidential election will be the most important election since 1980, I have decided to rejoin the national debate and exercise my right as a private citizen to express a strongly held opinion about who should be elected, and why.

When the poet Edwin Markham wrote "Lincoln, the Man of the People," he spoke of the gathering crisis and the man sent to "meet the mortal need." For Markham, the gathering crisis was the great Civil War, and the man sent to meet the mortal need was Abraham Lincoln.

Today's mortal need is for a leader who trusts our people enough to tell them the truth about the festering domestic problems that have been swept under the rug for a quarter-century. We need a president who can face up to these problems even as he leads an increasingly reluctant country in a war against a dangerous enemy that will follow us home from any battlefield on which we are defeated.

Where is such a leader to be found? American history gives us a clue where to look: When the times have required great leaders in the past, they seem to have been there all the while, just waiting to be called. John Adams wrote in his diary in 1774 that "We have not Men, fit for the Times. We are deficient in Genius, in Education, in Travel, in Fortune -- in every Thing. I feel unutterable Anxiety."

Yet, at that very moment, the greatest assemblage of leadership the world has ever known was emerging all around him. We seem, for some reason, to be able to see greatness only in the rearview mirror.

I believe the man we need to meet the mortal need today is here. He is experienced, but has not lost his common sense or his ability to be outraged. His conservatism is not the result of a studied philosophy, but of common sense and personal observation. His name is John McCain. He might not be the right president for all times, but he is the right president for these times.

Today we have an unnecessary budget deficit, the result of wanton waste and dishonesty. John McCain has been a lonely but clarion voice on this issue: "Bills that perpetuate wasteful spending should be vetoed," he says. "Not some of them, all of them. The numbers should shock us; indifference to them should shame us."

This is not a concern he discovered when he decided to run for president. I first heard him say these things when we served together in the House many years ago. To ask if he would really take on the spending establishment that runs Congress is to ask if water will wet, if fire will burn. If you want to end the spending spree in Washington, he is your man.

John McCain understands instinctively that just as "in war, there is no substitute for victory, in peace, there is no substitute for growth." He believes that "the strength of our economy promotes freedom not just at home but in every distant corner of our planet. End growth in America and the lights start to go out all over the world."

The success of the Reagan program taught Sen. McCain that growth requires responsible, limited government and ever-expanding freedom. As he has said, "The answer to deficits is not to raise taxes or repeal the [Bush] tax cuts but to restrain our spending habit. If the federal government can not be funded by current revenues then we must reduce its size."

Others tell us that pigs have wings and we can have it all: more spending, more government, lower taxes and more freedom. John McCain's says that "tax cuts work best when accompanied by lower spending." Yes, he understands that cutting taxes creates the incentive to work, save and invest; and that sometimes you have to cut taxes first to get the economy going and then control spending. But in his common-sense view, as in the immutable laws that govern our world, you can't let government spend it and let the taxpayer keep it for very long. Nothing endangers the Bush tax cuts today as much as the spending orgy that the very proponents of those tax cuts allowed to occur.

Sen. McCain stands tall, and often alone, in his support for free trade against special interests and against the politicians who would risk destroying our economy to win an election. His view is straightforward and ratified by all our national experience: "Free trade is the key to economic growth, and a key to U.S. economic success. We need to stand up for free trade with no ifs, ands or buts about it. We let free trade and globalization be politicized at our own peril."

But he is not blind or callous to the real costs imposed on the few as trade and globalization create prosperity for the many. In his view, "We must remain committed to education, retraining and help for displaced workers, all the while reminding ourselves that our ability to change is a great strength of our nation." But, he adds, "We cannot let fear and the appeals of protectionism lead us backwards."

John McCain is one of the few politicians in America who consistently levels with us about the mounting insolvency of Social Security and Medicare. "We have made promises that we cannot keep. Some day the government will be forced to make dramatic cuts in these programs, or crippling increases in taxes on workers or both." For Sen. McCain, salvaging the social safety net and saving the economy means making the hard choices now to right the current system for those already in it, and building a new system for future workers based on real investments, not empty promises.

Being honest about Social Security and Medicare is a necessary but not sufficient condition for fixing a broken system. Think for a moment about all the possible candidates running for president next year, and then ask yourself this question: Who else has shown any ability to reach across the party divide and build a bipartisan consensus? Who else could lead worried Americans and shame a reluctant Congress into action? Who else would stay on course with political flak exploding all around him, and his political life hanging in the balance? The easy answer is -- no one but John McCain.

Which candidate is best equipped to lead an America at war, with battle lines raging in far away places and on Main Street, where you live? It is in meeting this mortal need more than any other that John McCain stands head and shoulders above the alternatives. Only he has the life experience to know what is really entailed in sending young men and women into combat. With a son at Annapolis and a son in the Marine Corps, he still has plenty of "skin in the game." His life experience and intimate knowledge of defense and foreign policy give Sen. McCain moral authority.

In a democracy, power is useless unless you can use it; what candidate would have more credibility in using power and rallying public support for a long and difficult struggle? Who would be more effective than John McCain in using American military power in its highest and best use -- the deterrence of adversaries? A president -- who knows war and has the authority to unite our people to make war when we must -- can thwart enemies, unite friends and win peace. John McCain would be that president.

Greatness seems to visit those who know themselves, what they believe in and why. Abraham Lincoln knew those things. The savior of the union was a protectionist and a proponent of big government projects -- and in the 1850s or 1870s he might have made an average or poor president. But in 1860, Lincoln was the right man for that moment. He was on a mission to save the union, and he did.

The great leader of my lifetime was Ronald Reagan. He knew what he believed in and what he needed to do in 1980, and he meant to do it. He didn't run for the glory of being president; he ran to change America and the world. He didn't just want to hold the office; he wanted to use it.

Over the years there have been issues where I have differed with Sen. McCain. But as I look at the gathering storm that will challenge the next president and imperil our country, not one of those issues is relevant to the task ahead. The presidency is a terrible thing to waste. I believe that if the American people make him president, John McCain won't waste it.

In Limbo In Washington, McCain Comes Alive In Iowa (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Campaigning for Conservatives, He Plays Up Fiscal Discipline

DAVENPORT, Iowa, Feb. 18 -- Former Texas senator Phil Gramm was wrapping up his introduction in Des Moines on Saturday morning when a white-haired man wearing gray slacks and a big, brown leather jacket ambled up the aisle and stopped at the side of the stage, the curl of a smile on his lips.

It was Sen. John McCain.

Back in Washington, McCain has shown little of the exuberance of the Republican outsider who challenged George W. Bush for the GOP presidential nomination in 2000. Now virtually hostage to the success of Bush's Iraq war policy, which he has defended and criticized, McCain has appeared subdued, even dour.

In interviews, the Arizona Republican has spoken almost in monotone, defending his support for sending more troops into battle in Iraq. On NBC's "Meet the Press" recently, his body language conveyed distinct discomfort with the constant attention he receives about the war's potential impact on his presidential aspirations.

But as he campaigned across Iowa this weekend, there were flashes of the old McCain. During town hall meetings in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport, he staunchly defended his position on the war, decried a Republican Party that he said has lost its way and punctuated question-and-answer sessions with his particular brand of humor.

"I had my glass of ethanol this morning, and I'm feeling good," he said to ripples of laughter as he delivered his opening remarks to a jampacked audience in a Des Moines hotel ballroom. "I hope you did, too. Tastes good."

When a man said he was serving in the Marines in Vietnam around the time McCain was being held in a North Vietnamese prison camp, the senator interjected, "Why didn't you come get me?"

As the audience broke into laughter, the man responded, "Marines always love to rescue the Navy when they get the chance."

"That's what you get for being a smart [expletive]," McCain said of being turned into the butt of the joke.

A young man in Davenport said pointedly: "You ditched Iowa in 2000. Why should we support you?" The candidate responded, to peals of laughter: "You know, we should never let these young punks in. No respect. You remind me of my own kids."

DOJ_NMG_0133680

The ethanol joke was not lost on anyone, either. When he ran for president eight years ago, McCain skipped the Iowa caucuses, saying he did not have the resources to compete both there and in New Hampshire. But many Republicans suspected that his opposition to ethanol subsidies, vital to the Iowa economy, influenced his decision to stay out of the state.

McCain lost that first race for president after a bitter fight with Bush, who proved more adept at appealing to the Republican base. Now back for a second try for the GOP nomination, support for ethanol -- he says it is economically justifiable now that oil prices have risen -- is just one of a number of things he has been willing to swallow to try to win.

The McCain team is focused on building an infrastructure of financial and political support second to none in the GOP field. The candidate himself, whose formal announcement will come next month, is determined to make himself acceptable to Republicans who spurned him the last time around.

McCain's path to the nomination is made less difficult by the absence of a top-tier candidate with the ability to consolidate the conservative base of the party. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is far more liberal on social issues than McCain is, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney is struggling to explain his conversion from a social moderate in the 1990s to an ardent conservative now that he is running for president.

McCain advisers believe he can change attitudes among many culturally conservative voters and win the nomination as the favorite of the GOP establishment. On what was McCain's first campaign swing through Iowa since setting up his presidential campaign committee, the differences between 2000 and today were evident.

Seeking the 2000 nomination, McCain ran as a maverick and a reformer, an appeal that played especially well with independent voters. This time he presents himself as the candidate who can restore core principles to the Republican Party, which he says became intoxicated by power before losing its congressional majorities in the 2006 midterm elections.

His message this time is more overtly conservative, and his campaign identifies more openly with the socially conservative wing of the party. McCain and his advisers stress his quarter-century record of support for antiabortion legislation, and when it came time for an opening prayer on Saturday morning, McCain's Iowa chairman, David Roederer, made sure the audience knew that the campaign's Maxine Sieleman, who hosts a daily Christian radio show that airs throughout the state, is "one of Iowa's leading social conservatives."

McCain still has issues with conservative Republicans over immigration and a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, and he supports stem cell research. Some conservatives will have to be convinced that the man who trashed Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson eight years ago is truly one of them now, although he has patched up with Falwell.

A longtime scourge of pork-barrel spending and a proponent of fiscal discipline, McCain is well positioned on an issue that has gained more currency among conservative Republicans because of the mushrooming spending during Bush's presidency. "I'll veto every pork-barrel bill that comes across my desk, and I'll make the people famous who put it in," he said in Cedar Rapids. "I promise you."

Across Iowa on Saturday, Gramm, who unsuccessfully sought the GOP nomination in 1996 but remains a symbol of fiscal conservatism within the party, helped reinforce that message. "We need a president who will stop the spending spree, balance the budget and make the Bush tax cuts permanent -- and that's what John McCain will do," he said.

McCain's hopes for winning the White House may be tied directly to Iraq. A majority of Republicans agree with Bush's plan to add combat troops there, and neither Giuliani nor Romney has staked out a position different from McCain's or the president's on the preeminent issue facing the country. But as the Senate's leading proponent of the Bush plan, McCain has put himself at odds with a majority of the American people.

"The one thing I'm sure of is, next January when the Iowa caucuses take place, it will be a very different scenario in Iraq than now," he told reporters aboard his chartered plane as he flew between Cedar Rapids and Davenport on Saturday. "So if we're starting to show success, then obviously the fact that I supported this is good. If it continues to deteriorate . . . ." He trailed off. No one needed him to finish the sentence.

When a reporter suggested that his fate ultimately may not be in his hands, McCain replied: "Yep. That's why I can't worry about it and I don't worry about it. There's nothing I can do about it."

McCain Runs A Different Race (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 19, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa -- The jokes were familiar. So was the casual banter with voters who showed up at town hall meetings to meet the candidate. But the contrast this weekend was unmistakable: Sen. John McCain is a different man running in a vastly different moment than the last time he sought the presidency.

In 2000, McCain lost the Republican presidential nomination but established himself as perhaps the most arresting politician of his generation with a rollicking campaign style that mingled startling candor with towel-snapping humor and nearly inexhaustible high spirits.

This weekend in Iowa, McCain's old ebullience was replaced by a mood that seemed to fluctuate between sober and downright morose as he and the voters he met kept returning to a single topic: Iraq.

Nor was the weekend an exception. In recent interviews, McCain has similarly projected a grim and sometimes ashen aura while grappling with a war debate that for now is permeating his candidacy.

McCain made three stops across the Hawkeye State on Saturday while most of his colleagues were back in Washington taking up an unsuccessful motion to continue debate on the resolution on the Iraq troop "surge."

In a jam-packed conference room at the Hotel Fort Des Moines, McCain was met with nine consecutive questions that were a steady barrage of opinions, observations and pleas for action on Iraq and the wider threat of terrorism. McCain expected to discuss a wider range of issues. He said he was skipping glancingly over the Republican hot-button of immigration because he expected it to come up during the questioning. It didn't.

When it comes to the war, the same candor that energized supporters in 2000 is now virtually assured to leave them depressed. Picking up the mantra from his 2000 campaign, the Arizonan said he'd offer "a little straight talk" about Iraq.

"If we fail, I don't know what the other options are," he acknowledged. "I can give you lots of other options, but I'm not sure they would have the support of the American people."

Pressed by one veteran of the conflict why the success stories in Iraq were not being told back home, McCain acknowledged that there had been progress in some parts of the country. "Having said that," McCain was quick to add, "if Baghdad is on the verge of chaos, Anbar Province doesn't matter."

When Marty Baddeloo of West Des Moines demanded to know the "cost of being successful in Iraq ... rounded out to the nearest $25 billion," McCain replied with the obvious: "You reflect the frustrations many Americans feel," he said.

"In a few months," McCain predicted, "we'll know if the Iraqi government is doing the things we want them to do." But, he admitted, "I don't know how soon we're going to know militarily" if the surge is working.

Another man pressed McCain on what his "Plan B" was in case the additional U.S. troops into Iraq failed to stem the violence. "I promise," McCain responded, "I think about it every day."

It showed. Dressed casually in a brown leather bomber jacket, sweater and gray slacks, McCain deployed his usual mix of corny cracks and jocular repartee with audience members. But the levity was no match for the deeply serious questions that McCain found himself on the receiving end of at his first stop of the day in Des Moines.

Invoking the name of a local National Guardswoman who recently perished in a helicopter crash in Iraq, one Vietnam veteran in the audience put it plainly: "Iowans are dying, too."

Even a man who complained about the high price of his drug prescription prefaced his remarks by noting that he'd lost a grandson in Iraq. At this, McCain lowered his head and closed his eyes tightly.

As Sen. Phil Gramm, the former Texas senator and one-time presidential aspirant reminded each stop along the way in his introduction, McCain has "a son at Annapolis and a son in the Marine Corps."

For the McCain family, in other words, the war is no distant thing. So when the veteran, son of a veteran and father of a veteran to be (Jimmy, the Marine, is slated to deploy to Anbar Province this summer) said that "presidents don't lose wars, political parties don't lose wars, nations lose wars," he was trying to elevate the discussion above politics. But it's difficult to see how McCain's presidential aspirations won't be tied to a conflict that he's linked so closely within the public mind.

For a Republican base that still supports their commander in chief, McCain's outspoken and unyielding support for an aggressive posture in Iraq, the cardinal issue of the day, has the potential to heal old wounds left from his 2000 primary battle against George W. Bush and his conservative allies. But the same views could also torpedo his hopes to win the support of a larger electorate fed up with the continued loss of blood and treasure abroad.

Asked at a news conference following the Des Moines event about whether his support for Bush's plan would help alleviate suspicion from the conservatives who dominate his party's nominating process, McCain wouldn't talk about the politics of the war. "I've said all along that I won't be concerned if it helps me or hurts me with anyone." Iraq, McCain said, "transcends any political ambition I may have."

The next two stops following Des Moines, at equally full banquet rooms in Cedar Rapids and then here along the Mississippi River, brought a broader range of questions, including many about domestic issues. Still, the reality of a war time election continued to loom.

"We're in a very difficult time, a very difficult time in our nation's history and difficult time in other parts of the world, too," McCain intoned.

Trying to add an optimistic note, however, McCain promised that "there is not a single problem that this great nation can't overcome."

And, McCain offered, he could lead the way in such a challenging year. Indeed it took the question of a 7-year-old to bring the candidate closest to talking about the impact of Iraq on his campaign.

"I want to know why you want to be our president," asked Colin, a first-grader doing a serviceable impersonation of Roger Mudd.

Because, McCain replied in the same sober tones he'd sounded all day, "I believe my life has prepared me with the experience and knowledge and vision to lead this country in very difficult times."

Romney Supports 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (WP)

By John Solomon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R), who once advocated allowing gays to serve openly in the military, said yesterday that he does not think the Pentagon should change its "don't ask, don't tell" policy in the midst of the Iraq war.

" 'Don't ask, don't tell' has worked well. We're in the middle of a conflict. Now is not the time for a change in that regard, and I don't have a policy posture as to allowing gays in the military to serve there openly," Romney, a presidential candidate, said on ABC's "This Week."

Romney also addressed his revised positions over the years on subjects key to social conservatives and discussed his Mormon faith. Both are issues that have emerged early in his presidential bid.

"I'm not running for pastor in chief. I'm running for commander in chief," he said, dismissing concerns that his faith might affect his policies by saying all religions share common values as "one family of humanity."

On other key issues, Romney said:

Â· He opposes discrimination against gays and lesbians but supports a federal amendment defining marriage as limited to a man and a woman. "Marriage is primarily an institution to help develop children. And children's development, I believe, is greatly enhanced by access to a mom and a dad," he said.

Â· President Bush's decision to increase the number of troops in Iraq is "the right thing to do."

Â· He believes that "abortion is taking human life." Although Romney ran for the Senate in 1994 as a pro-choice candidate, he said yesterday that the decision on whether abortions should be legal should be left to the states. "There are lots of things that are morally very difficult, and in some cases repugnant, that we let states decide," he said.

Romney's wife, Ann, joined him for the interview. She said she and her husband discussed, before he decided to run, whether the stress of a campaign might aggravate her multiple sclerosis.

"I clearly don't have enormous reserves of energy and I really do hit 'Empty' pretty quickly, and I've got to learn how to manage that," she said.

Romney Defends Position On Stem Cells (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson

DOJ_NMG_0133683

AP, February 20, 2007

Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney on Monday defended his opposition to most embryonic stem cell research despite its scientific promise to cure diseases like multiple sclerosis that afflicts his wife, Ann.

In an interview with The Associated Press, the former Massachusetts governor said he was confident that research on adult stem cells and the existing embryonic stem cell lines could eventually provide the medical answers.

"I believe that science is able to receive the stem cells necessary for research through means that don't represent a serious, moral problem," Romney said.

Scientists say embryonic stem cells hold the most promise and the research may eventually lead to treatment and perhaps cures for diseases such as Parkinson's and juvenile diabetes. Stem cells are created in the first days after conception, but some people such as social conservatives and President Bush oppose the research because days-old embryos — usually left over from fertility treatments — are destroyed in the effort to isolate the cells.

In August 2001, Bush restricted government funding to research using only the embryonic stem cell lines then in existence, groups of stem cells kept alive and propagating in lab dishes. Only about 21 of those lines are available for study, most created in ways that preclude use in humans.

Romney favors work on those lines and said if elected, he would increase funds for research of adult stem cells.

"It avoids all of the moral concerns and therefore presents scientific opportunity without moral dilemma," he said. "And I found no one to dispute the potential of such avenues of exploration that was able to convince me that these did not have merit."

Romney said his wife would play a prominent role in his campaign for president.

"Were she not healthy I would not have run ... " he told the AP. "She is able to manage her disease such that she does not overdo or cause herself physical problem. Were that not the case, we'd have made a different decision. We'd be in the sun somewhere."

Romney ran as a moderate in his unsuccessful bid for Senate in 1994, when he expressed support for abortion rights. He now opposes abortion, a shift that has caused consternation among some conservatives. During a campaign stop in Iowa, Romney said he did not know if the state's voters would support his recent switch on abortion.

"I respond to the questions as they arise. President Reagan was pro-choice as governor and became convinced he was wrong," he told the AP

Romney defended his recent decision to join the National Rifle Association, saying that he has always supported the 2nd Amendment and dismissing criticism that his membership amounts to political opportunism.

"I'm happy to support the NRA. They supported my campaign for governor and I clearly hope they support my campaign for president," he said.

Romney also defended his decision to vote for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Massachusetts Democratic presidential primary.

"We have an open primary where we can vote for people other than Bill Clinton and I voted against Bill Clinton," he said.

Romney has been criticized for voting in the primary, and for giving multiple justifications for his vote. Romney scoffed at the notion that he was giving rivaling justifications for his vote.

"I pulled a Democratic primary ballot, and voted for Paul Tsongas as opposed to Bill Clinton. There was no Republican contest of significance at that time, as I recall," he said.

During his campaign appearance, Romney chided national Democrats for suggesting diplomatic negotiations with Iran, calling it a country with "jihadist leadership" more bent on destruction than the Soviet Union.

"We think of the Soviet Union as being a nuclear superpower that we negotiated with but the Soviet Union was not suicidal, it was not genocidal," Romney told reporters in Sioux City on Monday. "They wanted to maintain their integrity and not ever suffer a nuclear attack. Iran has a different orientation. We have to recognize it as a jihadist leadership with (Iranian Pres. Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad."

The Talented Mr. Romney (WP)

By Richard Cohen

DOJ_NMG_0133684

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

I have been following the zigs and zags of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor and now Republican presidential candidate, watching him grow progressively less progressive, sort of making himself up as he goes along. As a result, I surf the Web with trepidation, bracing myself for the story that I fear might be coming: "Romney Says He Is Not Really a Mormon."

I joke, of course. But the way things are going, I would not be surprised if the possibility of a Romney religious conversion has gone from inconceivable to a focus group for, as they say, further study. After all, the same bloc of voters -- conservative Christians -- that once found Romney suspiciously liberal on abortion and gay rights does not much like his Mormonism, either. This nice touch of intolerance has got to worry Romney. In recent polls, something like one-third of all voters have said they would be less likely to vote for a Mormon candidate -- and the figure is a bit higher (39 percent) among Republicans. Iowa, where conservative Christians comprise about 37 percent of the GOP electorate, could be trouble.

What's an ambitious, square-jawed opportunist to do? He might do as he has done in the past and change his position. He once was nicely supportive of gay issues -- not marriage, but civil unions -- and of repealing the odious "don't ask, don't tell" provisions relating to military service. Romney once felt so strongly about gay rights that he even went to the left of Ted Kennedy in their 1994 senatorial battle. "The gay community needs more support from the Republican Party," Romney said in an interview that year. And in a letter written in 1994 to the Log Cabin Republicans, he looked forward to the day when gays and lesbians could serve "openly and honestly in our nation's military." That day will not come should he become president, he has said recently. Peering into the homophobic heart of GOP primary voters, Romney now thinks gays ought to stay in the closet. He has changed his mind.

Something similar happened on abortion. Where once Romney wanted it safe and legal, he now clearly just wants it illegal. This metamorphosis came as he studied the issue of embryonic stem cell research and had nothing to do, mind you, with his race for the Republican nomination. Okay, I too have evolved on certain aspects of the abortion issue -- late-term abortion, for instance -- but a total flip from always legal to always illegal (the clear message he's sending abortion foes) can have only one explanation: Potomac fever.

Romney is not the only Republican candidate to mothball principles for the campaign. Rudy Giuliani is now not as pro-choice as he used to be, and John McCain has hired the very mudslingers he once wanted to garrote. But Romney is in a class of his own. He used to have fairly reasonable positions on gun control. Within the past year, though, he joined the National Rifle Association -- an admission made under some duress Sunday to George Stephanopoulos on ABC's "This Week." In fact, to watch Romney on the show was to see a thoroughly counterfeit man. If he were a coin, a vending machine would spit him out.

Of course, I do not really expect Romney to renounce his religion since, among other things, it would cost him more votes than it would gain him. But I do suggest that his craven crawl toward the White House shows a man of obvious talents and experience who illustrates how broken our system is. Why should anyone have to tailor his beliefs to get past ideological bottlenecks in the early primary states? For Republicans, it's the religious right; for Democrats, it's economic pressure groups such as teachers unions. The rest of us can only stand by, helpless, waiting for extremists to pick a man or woman on the basis of issues that mean less to us -- not the war in Iraq, for instance, but gay civil unions.

If there is one thing to say for the system, though, it is that it subjects presidential candidates to a kind of torture. We learn early on which of them have principles, backbone and pride in themselves -- the sort of integrity we want in a president. Since all politicians, like lovers and mattress salesmen, lie a bit, we do not expect purity. But Romney has taken things too far. I don't know whether he has any respect for himself, but he sure as hell has none for us.

Obama Tests His Strength In The South (POLITICO)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 20, 2007

RICHMOND, Va. – At the annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner of the Democratic Party of Virginia on Saturday, the Hillary Clinton signs and bumper stickers were free, as were “I’m in to Win” buttons featuring the New York senator. But “Obama ’08

DOJ_NMG_0133685

Gear" was for sale – T-shirt, $20; button, $10; sign, $5. And he had a lot more takers than she did, suggesting he might be making early inroads in a tough region that once was Confederate soil.

Party officials say their previous record for the dinner was 1,400 seats. But after Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois was announced as the keynote speaker, sales ballooned and the party kept expanding the dinner until it had space for 3,200 at the Greater Richmond Convention Center.

A few hours before the dinner, Obama and Gov. Tim Kaine met reporters on the front porch of the Executive Mansion, which is tucked behind the Virginia Capitol and is the oldest continuously occupied governor's residence in the United States. Obama had campaigned for Kaine, who was now returning the favor by becoming the first governor outside of Obama's home state of Illinois to endorse his presidential candidacy.

Obama had just flown up from a rapturous reception in South Carolina, where the largest newspaper, The State, had made him the banner headline on the Saturday paper: " 'Let's get busy,' Obama urges Columbia crowd." South Carolina's primary is Jan. 29, 2008, putting it toward the front of the pack, just after caucuses in Iowa and Nevada and the primary in New Hampshire.

Virginia's primary is Feb. 12 and with big states like California contemplating moving theirs up to Feb. 5, the nominee could be decided before the Old Dominion chimes in. But Virginia, the 12th largest state, has been getting more Democratic with hordes of newcomers to Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads, although George W. Bush won the state by 8 points in 2000 and 9 points in 2004.

For the endorsement news conference, Kaine and Obama were accompanied by their wives, Anne Holton and Michelle Obama. All four graduated from Harvard Law School.

Suddenly standing next to the coolest kid in the class, Kaine said the next president will "have to reconnect our nation to the nations of the world in a very profound way," and he said Obama "has a very, very unique ability to do that" and would be "a president who will help us get into a politics … that's a lot more about results and about people" than about partisan advantage.

Then it was Obama's turn to speak to the 10 television cameras, from all parts of the commonwealth. "People have been noticing we've been attracting big crowds," he said. "I'd like to say it's just me. But I think I have come to represent, in the minds of some, turning a new page and getting beyond the slash-and-burn, very tactical politics that we've become accustomed to in Washington."

It was overcast and chilly. A few birds chirped. Bob Lewis of the Associated Press, wearing a big hat, asked the first question, noting this "historical moment" in a city that once was the capital of the Confederacy. Lewis asked what the endorsement means about Obama's viability in the South and about how things have changed.

"I have to confess that you may be more eloquent than I am on this point," Obama began. "I think you make a powerful point. Here we are in the heart of what was the Confederacy. For me to be able to stand here as an African-American reflects the enormous progress that this country has made and to some degree represents not the perfection of the Union, but a whole lot of progress in perfecting this Union – one more step that we have taken to live up to the essential creed that Virginia's first citizen, Thomas Jefferson, wrote about in the Declaration of Independence. It's humbling because, as I've said before, I'm standing on the shoulders of an awful lot of people who have done an awful lot of work."

Obama repeated a point he made on CBS's "60 Minutes" – that he won't blame skin color if he loses. "I'm also mindful," he said with Kaine at his side, "that ultimately the decision that voters across America make with respect to who will lead them in these difficult times is not going to be based on symbolism. It's going to be based on who can make sure that America's safe, who can make sure that health care is affordable and accessible, who can ensure that our children are being educated to compete in the world economy – issues that span region, and span race."

Two experts on Southern politics were quite bullish on Barack. Hastings Wyman, founder of the Southern Political Report, said that while Clinton retains her hold on the African-American establishment, which is crucial in Southern primaries, Obama has the most appeal among younger African-Americans. "If public opinion in the black community swings sharply toward him, the establishment will follow," Wyman said. "He has not done that so far, however."

Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, says his students "are nuts about" Obama and that among Democratic students, "He's the only one they're interested in. He's like Reagan or Kennedy, with an ability to connect with people individually in a large group. Hillary? Get real. She doesn't have that. Whatever 'it' is, he has it."

DOJ_NMG_0133686

So can we expect to see “Rebels for Obama” bumper stickers on pickup trucks? Don’t count on it, but Obama told the press gathered not far from Monument Avenue, which is lined with tributes to Confederate generals: “Part of my campaign, I hope, is to remind people of the capacity for this nation to change, and to evolve.”

Obama Memoir Left Out Credits For Activism, Critics Say (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, February 19, 2007

The drama began with a tiny ad in a local newspaper — a notice that asbestos was about to be removed from the management office at Altgeld Gardens, the all-black public housing complex where young Barack Obama worked as a community organizer.

"You think it's in our apartments?" a worried mother asked.

"I don't know," Obama replied. "But we can find out."

What followed, Obama says in a memoir, was a life-altering experience, an early taste of his ability to motivate the powerless and work the levers of government. As the 24-year-old mentor to public housing residents, Obama says he initiated and led efforts that thrust Altgeld's asbestos problem into the headlines, pushing city officials to call hearings and a reluctant housing authority to start a cleanup.

But others tell the story much differently.

They say Obama did not play the singular role in the asbestos episode that he portrays in the best-selling memoir, "Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance." Credit for pushing officials to deal with the cancer-causing substance, according to interviews and news accounts from that period, also goes to a well-known, pre-existing group at Altgeld Gardens and to a local newspaper called the Chicago Reporter. Obama does not mention either one in his book.

"Just because someone writes it doesn't make it true," said Hazel Johnson, a longtime Altgeld resident who worked with Obama on the asbestos campaign, and who began pushing for a variety of environmental cleanups years before he arrived.

U.S. Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.) said it was Johnson's work, as well as asbestos testing conducted by the Chicago Reporter, that sparked the interest of Chicago officials and prompted Rush, who at the time was a City Council member, to launch an inquiry. While he has not read Obama's memoir, Rush, who has been a political rival of Obama's in recent years, said Johnson's role was so prominent that he was "offended" by anyone telling the Altgeld story without including her.

"Was [Obama] involved in stuff? Absolutely," said Robert Ginsburg, an activist who worked in Altgeld with Johnson and Obama. "But there was stuff happening before him, and after him."

No one disputes that Obama was active in organizing Altgeld residents. Several who worked directly with him say that he was the most effective organizer they had seen — a surprise, given his youth. "He was our motivator" said Callie Smith, now 50, who was active in Obama's group. "We did all the work, but he was our inspiration."

The varying accounts of what occurred 20 years ago are noteworthy because Obama, now a freshman U.S. senator, has begun a campaign for the White House after three years on the national stage.

Beyond Illinois, where Obama was a state legislator, much of what the public knows about the Chicago Democrat comes from his two best-selling books. On the campaign trail, he has said that through the books he has revealed more of himself to the public than has any other candidate. They provide "insights into how I think and how I feel about the issues facing America," he told reporters this month, according to an account in the Wall Street Journal. Many people coming to his rallies bring copies.

But "Dreams From My Father," the first of Obama's books, is not a historical account. In it, Obama uses literary techniques that are rarely found in political memoirs.

Dialogue in the memoir is an "approximation of what was actually said or relayed to me," Obama wrote in its introduction. For the sake of compression, he wrote, some characters are "composites of people I've known, and some events appear out of precise chronology." Most names in the book were changed for the sake of privacy, he wrote.

And while most memoirs place their authors at the center of events, critics of "Dreams From My Father" say it is unfair in omitting the others who were responsible for the successes of the asbestos campaign, an event that Obama portrays as central to his maturation as a political leader. For example, Johnson is not mentioned, and no character in the book appears to resemble her, even though she was already a prominent Altgeld activist and her presence in the anti-asbestos effort is confirmed by interviews and news accounts at the time.

An Obama spokesman said that the memoir was never intended to be a complete account of Altgeld or an attempt to portray Obama as a hero, but merely the recollections of one activist. Published in 1994 and re-released in 2004, the book primarily tracks Obama's journey to racial identity as the child of a black, Kenyan father and a white mother from Kansas.

"This is making a mountain out of flat land," said Robert Gibbs, the Obama spokesman, referring to inquiries from The Times. "The book isn't a history of social efforts to help the area. It was about what he was involved in."

Built in the 1940s to house black industrial workers, Altgeld Gardens has long been called a "toxic doughnut." The community is surrounded by a massive landfill, a paint factory, an odor-emitting sewage plant and the polluted Calumet River.

Obama arrived at Altgeld soon after graduating from Columbia University in 1983. He had taken a job with a small group called the Developing Communities Project, which aimed to help people in the wake of plant closures and other economic troubles.

Obama and his group helped persuade the city to open a job center. Working with parents at a local school, he tried to improve basic services at the housing project: repairing the toilets, the windows, the heating system.

Then, he writes, the asbestos threat appeared.

As detailed in the memoir, Obama's group was tipped off to the problem when a woman named "Sadie" noticed a classified ad that solicited bids to remove asbestos from the Altgeld management office.

"I don't know if it means anything," says "Sadie" in the book, "but I wanted to see what you thought."

Obama encouraged the group to ask the on-site manager about the asbestos. But they were fearful of confronting authority, Obama wrote, and unsure how to respond when their first inquiry produced no answers.

"What do we do now?" Obama quoted one parent as asking.

"We go downtown," Obama answered. "If they won't come to us, we'll go to them."

Obama then guided the group — which he said one person dubbed "Obama's Army" — through two dramatic, confrontational meetings with housing officials in 1986. The meetings drew news coverage and produced results, his memoir says.

In the first meeting, at Chicago Housing Authority headquarters downtown, Obama's group secured a promise of immediate asbestos testing at Altgeld and prompted aldermen to call hearings.

The second meeting was a chaotic event in which 500 Altgeld residents ran Chicago's top housing official off the grounds. But it produced "a victory of sorts," Obama wrote, as workers in "moon-suits" soon appeared and started sealing asbestos.

In the book, Obama wrote that his success in motivating the residents still inspires him. "I changed as a result of that bus trip, in a fundamental way," he wrote of confronting the housing officials downtown.

"That bus ride kept me going, I think. Maybe it still does."

Even as he campaigns for the White House, Obama speaks about his time in Altgeld. His first television interview after announcing his candidacy this month, on CBS's "60 Minutes," featured Obama leading a driving tour through the housing project.

But other forces — unacknowledged in Obama's book, but receiving public attention at the time — were at work in the asbestos story.

At the same time Altgeld tenants were asking their questions, the respected Chicago Reporter newspaper published an exposé of asbestos problems in a different housing project. It also asserted that heating pipes at other Chicago projects had similar asbestos insulation.

The Reporter's investigation was cited repeatedly on television and in local newspapers, and the Chicago Sun-Times credited it with bringing the asbestos problem to light.

"That article stirred me, and it stirred many others," said Rush, the former alderman, who said he initiated a City Council inquiry into asbestos because of the Chicago Reporter story. A long-serving congressman, Rush faced a primary election challenge from Obama in 2000, but he has since endorsed Obama's presidential campaign.

Obama's Altgeld Gardens account also omits the work of Johnson.

DOJ_NMG_0133688

She was already widely known for her pioneering work in pushing officials to investigate environmental hazards at local industrial sites. Spurred by her husband's premature death from lung cancer, Johnson had begun documenting the health complaints of Altgeld residents in the late 1970s. Johnson formed a group called People for Community Recovery and tried to cajole scientists to study possible links between the ailments that residents reported to her and the harmful substances around their community.

One of those scientists, Regnal Jones, visited Johnson in the early 1980s and recalls sitting in her kitchen as she laid out hundreds of index cards listing the illnesses throughout Altgeld. He said he was "blown away" by Johnson's survey.

During that visit, Jones said, he inspected Johnson's apartment and concluded that her heating pipes were insulated with asbestos. From that point on, Johnson says, she included asbestos in her complaints to government officials.

As Obama became involved in the asbestos issue, Johnson was among those who worked with him.

In interviews, she said she helped plan the Altgeld tenants' confrontational trip to the Chicago Housing Authority, meeting occasionally with Obama in her living room. Press accounts show that she was part of the protest.

Today, Johnson, now 72, is particularly disturbed that Obama's memoir portrayed the tenants as meek and confused, highlighting one parent who was illiterate. Johnson had been quoted on many occasions in the press by the time she met Obama. She had persuaded city officials to request the tests that found hazardous materials in local drinking water.

"Why would he paint us as so pathetic?" asked Cheryl Johnson, Hazel's daughter, who now runs the Altgeld group her mother founded. "Isn't a memoir supposed to be accurate?"

"There's no way that you could have done anything out there without knowing that this little old lady had been in Altgeld forever," said Jones, who was working for the city health department at the time.

Another Chicago community organizer said he had no quarrel with the license that Obama took in his memoir. "If you were writing your movie, I'm sure you'd be the star," said Salim Al Nurridin. "It's his movie."

The Hot Ticket In Hollywood: An Evening With Obama (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif., Feb. 19 — Tom Hanks has bought a $2,300 ticket. So have Jennifer Aniston, Eddie Murphy and Denzel Washington. The studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and 20th Century Fox have all sent checks or faxed their credit card numbers, too.

Given the A-list stars, movie and music moguls, and top Hollywood dealmakers who have sent their R.S.V.P.'s, one would think the man of honor at Tuesday night's benefit at the Beverly Hilton would be getting a lifetime achievement award. But the toast of the evening is Barack Obama, the 45-year-old first-term Democratic senator from Illinois, in his first foray to Los Angeles as a declared presidential candidate.

It is hard to say whether the unusual heat behind the evening owes more to interest in Mr. Obama or to the three men who spearheaded the fund-raiser: the DreamWorks co-founders David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg.

The haul is expected to be at least $1 million, making it the first major event here of the presidential campaign. (Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, will get a chance to flex her own Hollywood fund-raising muscles on March 24 at the estate of Ronald Burkle, the supermarket tycoon.) Originally set for a restaurant with room for 400 people, the Obama event was moved over the weekend to a hotel ballroom with a capacity of 600, and payments were still filtering in by fax.

Of chief concern to a much smaller group of fund-raisers was that they be credited for any attendees they invited; those with at least 20 tickets to their name have been asked to dine with Mr. Obama at Mr. Geffen's Beverly Hills mansion after the reception.

One movie producer who raised enough money to attend the dinner said he had done so merely because many of his friends wanted to meet the senator but would have had no other way of buying a ticket — though he confessed that he also wanted to "kick the tires" on Mr. Obama himself. Yet he insisted on anonymity, saying he was also a supporter of Mrs. Clinton, and "I just don't want to hurt her feelings."

DOJ_NMG_0133689

Neither the reception nor the dinner is limited to Hollywood people; Alan C. Fox, a shopping mall owner and manager in Studio City, Calif., said he had raised about $150,000 from friends in real estate and finance, some already Obama enthusiasts, others skeptical but curious.

The ticket price of $2,300 reflects the maximum individual donation to a federal campaign, and, unlike those behind so many other Hollywood galas, organizers of this one vowed to bar the door to freeloaders, no matter how famous.

"We've turned down people who asked to bring a guest," said Andy Spahn, a political adviser to Mr. Spielberg and Mr. Katzenberg, among other industry people. "There will be no comps. Celebs are writing checks. Everybody's writing."

Among the industry players who have contributed are Peter A. Chernin, chairman and chief executive of News Corporation's Fox Group; Ron Meyer, the president of Universal Studios; Richard Cook, chairman of Walt Disney Studios; and Brad Grey, chairman of Paramount Pictures.

The scale of the event amounts to a coup, political operatives in Los Angeles said, since even veteran senators seldom take more than $50,000 to $100,000 from fund-raisers this early in the campaign cycle. Former Senator John Edwards, a frequent Los Angeles visitor, raised about $100,000 at a much smaller reception on Wednesday, for example — and the entertainment-industry contingent did not go much beyond the creator of the TNT show "The Closer," James Duff, and the actor Gary Cole, who played a vice president on "The West Wing."

Despite that, aides to Mr. Obama, loath to let the spotlight on their candidate drift to his wealthy donors or newfound Hollywood ties, declined to discuss the event except to say it would be closed to the news media.

What is known is that there will be no red carpet or V.I.P. room, no sit-down dinner and scant opportunity for one-on-one conversation with Mr. Obama, except for those who make it to Mr. Geffen's home. "It's going to be very democratic, with a small D," Mr. Spahn said.

Can This System Be Saved? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

THE PRESIDENTIAL public financing system is probably dead for the 2008 campaign. Certainly, the notion that candidates would limit their spending during the primary season in return for receiving federal matching funds has become quaint; the limits are so outdated and the amount of funds that can be raised so great that no serious candidate will take that bargain. And, for the first time, it looks as if the second part of the post-Watergate financing reform -- providing each major-party nominee with full financing for the general election campaign -- is about to become extinct as well.

Top-tier candidates of both parties, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former senator John Edwards, have already started raising money for a general election race. (They'll have to give it back if they don't win the nomination.) So has Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), but with a twist: Mr. Obama has asked the Federal Election Commission to rule on whether he could legally collect money for the general election campaign but ultimately decide to take public funding were he to win the nomination and his GOP opponent followed suit.

As Mr. Obama put it in his letter to the FEC, "Should both major parties' nominees elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse, and facilitate the conduct of campaigns freed from any dependence on private fundraising." The FEC has said it is speeding up its review of Mr. Obama's intriguing proposal, which turns, as a legal matter, on the question of whether the candidate would be deemed to have "accepted" money he is raising for the general election campaign if he keeps it separate and unused. If the money has been raised but not "accepted," Mr. Obama argues, he could still choose to return it and take public financing instead.

Linguistically, this might be a stretch that only a former Harvard Law Review president could love. But as a matter of policy, it could salvage a failing system to promote the aims underlying the law. As Mr. Obama put it, "Congress concluded some thirty years ago that the public funding alternative . . . would serve core purposes in the public interest: limiting the escalation of campaign spending and the associated pressures on candidates to raise, at the expense of time devoted to public dialogue, ever vaster sums of money."

Interpreting the law in a way that would allow the nominees the chance to call off the fundraising arms race would further the purpose of the campaign finance law and avoid the first fully privately financed presidential campaign since Watergate. The FEC should allow that, and Mr. Obama's rivals in both parties should pledge, if they win the nomination, to help save the system, not destroy it.

Richardson Wants No Attacks Among Dems (USAT)

USA Today, February 19, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said he and all other Democratic presidential candidates should sign a pledge not to attack one another. Such a pact would mean "we will go into a general election stronger," Richardson said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition.

Richardson also said that as "the only Westerner in the race," he will have to do well in Nevada's early presidential caucuses next year. "It's a neighbor state. It's a state of diversity," said Richardson, whose mother was Mexican. Richardson acknowledged that he's behind in the polls, but he added, "It's a year away."

The Iowa caucuses are first on the Democratic political calendar for 2008, then Nevada, followed by New Hampshire's primary and South Carolina's.

Bush has two benign moles removed

Two moles removed from President Bush's left temple were non-cancerous, White House spokesman Alex Conant said.

The skin growths were removed Friday during a brief procedure at the White House.

Bush has had lesions removed before: a precancerous lesion on his left arm in August, a non-cancerous skin growth on his neck in July 2005, small lesions from his left shoulder and face in 2004, and others from his face in December 2001. None was cancerous.

Senate leader's son joins Clinton camp

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has not endorsed a Democratic presidential candidate, but his son, Rory, has signed on as Nevada chairman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid.

Rory Reid, 44, is chairman of the Clark County, Nev., Commission and a former chairman of the Nevada State Democratic Party. He will be senior adviser on Western issues, including public lands, resources and conservation, transportation, growth and affordable housing, the New York senator's campaign said in a statement Sunday.

As Clinton Runs, Some Old Foes Stay On Sideline (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — Back when Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was first lady, no one better embodied what she once called the “vast right-wing conspiracy” than Richard Mellon Scaife.

Mr. Scaife, reclusive heir to the Mellon banking fortune, spent more than $2 million investigating and publicizing accusations about the supposed involvement of Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton in corrupt land deals, sexual affairs, drug running and murder.

But now, as Mrs. Clinton is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, Mr. Scaife’s checkbook is staying in his pocket.

Christopher Ruddy, who once worked full-time for Mr. Scaife investigating the Clintons and now runs a conservative online publication he co-owns with Mr. Scaife, said, “Both of us have had a rethinking.”

“Clinton wasn’t such a bad president,” Mr. Ruddy said. “In fact, he was a pretty good president in a lot of ways, and Dick feels that way today.”

As for the conservative response to Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, Mr. Ruddy said, “The level of intensity and anger toward Hillary is not getting to the level that it was toward Bill Clinton when he was president.” He added, “She has moderated and developed a separate image.”

H. Yale Gutnick, a longtime lawyer for Mr. Scaife, said his client was unavailable for comment.

To judge by conservative talk radio, Mrs. Clinton appears to be the most reviled politician in the country. But others in the conservative movement say it is easy to be deceived by what is on the airwaves and by the marketing of anti-Clinton paraphernalia, books and movies. (Among items on sale at conservative Web sites: "No Way in Hellary" barbecue aprons; "Hillary Scares Me" baby onesies; and buttons that say simply "Hillary Hater.")

For every conservative who says Mrs. Clinton will feel the wrath of the movement's grass-roots organizers later in the campaign, particularly if she becomes her party's nominee, another expresses doubt that Clinton foes can ever be revved up as they once were.

Some of her former antagonists say that terrorism and war have made the political battles of her husband's administration — gay men and lesbians in the military, the White House travel office, Monica Lewinsky — seem remote, if not trivial.

"I think the country is burned out on it," said Cliff Jackson, a lawyer in Little Rock, Ark., who helped set in motion several scandals involving accusations of philandering by Mr. Clinton. Mr. Jackson said he had no plans to oppose Mrs. Clinton's candidacy, and in a personal blog he recently praised her husband's post-presidential efforts to fight AIDS in Africa.

The level of animosity that a Clinton candidacy could arouse is a pivotal question in the 2008 campaign.

Mrs. Clinton has made the anticipated attacks against her a staple of her fund-raising appeals, saying she will need money to fight back. But that expected onslaught is also a linchpin of other Democrats' arguments that she is too polarizing to win.

Many Republicans, meanwhile, say her candidacy is the best hope to reunify their party at a time when many conservatives are unhappy with the ideological credentials of the front-runners for the Republican nomination.

And for conservative organizers, publishers and merchandise-makers, her nomination would be an opportunity to revive what once seemed like the anti-Clinton industry.

"She is the designated devil," said David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, whose Conservative Political Action Conference next month in Washington will showcase assorted anti-Clinton T-shirts and gear.

But Mr. Keene and many other conservative fund-raisers and organizers acknowledge that the grass-roots hatred for Mrs. Clinton and her husband has subsided substantially since they left the White House.

National efforts to raise money to stop Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns in New York in 2000 and 2006 never got off the ground. Nor did plans to raise money for a "counter-Clinton" library in Little Rock. And conservatives note to their consternation that at the moment the woman they treat as the incarnation of 1960s liberalism appears to be campaigning as the least liberal of the Democratic front-runners.

Still, Mr. Keene said, "Her image as the wicked witch of the left was burned in the minds of conservatives and the larger public before she tried to moderate her image." He noted that polls consistently give her the highest unfavorable ratings among the front-runners, typically more than a third of the public. (Her favorable ratings are also unusually high.)
